"It is well known that the doctors have persistently opposed every measure that has been conceived and dedicated to increasing the health and longevity of the community. We opposed the establishment of boards of health, we opposed the reporting of communicable diseases, and we have opposed practically every step along the arduous course of the public health movement. We are not unlike the weavers in the great industrial centers in England who organized mob parties to go in and destroy the newly-made machines. They argued that 1 machine run by 1 man can produce an output equal to the labor of 10 men. Therefore, 9 men must obviously be thrown out of work. History records that this assumption was fallacious."

The physician quoted above says "We," speaking regretfully for the profession as a whole. But other contributors to this survey make a sharp distinction between the profession and its reactionary politicians. A middle western practitioner, president of a clinic, writes:

"Our local State and national health boards, while having the support, advice, and association of outstanding physicians, find in general that one of their constant and most difficult problems is to overcome the opposition of local medical societies to such health measures as the health departments deem necessary to public welfare. There are cases where public health officials have had to resign from local societies because of their opposition to the health measures instituted."

SOCIETIES REGIMENT PHYSICIANS

Further corroboration comes from Malmberg, who states:

Medical societies not only attempt to regiment physicians in private practice, but they often attempt to lay down rules for public health departments as well. Free immunization against communicable diseases, which has done so much to reduce death rates, was bitterly opposed by organized medicine, and still is in many instances.

Malmberg cites an example of organized medicine's continuing hostility to the work of Maryland public health clinics in administering without charge the anti-Rocky Mountain fever developed and distributed at public expense by the United States Public Health Service. The doctors objected to this "encroaching upon their private practice," according to the May 12, 1947, issue of the Washington, D. C., Evening Star.

SUSPECTS LOCAL HEALTH UNITS

Organized medicine still views local public health departments, fearfully jealous lest their extension make inroads upon the practitioner's paid services. The AMA currently opposes a measure now before Congress to strengthen our local public health units through Federal funds. Although this measure passed the Senate unanimously last year, the AMA views it in the same category as Federal aid to medical education—as "the back door to socialized medicine."

Another charge to which Dr. Henderson takes violent exception is my citing AMA opposition to the American Red Cross plan of 1949. That plan called for a Nation-wide reserve of civilian blood banks. Actually, Dr. Henderson does not attempt to disprove my statements, even though he presumably includes them among the "outright lies." Instead, he replies that the AMA's board of trustees approved the plan "in principle, even before it was publicly announced."

AMA TACTICS ON BLOOD BANKS

The AMA's tactics on the American Red Cross plan somewhat resembles its shifts on aid to medical education; it is not embarrassed to be on all sides of the question and then later, triumphantly single out the position which in the light of history, causes them least embarrassment. I quote one of the AMA official statements which should not be forgotten.

Said the Journal of the American Medical Association, January 17, 1948, page 190:

A vast civilian free blood bank is considered not the proper function of the American Red Cross.

The editorial specifically condemned the plan because it would eliminate the customary fee private practitioner's charge for transfusions.

LOCAL SOCIETIES JOIN IN

A number of local societies, as I indicated August 30, went further. Said the New Orleans Medical and Surgical Journal in March 1948:

The American Red Cross, while not politically dominated, operates with Government sponsorship, not with tax money but with public subscription. The allotment of blood and its products by the American Red Cross should ultimately lead to the effect of having the Red Cross practice medicine. The transition from this arrangement to state medicine could become an imminent danger.

I also cite for Dr. Henderson's benefit an even earlier example of the AMA's rather tart approach to some Red Cross activities. Declared the board of trustees in 1922:

The public health activities of the American Red Cross are no longer necessary, and if continued, are likely to promote community irresponsibility.

That appears on page 285 of the AMA Index and Digest of Official Action.

NOTEWORTHY OMISSIONS

It is pertinent to note that while Dr. Henderson told 145,000 members of his association that all my charges are "outright lies," he made no reference whatsoever to three instances I cited:

First. Organized medicine's opposition to the first bills to grant Federal aid to the States to reduce infant and maternal mortalities—a step by the Federal Government which the AMA labeled as "bureaucratic interference with the sacred rights of the American home, unsound in policy and tending to promote communism."

Second. Organized medicine's jaundiced view of the Social Security Act, which the board of trustees viewed as "the first step in the breakdown of American democracy, a beginning invasion by the state into the personal life of the individual."

Third. Organized medicine's varying degrees of hostility toward such great foundations as the Rockefeller Foundation, the Rosenwald Fund, the Commonwealth Fund, the Millbank Memorial Fund, the Twentieth Century Fund, and the American Foundation. It termed some of these efforts in the development of medical research and knowledge which resulted in tremendous health gains for all people "lay interference and intrusion."

MEDICAL CENSORSHIP

Will this documented reply to Dr. Henderson appear in the pages of the Nation's medical press? I am not hopeful, for sad experience proves that the leaders of organized medicine—despite their talk about conducting a national education campaign—are most afraid of education and the spread of ideas. They do not wish to meet their critics in full and open debate now any more than they have in times past.

Let me cite but one instance to illustrate the stubborn refusal of the AMA leaders to allow their membership opportunity to hear the other side. Almost 2 years ago—February 8, 1949, to be exact—in an address to the representatives of 13 great national organizations dedicated to the improvement of social legislation, I presented the case for a national health program as called for by the President, and stated:

Time and again, the AMA has been called upon by those in Congress and by representatives of public interest organizations for a legislative program to help secure a more equitable distribution of medical care. I should like to echo that call again, but I do so with little hope of receiving any constructive reply. But in addition to this, I would like to address a request publicly to Dr. Morris Fishbein, editor of the Journal of the American Medical Association, and often regarded as the spokesman of organized medicine. I ask him in the public interest and in fairness to an ever-growing number of responsible members of the American Medical Association who favor national health insurance to open the pages of the Journal to a fair presentation of both sides of the issue.

The standards of fair journalism and public interest require at the least that the existing iron curtain of censorship be lifted from the pages of the Journal of the American Medical Association so that the American doctor may find full and fair discussion of the pros and cons of this significant issue.

CHALLENGES UNMET

That challenge, and every subsequent challenge has gone unmet. I have no hope that the spirit of fair play will suddenly prevail now so that the hardworking physicians of this country will see this reply to Dr. Henderson. However, the gravity of our national health needs and a steadfast reliance upon the ability of the truth ultimately to prevail, compels me to bring further important facts to the attention of the individual doctor. Medical iron curtains notwithstanding I am confident that this information will pierce barriers, will seep, trickle, and flow around every obstacle. With a slowness that is agonizing, but a surety that is heartening, the facts shall become known to America's 150,000,000 patients and 200,000 doctors.

Can Dr. Henderson and the leaders of the AMA's national education campaign be proud of having founded their multimillion-dollar efforts on a false keystone? Indeed, the theme of the AMA's campaign has been grounded on a quotation that is demonstrably false and irrelevant. The AMA has circulated millions of leaflets embodying this false statement which they attribute to Lenin:

Socialized medicine is the keystone to the arch of the Socialist state.

NO DOCUMENTATION

I have called attention before to the fact that the greatest research library in the world—the Library of Congress—stated:

All our efforts to trace this or similar statements by Lenin have been to no avail.

The Russian specialist of the University of Chicago reported a similar failure. When I asked the president of the Wisconsin State Medical Society for complete documentation, he replied:

I am very sorry, indeed, that I cannot document this quotation.

This total lack of authenticity has not prevented Whitaker and Baxter from continued circulation of this spurious quotation. How can organized medicine expect to be received in good faith when it continues to sanction such tactics?

ASKS DR. HENDERSON TO REPLY

There is a long list of other instances in which organized medicine has misrepresented or permitted its spokesmen to misrepresent or condoned misrepresentations about the President's national health program to the public. For the sake of brevity, I ask Dr. Henderson to reply to each of these cases:

First. Has not the secretary of the British Medical Association repeatedly charged American medical spokesmen with misrepresenting the attitude of the BMA toward the British National Health Service?

Second. Has not the American Medical Association been publicly castigated by Raymond Rich Associates whose public relations services it had employed for 17 months? Did this reputable organization not issue its public statement of resignation sent to all AMA officers and Members of Congress as follows:

The very integrity and sincerity of the association are at stake. * * * Stated simply, the association has yet to take unequivocal and effective action on the policies which it adopted on our recommendation last year; to seek the truth on the economic and social aspects of medicine, to put the public first, and to become adequate to its responsibilities.

Third. Is the American Medical Association proud of the endorsement its journal accorded the National Physicians Committee—an organization which engaged in so many questionable practices that it was finally disbanded as a result of protests from thousands of outraged physicians?

Fourth. Is the American Medical Association proud of the record of its national educational campaign directors in making wholly unsubstantiated charges that in their own wild words, "a police arm of the Government" was "in a campaign to discredit American medicine and terrorize physicians into abandoning their opposition to compulsory health insurance." Were not these charges so palpably false that the editorial director of the AMA's national education campaign resigned when he found no evidence to support Whitaker and Baxter's irresponsible headline efforts.

DR. MEANS REFLECTS

The answers to these questions reflect so badly upon the American Medical Association that all of us who respect and admire the individual practitioner are concerned by the low state to which his professional organization has descended. The answers to these questions were so disturbing to Dr. James Howard Means that this distinguished professor of clinical medicine at Harvard University and chief of the medical services at the Massachusetts General Hospital, declared in the Atlantic Monthly, October 1950:

In conclusion I submit that in recent years organized medicine has taken on a rapidly expanding political function. In my opinion this is being exerted in a way which is not in the best interest of the people, for whom, after all, medical service is supplied. Medical care is for the people—not for the doctors. * * *

In this emergency I consider that organized medicine has failed dismally. Its public relations are deteriorating. People look upon its motivation with increasing suspicion. It cries now for voluntary health plans but does little actually to produce them. The record shows that when others have sought to do these things, organized medicine has obstructed them. A learned profession has sunk, or been dragged, in its political sphere, to a distressingly low level.

ELMER DAVIS COMMMENTS

Dr. Means' opinions cannot fail to carry weight in view of his prestige and professional accomplishments. His views are echoed by an equally distinguished American, by one of the most respected commentators of our time, Elmer Davis. Mr. Davis, from the vantage point of the layman, delivered these remarks in his noteworthy broadcast of October 13:

I am not enough of an expert in either public health or medical economics to know whether national health insurance is advisable or not; but it certainly is not socialized medicine, and such a pounding of the bass drum as the American Medical Association is putting on this week makes you feel that it can't be a very good cause which has to be defended by such specious arguments. According to the AMA advertising, if we decide to pay for medical care by health insurance we are giving up our freedom and inviting men with whips and guns to take us over. Doctors are supposed to be men more intelligent than the average, and it is hard to believe that many of them really think this; but the medical leaders have turned their crusade over to a firm of press agents, who are using the circus type of ballyhoo. * * *

I repeat—national health insurance may or may not be a good thing; I am not competent to judge. But the techniques of the doctors' union—the use of questionable statistics or irrelevant slogans instead of analysis of the facts, the appeals to political and economic prejudice—all that looks as if they felt that their case could not stand examination on its merits.

If they have valid and credible arguments, many of us would like to hear them. But we have not heard them yet.

I earnestly urge that in the place of the stultifying slogans of its lobbyists, organized medicine will substitute the words of one of the greatest physicians of all time—Sir William Osler:

Undue reverence for authority as such, a serene satisfaction with the status quo, and a fatuous objection to change have often retarded the progress of medicine. In every generation, in every country, there have been, and ever will be, laudatores temporis acti, in the bad sense of that phase, not a few of them, men in high places, who lent the weight of a complacent conservatism to bolster up an inefflectual attempt to stay the progress of new ideas.

APPOINTMENT OF GENERAL EISENHOWER SUPREME COMMANDER

Mr. REES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. REES. Mr. Speaker, the President has done well in the appointment of Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower to become commander for the supreme headquarters of the Allied Powers in Europe. There is no one in this country or anywhere else who is as well qualified to do the job as Dwight Eisenhower.

It is hoped that General Eisenhower will be given complete authority in the handling of this tremendous responsibility, and if given the responsibility he will discharge his duty as he has in the past, with credit to himself and to his country.

In General Eisenhower's own words, he will "look duty squarely in the face and do everything he possibly can to make peace on earth a reality."

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SMITH of Kansas (at the request of Mr. REES), on account of illness in family.

To Messrs. TALLE, LECOMPTE, MARTIN of Iowa, and HOEVEN (at the request of Mr. DOLLIVER).

SENATE

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1950

(Legislative day of Monday, November 27, 1950)

The Senate met in executive session at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, who in times past, across yearning centuries, spoke to the fathers through the prophets and in the word made flesh hath spoken to us in that One whose name is the Prince of Peace, and upon whose shoulders the government of men must ultimately rest: We thank Thee that not on one wondrous night alone did a star of hope light the heavens, but that straight down the crowding years the starlit pathway leads, reminding our earth-filled eyes that the highest truth is born in lowly places, clad in humble garb. As the Christmas star rains its fire once more on an earth plowed with spite and hate, may we see in it a shining symbol that if we would find the truth and the life abundant we must follow our starry ideals, no matter over what burning sands or to what lonely deserts they take our faltering feet. Following the gleam, bring us and all mankind, at last, to that glad day which all men of good will seek:

"When peace shall over all the earth
Its ancient splendor fling,
And the whole world send back the song
Which now the angels sing."

Amen.

AWARD OF CONGRESSIONAL MEDAL OF HONOR TO COL. JUSTICE MARION CHAMBERS

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD at this point an account of the presentation of the Congressional Medal of Honor awarded to Col. Justice Marion Chambers, United States Marine Corps Reserve, retired. The presentation took place at the White House. The President of the United States made the presentation to Colonel Chambers. The account of the presentation describes the heroic and outstanding conduct of Colonel Chambers for which the Medal of Honor was awarded to him. Colonel Chambers is one of the advisory staff experts of the Committee on Armed Services. In that capacity he has been invaluable to his country and to the committee. He is an outstanding and heroic officer, a great soldier, and a fine gentleman. I am proud to say that he is a resident of Rockville, Md. I ask that the account be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESSIONAL MEDAL OF HONOR AWARDED TO COL. JUSTICE MARION CHAMBERS, USMCR (RETIRED)

The President today bestowed the Nation's highest award, the Congressional Medal of Honor, on Col. Justice Marion Chambers, USMCR (retired), for exceptional gallantry which helped assure the victory at Iwo Jima. It was the two hundredth Medal of Honor for a marine; the eightieth for marine heroism in World War II.

Colonel Chambers, of 140 South Adams Street, Rockville, Md., has been staff adviser for the Senate Armed Services Committee for the past 4 years. He is a product of Washington's Fifth Battalion of Marine Reserves which has graduated numerous outstanding officers.

Presentation of the Medal of Honor was made at noon in the west wing of the White House. Invited were Secretary of Defense George C. Marshall; Secretary of the Navy Francis P. Matthews; Admiral Forrest P. Sherman, Chief of Naval Operations; Gen. C. B. Cates, Commandant of the Marine Corps; Lt. Col. R. H. Thomas, USMC, aide to the Commandant of the Marine Corps; Mrs. J. M. Chambers (wife); Patricia Chambers (daughter); John Chambers (son); J. M. Chambers (son); Peter and Paul Chambers (7-month-old twin sons); Mr. A. F. Chambers, Sr. (father); Mr. A. F. Chambers, Jr. (brother); Mr. and Mrs. Rodney Jarvis (sister and husband); Mr. and Mrs. Mead Baker (sister and husband); Mr. and Mrs. John Schmutzer (mother-in-law and father-in-law); Mr. and Mrs. Albert Schmutzer (brother-in-law and wife); Mr. Lawrence M. Rulison (major, USMCR); Mr. James G. Headley (captain, USMCR); Mr. Henry Hubbard and Mr. James R. Miller (friends); Maj. Gen. Verne D. Budge (USA retired) (friend); and Mrs. J. F. Blakeney (friend).

Colonel Chambers had been recommended for the Medal of Honor on April 7, 1945, after he had been evacuated from Iwo Jima seriously wounded. He had received the Navy Cross, which honor was revoked upon the reexamination of the original recommendation, with additional evidence.

He commanded the Third Battalion, Twenty-fifth Marine Regiment, in the Iwo Jima landing on February 19, 1945. His sector was beneath high ground from which heavy enemy fire raked the whole landing beach.

"Capture of the high ground," read the recommendation, "* * * was essential to the success of the D-day operations. It is an established fact that had it not been done, it would have constituted a most serious threat to the subsequent operations of the Fifth Marine Corps."

The Third Battalion lost more than half its officers and nearly one-half its enlisted strength on D-day. But by "fearless disregard for his own life"—and leading his depleted battalion "by example rather than command" Colonel Chambers won the key heights and anchored the right flank of the Marines' position.

On the fourth day, directing the Marines' first rocket barrage and exposed to the enemy's main line of resistance, Colonel Chambers fell under enemy machine-gun fire. His wounds were so serious that he was medically retired on January 1, 1946, and, because he was specially commended for performance of duty in combat, he was promoted to full colonel.

He was born at Huntington, W. Va., on February 2, 1908, the son of Mr. and Mrs. Arthur F. Chambers. He went to school there and 3 years at Marshall College in Huntington. He attended George Washington University 2 years, then National University also in Washington where he obtained his law degree.

Colonel Chambers joined the Naval Reserve in 1928, served 2 years, then joined the Marine Corps Reserve as a private. He was commissioned in 1932 and continued his studies toward promotion. He was a major, attending summer camp, when the Fifth Battalion was called up in 1940. For his enthusiasm and energy in training his men they dubbed him "Jumping Joe."

Colonel Chambers received the Silver Star medal for getting out the wounded and directing the night defense of a battalion aid station on Tulagi, where he was a patient already seriously wounded. He commanded the Third Battalion, Twenty-fifth Marines in the Roi-Namur campaign. On Saipan he suffered blast concussion, but returned to lead his command there and on Tinian. He had trained his command so thoroughly and his leadership was so conspicuous that he was awarded the Legion of Merit.

The award today reads:

"The President of the United States takes pleasure in presenting the Medal of Honor to Col. Justice M. Chambers, United States Marine Corps Reserve, for service as set forth in the following citation:

"'For conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity at the risk of his life above and beyond the call of duty as commanding officer of the Third Assault Battalion Landing Team, Twenty-fifth Marines, Fourth Marine Division, in action against enemy Japanese forces on Iwo Jima, Volcano Islands, from February 19 to 22, 1945. Under a furious barrage of enemy machine-gun and small-arms fire from the commanding cliffs on the right, Colonel Chambers, then lieutenant colonel, landed immediately after the initial asault waves of his battalion on D-day to find the momentum of the assault threatened by heavy casualties from withering Japanese artillery, mortar, rocket, machine-gun, and rifle fire. Exposed to relentless hostile fire, he coolly reorganized his battle-weary men, inspiring them to heroic efforts by his own valor and leading them in an attack on the critical, impregnable high ground from which the enemy was pouring an increasing volume of fire directly onto troops ashore as well as amphibious craft in succeeding waves. Constantly in the front lines encouraging his men to push forward against the enemy's savage resistance, Colonel Chambers led the 8-hour battle to carry the flanking ridge top and reduce the enemy's fields of aimed fire, thus protecting the vital foothold gained. In constant defiance of hostile fire while reconnoitering the entire regimental combat team zone of action, he maintained contact with adjacent units and forwarded vital information to the regimental commander. His zealous fighting spirit undiminished despite terrific casualties and the loss of most of his key officers, he again reorganized his troops for renewed attack against the enemy's main line of resistance and was directing the fire of the rocket platoon when he fell, critically wounded. Evacuated under heavy Japanese fire, Colonel Chambers, by forceful leadership, courage, and fortitude in the face of staggering odds, was directly instrumental in insuring the success of subsequent operations of the Fifth Amphibious Corps on Iwo Jima, thereby sustaining and enhancing the finest traditions of the United States naval service.'

"HARRY S. TRUMAN."

EMMA W. WILSON

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, from the Committee on Rules and Administration, I report favorably, without amendment, Senate Resolution 363, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. WHERRY. Reserving the right to object, will the distinguished Senator explain the purpose of the resolution?

Mr. HAYDEN. The resolution was submitted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER] and relates to the death of an employee in his office.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 363) submitted by Mr. BUTLER on November 28, 1950, was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate to Emma W. Wilson, sister of Evelynn Walker, late an employee of the Senate, a sum equal to 6 months' compensation at the rate she was receiving by law at the time of her death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

ELECTION OF MEMBER OF SENATE TO JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, from the Committee on Rules and Administration, I report an original resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 379) was considered and agreed to, as follows:

RESOLUTIONS REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE ON RULES AND ADMINISTRATION

Mr. HAYDEN. From the Committee on Rules and Administration, I now report four resolutions, the purpose of which is to grant investigating committees extensions of time until January 31, 1951, within which to make reports.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the first resolution.

INVESTIGATION OF PRODUCTION OF AGRICULTURAL CROPS

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A resolution (S. Res. 361) extending the authority for an investigation with respect to the protection of agricultural crops, reported with an additional amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. WHERRY. Reserving the right to object, Mr. President, I am not sure that all Members of the Senate heard the explanation by the distinguished chairman of the committee. But I understand this is the first of four or five resolutions, which tide the committees over until the Eighty-second Congress. Is that correct?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. The Committee on Rules and Administration determined that the committees in question should all be treated alike in fixing the termination date of January 31, 1951. By that time, the committees will have been able to take care of their offices, and, if the authorizations are renewed in the next Congress—and the new Congress can do as it pleases about that—that will give 1 month in which the committees may operate until a decision is made with respect to the authorizations in the new Congress. I am sure the Senator would like to have me say that each and every one of these resolutions has the termination date January 31, 1951.

Mr. HAYDEN. That was unanimously agreed to by the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution, as reported from the Committee on Rules and Administration?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution (S. Res. 361), which had previously been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, with an amendment, in line 7, after the word "until", to strike out "February 28" and insert "February 15."

Smith, late an employee of the Senate, a sum equal to 6 months' compensation at the rate she was receiving by law at the time of her death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

INTERNAL SECURITY

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, from the Committee on Rules and Administration, I report favorably, with amendments, Senate Resolution 366, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of the resolution?

Mr. HAYDEN. The resolution was submitted by the Senator from Mississippi at the request of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee. It relates to a continuance of surveillance of the infiltration of Communists into the United States. There was some question raised in committee as to the text of the resolution, which we can consider when it is looked into again in January, in that it specifies certain statutes to be examined, whereas the committee has broad authority to do that anyway, but inasmuch as the extension is only until the 31st of January, and can be reviewed by the committee, we decided to put the resolution into this shape.

Mr. LANGER. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments of the committee will be stated.

The amendments of the Committee on Rules and Administration were, on page 4, line 4, after the word "exceed", to strike out "$100,000" and insert "$10,000"; in line 6, after the word "committee", to insert "on or before January 31, 1951"; and after line 6, to strike out:

SEC. 5. The committee shall from time to time report to the Senate the results of its study and investigation, together with such recommendations as it may deem advisable respecting necessary legislation. All authority conferred by this resolution shall terminate on March 1, 1952.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution (S. Res. 366) as amended, was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof is authorized and directed to make a complete and continuing study and investigation of (1) the administration, operation, and enforcement of the Internal Security Act of 1950; (2) the administration, operation, and enforcement of other laws relating to espionage, sabotage, and the protection of the internal security of the United States; and (3) the extent, nature, and effects of subversive activities in the United States, its Territories and possessions, including, but not limited to, espionage, sabotage, and infiltration by persons who are or may be under the domination of the foreign government or organizations controlling the world Communist movement or any other movement seeking to overthrow the Government of the United States by force and violence.

SEC. 2. The committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to sit and act at such places and times during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Senate, to hold such hearings, to require by subpenas or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, to procure such printing and binding, and, within the amount appropriated therefor, to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report hearings of the committee or subcommittee shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. Subpenas shall be issued by the chairman of the committee or the subcommittee, and may be served by any person designated by such chairman.

A majority of the members of the committee, or duly authorized subcommittee thereof, shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, except that a lesser number, to be fixed by the committee, or by such subcommittee, shall constitute a quorum for the purpose of administering oaths and taking sworn testimony.

SEC. 3. The committee, or duly authorized subcommittee, shall have power to employ and fix the compensation of such officers, experts, and employees as it deems necessary in the performance of its duties, and is authorized to utilize the services, information, facilities, and personnel of the various departments and agencies of the Government to the extent that such services, information, facilities, and personnel, in the opinion of the heads of such departments and agencies, can be furnished without undue interference with agencies, can be furnished without undue interference with the performance of the work and duties of such departments and agencies.

SEC. 4. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $10,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee on or before January 31, 1951.

The preamble was agreed to, as follows:

Whereas the Congress from time to time has enacted laws designed to protect the internal security of the United States from acts of espionage and sabotage and from infiltration by persons who seek to overthrow the Government of the United States by force and violence; and

Whereas those who seek to evade such laws or to violate them with impunity constantly seek to devise and do devise clever and evasive means and tactics for such purposes; and

Whereas agents and dupes of the world Communist conspiracy have been and are engaged in activities (including the origination and dissemination of propaganda) designed and intended to bring such protective laws into disrepute or disfavor and to hamper or prevent effective administration and enforcement thereof; and

Whereas it is vital to the internal security of the United States that the Congress maintain a continuous surveillance over the problems presented by such activity and threatened activity and over the administration and enforcement of such laws.

ADDRESS BY HERBERT HOOVER

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, former President Herbert Hoover made an address on "Our National Policies in This Crisis," over the Mutual Broadcasting System last night.

The counsel and admonitions of the only living former President command the attention of our people, because his is a voice of experience in the highest public office in the land.

As we, who are Members of the Congress, weigh the tremendous responsibility that is ours in this crisis, our minds are open for the light to guide our actions.

The observations of Mr. Hoover, therefore, are of immediate interest for thoughtful consideration.

I ask unanimous consent for insertion of former President Hoover's radio address of last night in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I have received hundreds of requests that I appraise the present situation and give my conclusions as to our national policies.

I speak with a deep sense of responsibility. And I speak tonight under the anxieties of every American for the Nation's sons who are fighting and dying on a mission of peace and the honor of our country.

No appraisal of the world situation can be final in an unstable world. However, to find our national path we must constantly reexamine where we have arrived and at times revise our direction.

I do not propose to traverse the disastrous road by which we reached this point.

THE GLOBAL MILITARY SITUATION

We may first survey the global military situation. There is today only one center of aggression on the earth. That is the Communist-controlled Asian-European land mass of 800,000,000 people. They have probably over 300 trained and equipped combat divisions with over 30,000 tanks, 10,000 tactical planes, and further large reserves they can put in action in 90 days. But they are not a great sea power. Their long range air power is limited. These congeries of over 30 different races will some day go to pieces. But in the meantime they are cannon fodder.

Facing this menace on the eastern front there are about 100,000,000 non-Communist island peoples in Japan, Formosa, the Philippines, and Korea. Aside from Korea, which I discuss later, they have probably 12 effective combat divisions with practicaly no tanks, air, or navy.

Facing this land mass on the South are the Indies and the Middle East of about 600,000,000 non-Communist peoples. There are about 150,000,000 non-Communist peoples in north Africa and Latin America. Except Turkey and Formosa, these 850,000,000 people have little military force which they would not or could spare. But they could contribute vital economic and moral strength.

Facing this menace on the continental European front there are about 160,000,000 non-Communist people who, excluding Spain, have less than 20 combat divisions now available, few tanks and little air or naval force. But their will to defend themselves is feeble and their disunities are manifest.

Of importance in military weight at this moment there is the British Commonwealth of 150,000,000 people, with probably 30 combat divisions under arms, a superior navy, considerable air force and a few tanks.

And there are 150,000,000 people in the United States preparing 3,500,000 men into a gigantic air force and navy, with about 30 equipped combat divisions.

SOME MILITARY CONCLUSIONS

If we weigh these military forces as they stand today we must arrive at certain basic conclusions.

(a) We must face the fact that to commit the sparse ground forces of the non-Communist nations into a land war against this Communist land mass would be a war without victory, a war without a successful political terminal. Any attempt to make war on the Communist mass by land invasion, through the quicksands of China, India, of Western Europe is sheer folly. That would be the graveyard of millions of American boys and would end in the exhaustion of this Gibraltar of western civilization.

Even were Western Europe armed far beond any contemplated program, we could never reach Moscow. The Germans failed with a magnificent army of 240 combat divisions and with powerful air and tank forces.

(b) Equally, we Americans alone with sea and air power can so control the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans that there can be no possible invasion of the Western Hemisphere by Communist armies. They can no more reach Washington in force than we can reach Moscow.

(c) In this military connection we must realize the fact that the atomic bomb is a far less dominant weapon than it was once thought to be.

(d) It is obvious that the United Nations have been defeated in Korea by the aggression of Communist China. There are no adequate forces in the world to repel them.

Even if we sacrifice more American boys to hold a bridgehead, we know we shall not succeed at the present time in the mission given to us by the 50 members of the United Nations.

OUR ECONOMIC STRENGTH

We may explore the American situation still further. The 150,000,000 American people are already economically strained by Government expenditures. It must not be forgotten that we are carrying huge burdens from previous wars, including obligations to veterans and $260,000,000,000 of bond and currency issues from those wars. In the fiscal year 1952 Federal and local expenditures are likely to exceed $90,000,000,000. That is more than our total savings. We must finance huge deficits by further Government issues. Inflation is already moving, but we might with stern measures avoid the economic disintegration of such a load for a very few years. If we continued long on this road, the one center of resistance in the world will collapse in economic disaster.

THE DIPLOMATIC FRONT

We may appraise the diplomatic front. Our great hope was in the United Nations. We have witnessed the sabotage of its primary purpose of preserving peace. It has been down to last week a forum for continuous smear on our honor, our ideals, and our purposes.

It did stiffen up against raw aggression last July in Korea. But in its call for that military action America had to furnish over 90 percent of the foreign forces and suffer over 90 percent of their dead and injured. That effort now comes at least to a measurable military defeat by the aggression of Communist hordes.

Whether or not the United Nations is to have a moral defeat and suffer the collapse of its whole moral stature now depends on whether it has the courage to—

(a) Declare Communist China an aggressor.

(b) Refuse admission of this aggressor to its membership.

(c) Demand that each member of the United Nations cease to furnish or transport supplies of any kind to Communist China that can aid in their military operations. Such a course honestly carried out by the non-Communist nations is not economic sanctions nor does it require military actions. But it would constitute a great pressure for rectitude.

(d) For once, pass a resolution condemning the infamous lies about the United States.

Any course short of this is appeasement.

WHAT SHOULD OUR POLICIES BE?

And now I come to where we should go from here.

Two months ago I suggested a tentative alternate policy for the United States. It received a favorable reception from the large majority of our press.

Since then the crisis in the world has become even more acute. It is clear that the United Nations are defeated in Korea. It is also clear that other non-Communist nations did not or could not substantially respond to the UN call for arms to Korea. It is clear the UN cannot mobilize substantial military forces. It is clear continental Europe has not in the 3 years of our aid developed that unity of purpose and that will power necessary for its own defense. It is clear that our British friends are flirting with appeasement of Communist China. It is clear that the United Nations is in a fog of debate and indecision on whether to appease or not to appease.

In expansion of my proposals of 2 months ago, I now propose certain principles and action.

First. The foundation of our national policies must be to preserve for the world this Western Hemisphere Gibraltar of western civilization.

Second. We can, without any measure of doubt, with our own air and naval forces, hold the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans with one frontier on Britain (if she wishes to cooperate), the other on Japan, Formosa, and the Philippines. We can hold open the sea lanes for our supplies. I devoutly hope a maximum of cooperation can be established between the British Commonwealth and ourselves.

Third. To do this we should arm our air and naval forces to the teeth. We have little need for large armies unless we are going to Europe or China. We should give Japan her independence and aid her in arms to defend herself. We should stiffen the defenses of our Pacific frontier in Formosa and the Philippines. We can protect this island chain by our sea and air power.

Fourth. We could, after initial outlays for more air and Navy equipment, greatly reduce our expenditures, balance our budget, and free ourselves from the dangers of inflation and economic degeneration.

Fifth. If we toil and sacrifice as the President has asked, we can continue aid to the hungry of the world. Out of our productivity, we can give aid to other nations which they have already displayed spirit and strength in defense against communism. We have the stern duty to work and sacrifice to do it.

Sixth. We should have none of appeasement. Morally there is no appeasement of communism. Appeasement contains more dangers than Dunkerques. We want no more Tehrans and Yaltas. We can retrieve a battle, but we cannot retrieve an appeasement. We are grateful that President Truman has denounced such a course.

Seventh. We are not blind to the need to preserve western civilization on the Continent of Europe or to our cultural and religious ties to it. But the prime obligation of defense of western continental Europe rests upon the nations of Europe. The test is whether they have the spiritual force, the will, and acceptance of unity among them by their own volition. America cannot create their spiritual forces; we cannot buy them with money.

You can search all the history of mankind and there is no parallel to the effort and sacrifice we have made to elevate their spirit and to achieve their unity. To this date it has failed. Their minds are confused with fears and disunities. They exclude Spain, although she has the will and means to fight. They higgle with Germany, although she is their frontier. They vacillate in the belief that they are in little danger and the hope to avoid again being a theater of war. And Karl Marx has added to their confusions. They still suffer from battle shock. Their highly organized Communist parties are a menace we must not ignore.

In both World War I and World War II (including West Germany) they placed more than 250 trained and equipped combat divisions in the field within 60 days with strong air and naval forces. They have more manpower and more productive capacity today than in either one of those wars. To warrant our further aid they should show they have spiritual strength and unity to avail themselves of their own resources. But it must be far more than pacts, conferences, paper promises, and declarations. Today it must express itself in organized and equipped combat divisions of such huge numbers as would erect a sure dam against the Red flood. And that before we land another man or another dollar on their shores. Otherwise we shall be inviting another Korea. That would be a calamity to Europe as well as to us.

Our policy in this quarter of the world should be confined to a period of watchful waiting.

NATIONAL UNITY

There is a proper urge in all Americans for unity in troubled times. But unless unity is based on right principles and right action it is a vain and dangerous thing.

Honest difference of views and honest debate are not disunity. They are the vital process of policy making among freemen.

A right, a specific, an open foreign policy must be formulated which gives confidence in our own security before we can get behind it.

CONCLUSIONS

American eyes should now be opened to these hordes in Asia.

These policies I have suggested would be no isolationism. Indeed, they are the opposite. They would avoid rash involvement of our military forces in hopeless campaigns. They do not relieve us of working to our utmost. They would preserve a stronghold of Christian civilization in the world against any peradventure.

With the policies I have outlined, even without Europe, Americans have no reason for hysteria or loss of confidence in our security or our future. And in American security rests the future security of all mankind.

It would be an uneasy peace but we would carry it on with these policies indefinitely even if the Communists should attack our lines on the seas.

We can hope that in time the millions of other non-Communist peoples of the world will rise to their dangers.

We can hope that sometimes the evils of communism and the disintegration of their racial controls will bring their own disintegration. It is a remote consolation, but twice before in world history Asiatic hordes have swept over a large part of the world and their racial dissentions dissolved their empires.

Our people have braved difficult and distressing situations in these three centuries we have been on this continent. We have faced our troubles without fear and we have not failed.

We shall not fail in this, even if we have to stand alone. But we need to realize the whole truth and gird ourselves for troubled times. The truth is ugly. We face it with prayer and courage.

Mr. KEM subsequently said: Mr. President, I am glad the minority leader has placed in the body of the RECORD the address delivered by former President Herbert Hoover last evening on our national policies in this crisis. I hope every Member of the United States Senate will read and ponder these words that come from the heart of this great American.

In view of what has been said in the Senate recently—and well said—about the importance of national unity, I invite the particular attention of my colleagues to this paragraph of President Hoover's thought-provoking address:

There is a proper urge in all Americans for unity in troubled times. But unless unity is based on right principles and right action it is a vain and dangerous thing.

Honest difference of views and honest debate are not disunity. They are the vital process of policy making among free men.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the remarks I have just made may be placed in the RECORD after the speech delivered by former President Hoover appears in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RAILROAD TO ALASKA

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter I have written to Gen. George C. Marshall relating to the construction of a railroad through Canada to Alaska.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DECEMBER 19, 1950.

Hon. GEORGE C. MARSHALL,
Secretary of Defense,
Department of Defense,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR GENERAL MARSHALL: For some time I have been deeply interested in getting action started on the proposal to construct a through railroad to Alaska connecting with the existing American-Canadian Railroad systems and the Alaska Railroad.

Over a year ago Public Law 391, the Magnuson-Butler-Jackson bill was passed authorizing the President to carry on negotiations with Canada looking toward a survey and ultimate construction of this railroad. As I understand it, one meeting was held with Canadian representatives, but I do not believe much progress was made and apparently the project is not moving along at all.

Military events in Korea have revealed once again what a dangerous position we are in in the Pacific area, where Alaska is a key outpost. I cannot help but think what a terrible risk we are taking by having no dependable land transportation link with Alaska. At present the bulk of our military supplies to the Territory must go by boat, but our shipping to and from Alaska is almost completely controlled by Harry Bridges through the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union.

For several years I have devoted considerable time to a study of the activities of Bridges and his union, both in Hawaii and Alaska. In the event of a major conflict, I am absolutely convinced that Bridges would not hesitate to call repeated strikes and engage in similar maneuvers for the deliberate purpose of stopping shipments of military necessities and sabotaging our defense effort. Under such circumstances I believe we might desperately want a rail link with Alaska.

Since the negotiations with Canada do not seem to be making much progress I am writing to ask if the Department of Defense might not at this time wish to get behind the project a little more strongly than in the past and develop a definite proposal for congressional consideration during the coming session of Congress. I understand that the Department is now engaged in reviewing the entire defense picture with a view to determining what changes in its program are necessary in the light of recent developments. During the course of that consideration I hope that the proposed Alaska rail link may be advanced to a high priority level.

Your views on this proposal in the light of the current situation will be very deeply appreciated.

Yours very sincerely,

HUGH BUTLER,
United States Senator, Nebraska.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE FISCAL YEAR ENDING JUNE 30, 1951

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the executive session, and after returning to legislative session, the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9920) making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, and for other purposes.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—I should like to ask the distinguished junior Senator from Georgia whether, if the request of the Senator from Tennessee is granted, the Senator from Georgia will ask that the supplemental appropriation bill be temporarily laid aside so that the Senate may consider the so-called military public works bill.

Mr. RUSSELL. I have not had an opportunity to discuss the subject with the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I intend to discuss it with him as soon as it is possible to do so.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I have no objection to making the supplemental appropriations bill the unfinished business of the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator from Nebraska.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the supplemental appropriation bill will be taken up at the conclusion of the executive session.

NOMINATION OF ANNA M. ROSENBERG

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, speaking on the nomination of Mrs. Anna M. Rosenberg, to be Assistant Secretary of Defense, I wish to say that I endorse the nomination unqualifiedly. I have known Mrs. Rosenberg for about 10 years, and during that period of time I had the pleasure of serving with her on the New York State War Council. I became acquainted with her great capacity to handle big problems and to handle human beings. I know of no person in this country who is better qualified to undertake problems dealing with personnel and manpower than is Mrs. Rosenberg. I feel certain that she will meet with great success in her new assignment. I want to make that statement publicly at this time and to wish her well in her big undertaking and great responsibility.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the body of the RECORD at this point a statement prepared by the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] in behalf of Mrs. Rosenberg's confirmation. The Senator from Washington, as I believe is generally known, is ill and is unable to be present. He is a member of the Committee on Armed Services, and he has requested me to place his statement in the RECORD.

There being no objection, Mr. CAIN's statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR CAIN

Had the appointment been mine to make I would not have selected to be Assistant Secretary of Defense an individual who was (a) foreign born, (b) a woman, and (c) a member of a minority group. I would have searched for a person against whom prejudice and suspicion would not so easily run.

The selection, however, was not for me to make. As a member of the Armed Services Committee and of the Senate it became my responsibility to examine the nominee's capacity, knowledge, and loyalty. I undertook this task in all seriousness, because from the moment the appointment was announced I was keenly conscious of how controversial the nominee's background made her, and I was disposed to support no person for the vital post of Assistant Secretary of Defense handling manpower who was not proven to be possessed of unusual abilities and the highest devotion to my country.

That Mrs. Rosenberg is an authority on manpower problems, and is a person of large capacity was established before the committee by several score of witnesses who are recognized as being outstanding authorities on the question of competence. If Mrs. Rosenberg does not know her business, or if she is a mental dud, she has completely fooled many of the best brains in this country over a period of years. From the hundreds who wrote or called the committee concerning Mrs. Rosenberg's knowledge and ability not a single one, so far as I recall, offered a negative criticism in these fields. It is important in voting for Mrs. Rosenberg to believe that she is among the foremost in manpower management. I do so believe.

Allegations were made to the committee that Mrs. Rosenberg had been associated some years ago with un-American activities, and was or had been a member of Communist-front organizations. The committee was determined to get at the truth involved in these highly serious charges. Every American ought to read every word of the committee hearings. Should an American after reading these hearings conclude that Mrs. Rosenberg is a disloyal person that reader will be in disagreement with each of the 13 committee members, each of whom would strenuously fight against confirming anyone, for any post, whose loyalty was in doubt. The committee voted unanimously for Mrs. Rosenberg because it became convinced that her loyalty to the United States and its free institutions was not in doubt If Mrs. Rosenberg is disloyal, then 13 committee members, both Democrats and Republicans, are disloyal and very stupid.

The committee hearings caused me some anxiety and deep concern but not because of Mrs. Rosenberg. Among the chief witnesses were some who sought to inflict deep injury to Mrs. Rosenberg, and further divide the Nation by giving false testimony under oath. Others promiscuously accused Mrs. Rosenberg of disloyalty without offering a scrap of supporting evidence. One or more told the committee they had never seen and did not know Mrs. Rosenberg, yet I know that they tried to influence, and were partly successful, prominent commentators and columnists to tell the country that Mrs. Rosenberg was subversive in every way. These witnesses called themselves men, but they were cowardly, dishonest, and traitorous in their conduct and testimony before the committee. I have urged the committee to seek to prefer perjury charges against these individuals. I hope it does and that those referred to will be fined and imprisoned. This result would be good for the Senate committee, Mrs. Rosenberg and the Nation.

I do not know that Mrs. Rosenberg will make a success of her job, but I feel keenly that she is qualified to try. The Secretary of Defense selected her and believes her to be qualified. Noted industrialists in all sections of the land certify that Mrs. Rosenberg knows as much about the problems of manpower as anyone. All of these men and the Armed Services Committee state publicly that Mrs. Rosenberg is a loyal and patriotic American. What more should a person have to be entitled to confirmation?

I believe that the Senate ought to confirm Mrs. Rosenberg, but more than that is required. Much of Mrs. Rosenberg's effectiveness has clearly been destroyed. Unfounded and unsupported charges against her have been accepted by many Americans as being true. The Senate ought to do all it can to restore Mrs. Rosenberg's effectiveness. The committee hearings ought to be made public, and Senators ought through statements to tell everybody what Mrs. Rosenberg is not, as well as what she is. Her success is of importance to every American. She must not be permitted to be ineffective or to fail because people generally have not been told who she really is and what she can really accomplish for the good of us all. Committee members are the ones most qualified to talk of these things.

On the assumption that Mrs. Rosenberg is to be confirmed by the Senate I would conclude that there is something striking and promising about the appointment. It means to me that, if my country finds it necessary fully to mobilize, we shall go about that task in a full way. Aside from the fundamental question of loyalty we shall only be concerned with what a person can do, and no longer concerned with who is this person and where does he or she come from. Mrs. Rosenberg is some of those things which in the past have not qualified a person for authority and influence in a man's world. If she gets away with her monumental undertaking it will mean that others of like backgrounds will be given a chance to serve America.

For us to conquer the deep seated trouble of the present, for us to have a real chance to live tomorrow, it will be imperative for every American to stand by and offer his abilities. It will be just an imperative that these abilities be made use of without regard to race, or place of birth, or sex. Mrs. Rosenberg's appointment is actually an experiment. For the good of the Nation I pray that it works.

PERSONAL STATEMENT BY SENATOR LANGER

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I want the RECORD to show that last evening I voted against confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Wilson. Because there may not be a yea-and-nay vote today on the nomination of Mrs. Anna M. Rosenberg, of New York, I want the RECORD to show that if there were a yea-and-nay vote I would vote against her nomination.

I wish the RECORD further to show that if there were a yea-and-nay vote on the nomination of Stephen Spingarn, of New York, I would also vote against his nomination.

I call attention to the fact that if the nomination of Mr. Spingarn is confirmed, the Federal Trade Commission will have honored five members from the State of New York. I further call the attention of the Senate to the fact that for 61 years no person has been appointed from the State of North Dakota to any single policy-making group, as the head of any Department, as a member of the Cabinet, as an Ambassador, or as a consul.

IMPORTANCE OF FULL REPORT ON MEETING OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC PACT NATIONS

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, our Secretary of State has just returned from a meeting with appropriate representatives of the North Atlantic Pact nations. His remarks to the press; upon his arrival home, were that the meeting was a success and that the cause of peace has been advanced.

It is to be hoped that an adequate disclosure on this meeting will be forthcoming to the Senate within a reasonable time. We must know the extent of any commitments made in behalf of the United States, and we must have an opportunity to weigh those commitments in the manner prescribed by law. While we fully appreciate the security requirements which govern such disclosure, we must be in a position to protect the public interest in these most critical times. Confidence of the public can be earned only by guaranteeing the representation of its interests in policies the fulfillment of which must be borne by the public.

NOMINATION OF STEPHEN J. SPINGARN

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, last night I spoke in support of the nomination of Mrs. Anna M. Rosenberg. I should like now to say a few words about the nomination of Mr. Stephen J. Spingarn to be a member of the Federal Trade Commission. I have known Mr. Spingarn officially through contacts I had with him in his position as general legislative assistant to the President. I understand that he has a record of 16 years of devoted public service. He is what we call a career man. As such, his nomination seems to me to be a most happy and satisfactory one.

I have read the record of Mr. Spingarn's testimony before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. That testimony impressed me as being that of a man who is highly knowledgeable, alert, and extremely well informed on the broad economic problems that will face him as a member of the Federal Trade Commission. At the same time his mind is open on several of the most controversial and complex problems now before the Federal Trade Commission. He showed a grasp of these problems without any prejudice regarding their solution. I can think of no better approach for a new member of this Commission.

A nominee for a high post should certainly not be judged on the basis of his family connections. But I cannot refrain from stating that I have known Mr. Spingarn's family for four generations. The name is an eminently honorable one in the annals of my State—honored not only for integrity of character and civic leadership but also for many contributions to the public good and for unselfish devotion to the cause of human betterment.

From what I know of Mr. Spingarn he is a young man in the tradition of his family. I can give him no finer tribute. I know that the Senate will confirm this nomination.

I wish to be recorded not only in support but also in praise of the President's action in making this designation.

CONGRESSIONAL IMMUNITY

Mr. HUNT. Mr. President, last August before the adjournment of Congress I introduced two measures in the Senate. They were appropriately referred, but no action was taken upon them. I do not like to see the Eighty-first Congress adjourn without expressing myself with reference to those two measures. They deal with the immunity enjoyed by Members of Congress.

Article 1, section 6, of our Constitution, gives to Members of Congress the privilege to make defamatory, smearing statements, and to practice demagoguery with complete immunity from laws applied to all other citizens of our country.

This unusual special privilege was placed in the Constitution by the founding fathers with apparently little or no discussion or debate, it having been lifted almost in identical form from the English law:

> For any speech or debate in either House they shall not be questioned in any other place.

We must remember that the Constitutional convention was only shortly removed from English rule. The Members of the convention were cognizant of and alert to the inherent danger which lies in control of legislative bodies by the executive, then known as the King. So our doctrine of legislative immunity from arrest for any cause, except treason, felony, or breach of the peace and from questioning in any other place for speeches and debates in either House was promulgated in England as a necessary protection, not from the people represented in the Parliament, but from the executive crown. The Parliament in session must be allowed to criticize the King without fear of retaliation in the form of arrest or civil suits. If not, the democratic processes in England would fail. Therefore, it was plainly and definitely the intention of the Parliament to seek protection not from their constituents, but from the King.

This doctrine was embodied completely in the Constitution of the United States and in the constitutions of our several States, and there it remains today. In a long list of court cases growing out of abuse of this privilege, immunity from arrest is well established by a series of decisions, all of which are clear and concise with reference to immunity enjoyed. Unfortunately many recent decisions have expanded the coverage of this immunity to other government administrative and quasi judicial personnel. The courts have ruled that a Cabinet officer acting within the scope of his duty may issue public statements derogratory to the character of individual citizens with absolute immunity.

Most Members of Congress, and certainly all of our constituents, would be surprised, amazed, and appalled if they knew and fully realized the extent to which this doctrine of privilege and immunity can be applied without equivalent precautions against abuse. Surely it was the intention of the framers of our Constitution that immunity should apply to words spoken in the Halls of Congress, but, as construed by our courts, immunity is applicable to speeches which are never made or uttered before the Congress but which can be written or adopted by Members of Congress as extensions of imaginary remarks and broadcast throughout the country in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The doctrine of immunity has been applied to committee reports and to testimony embraced in committee hearings.

During the days of the constitutional convention the power of the press was feeble as compared with the power of the press of today. Other means of dissemination of news was nonexistent, while today we have the great national and world-wide circulation of magazines, radio, and television. So, when I, as a Member of Congress, either knowingly or without intent to smear and injure, make an official statement derogatory to any person, the tactic pays off in three ways. First, it makes of me, as a Member of Congress, a man to be feared; second, it discredits my opponents, and in the third place it gives to me publicity, which in some cases may be my paramount objective. Words spoken by Members of Congress, and especially on the floor of the United States Senate, carry great weight and are still, I think, accepted by the people as statements of truth from authoritative sources. They are universally accepted as facts. Therefore, so long as our Constitution carries this clause, Members in either body of this or any other Congress may make unfounded and unsubstantiated charges against named individuals, and every American citizen is in acute danger of losing his constitutional right to defend himself.

The Congress, in each and every law passed, has a fundamental purpose, namely, protection of some right or privilege of one, some, or all citizens. Surely the protection of the guaranteed rights of the citizens under the Constitution is the primary function of this body.

If situations should confront us when we of the Congress are no longer able to control our own Members by the rules of society, justice, and fair play, then we must take drastic steps to control them, steps which will take away our right to immunity, and by doing so reestablish the right of fair trial and opportunity of defense on the part of the individual citizen.

The irony of the situation lies in the fact that we, of the Congress, who are elected for the prime purpose of protecting our constituents, while allowing to remain in the Constitution that provision which gives us the privilege to attack our constituents and seek cover under the cloak of immunity, at the same time retain rules of the Senate which make it impossible to attack each other, thus affording ourselves protection we will not grant to the people.

So I repeat, the right of each and every American citizen of self defense may be violated by Members of Congress who are elected to defend these very rights.

Newspapers carry banner headlines of our accusations, radios blare them, accusations, whether true or false, are constantly battered into the minds of the people.

But what of the accused? His voice is the voice of one crying in the wilderness, a voice unable to make himself heard because of constitutional immunity, because of article 1, section 6, of the Constitution.

I repeat, this was not the intention of the founding fathers. Their intention was to keep the legislator on the job, and to protect him from harassment of civil suit. They unquestionably did not intend to aid and abet him in the violation of democratic rights of the citizens which had been established only after centuries of struggle.

This problem of immunity, of freedom from questioning, must be solved. Therefore I have offered in the Senate a joint resolution to repeal that part of section 6 of article I of the Constitution which reads:

> And for any speech or debate in either House they shall not be questioned in any other place.

This joint resolution may be considered by some Members of Congress to be harsh. They will question the advisability of lifting this congressional shield, and thereby making Members of the Congress legally responsible and legally reliable for their words and actions. To my way of thinking, however, the time has arrived when the American citizen wishes no longer to tolerate such high-handed, irresponsible actions, and no longer to permit himself to be deprived by congressional action of his reputation, of his position, of his home, and have his family injured without the right to defend himself. We have placed the citizens of this country in the position of not being informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, of not being confronted by the witnesses against them, of not being able to obtain witnesses in their favor, and of not being able to have the assistance of counsel for their defense.

All too long Congress, if not in law in actuality, has placed Mr. John Q. Citizen, our constituent, if you please, Mr. President in double jeopardy. He is tried in committee and subcommittee, in the newspapers and on the radio. Then if an iota of evidence is found upon which a legal action may be based he is again tried in a court of law.

In event my colleagues do not see the wisdom of removing this special privilege which we enjoy, and pursuing further the possibility, should we continue to be immune, of devising some method which will not require citizens of the United States to suffer by our deeds without a remedy, I have introduced legislation which will parallel the development of Government liability to suit upon contracts and for torts. Originally the Government could not be sued upon any grounds whatsoever—"The king could do no wrong." Later it was recognized that this was unjust, and Government by an act of Congress, has consented to be sued upon contracts.

The extension of governmental liabilities is based upon the sound ground that where the conduct of a governmental business involves a loss to a citizen, such as when the driver of a Government motor vehicle inexcusably wrecks a citizen's car, the loss should be borne as a cost of Government, and therefore the injury or loss is borne as a cost of Government so that the whole people, not the individual damaged, bear the cost.

The application of this doctrine to congressional immunity is clear. It is something which has been suggested recently by two members of the New York bar, both graduates of the University of Cornell and the Yale Law School. Thus the remedy would be for Congress to pass an act permitting a party so injured to sue the United States Government for defamatory statements for which, if it were not for congressional immunity, he could obtain redress by law.

The great advantage of such an act would be the financial reparation made to the individual libeled. An unjust charge, for example, of communistic leanings, can cause a person great financial harm—perhaps the total loss of job and job opportunities. The problem of extending damages resulting from congressional libel is the same as in all other libel cases.

A sum of money, however, can never completely compensate a person for a lost reputation, but the very fact of winning a judgment would help to restore his reputation. A citizen asking employment after being libeled by a Member of Congress could show a prospective employer the judgment vindicating him. While the newspapers and radio commentators would never play up the story of his being cleared by 12 good men, nevertheless it would be a news item within the community where the plaintiff lived, and the embarrassment of being proved wrong might supply the restraint now lacking for those very few who willfully promulgate libel.

The time to correct this unfair, unjust favor and privilege given to Members of Congress is long past due. Suggestions I have made will never compensate for the injuries suffered by all too many good citizens down through the years, but will prevent reoccurrence of such unhappy, unnecessary, and cruel situations.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for an observation?

Mr. HUNT. I decline to yield at the moment. I have practically concluded my statement.

Mr. President, I intend to reintroduce the two measures immediately after the Eighty-second Congress convenes. I expect at that time to press for action on one of the measures.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee desires to ask the Senator from Wyoming a question. There remains 1 minute before the time set for the vote.

The Senator from Wyoming is recognized.

Mr. HUNT. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I wish to compliment the Senator from Wyoming upon the work he has done on this very important matter, and I desire to associate myself with the general purpose he has in mind. The proposal of the Senator should be given careful and immediate consideration. Maintaining the prestige of Congress as well as fair treatment to the individual citizen requires legislation of this kind.

I wish to ask the Senator a question. If a plan such as the one here presented were adopted, would it to some extent, at least, have alleviated a great deal of the hard work the Senate Armed Services Committee has had to do in ferreting out and finally bringing to light the facts in regard to the improper and unjustified charges which were made against Mrs. Rosenberg? And let me say that I think Mrs. Rosenberg a most capable woman; I know she will make a splendid Assistant Secretary of Defense, and I regret exceedingly that she has had to go through such a dreadful humiliation which was inspired by evil design. Would not the Senator's proposal at least make such a smear more unlikely?

Mr. HUNT. I should like to say to the Senator from Tennessee that the hearings before the Armed Services Committee upon the Anna M. Rosenberg nomination primarily prompted me to deliver these remarks today, although, as I have said, they are long overdue and should have been made long ago.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE—NOMINATION OF ANNA M. ROSENBERG

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, the time has expired; and the Senate is to vote now on the nomination of Mrs. Anna M. Rosenberg, of New York, to be Assistant Secretary of Defense.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes to make an explanation of the report made by the Armed Services Committee respecting the pending nomination.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to postponing for 2 minutes the time for voting on the nomination? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Virginia is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, on December 19, on behalf of the Armed Services Committee, the Senator from Virginia made a unanimous report from the committee, recommending confirmation of the nomination of Anna M. Rosenberg to be Assistant Secretary of Defense. This is the second time the Committee on Armed Services has unanimously recommended the confirmation of this nomination.

I have been a Member of the Senate for 18 years. I have never participated in an investigation of charges made against a nominee whose nomination was before the Senate that was conducted with greater diligence or more searchingly than was this investigation of the charges made against Anna M. Rosenberg. Not only did the committee hear every witness who desired to be heard, but we even investigated rumors, by subpenaing those who were supposed to have made statements critical of Mrs. Rosenberg. Twenty-five hours were consumed in the hearings, and 1,053 pages of testimony were taken.

The result was that the committee has unanimously reported to the Senate that there is not one scintilla of evidence to support the charge that Mrs. Rosenberg at any time was sympathetic to communism or was a Communist.

Mr. President, as chairman of a subcommittee, I wish to state that the President of the United States permitted the subcommittee, composed of myself, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. HUNT], and the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN], to inspect the files of the FBI. Not a single criticism of Mrs. Rosenberg's loyalty to the country was contained in those files. To the contrary, there was much commendation.

Mr. President, the suggestion of nomination was made personally to the President by Secretary of Defense Marshall, as is shown in the report. There are in the files and in the hearings letters from General Eisenhower, Secretary Stuart Symington, Mr. Baruch, James F. Byrnes, Colonel Hobby, Robert P. Patterson, General Smith, and many others, testifying as to Mrs. Rosenberg's loyalty and efficiency.

I wish to read the concluding portion of the committee report, comprising the committee's findings and recommendation:

COMMITTEE FINDINGS

After a thorough and meticulous investigation of all the charges made, it is the unanimous opinion of the members of the Armed Services Committee that evidence has not been submitted to support the charges against the nominee. Furthermore, it is the unanimous opinion of the committee that the nominee is qualified to fill the position to which she has been appointed.

RECOMMENDATION

It is the unanimous recommendation of all members of the Armed Services Committee that the Senate confirm the nomination of Anna M. Rosenberg to be Assistant Secretary of Defense.

Mr. President, I ask that the entire report be printed at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the report (Ex. Rept. No. 16) was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Committee on Armed Services, to whom was referred the nomination of Anna M. Rosenberg to be Assistant Secretary of Defense, a position to which she was appointed during the last recess of the Senate, having considered the same, submit the following report to accompany said nomination reported to the Senate on November 30, 1950.

It is unusual for committees of the Senate in submitting recommendations with respect to Presidential nominations for confirmation to file a written report with the Senate. However, because of unusual circumstances surrounding the Armed Services Committee's consideration of the nomination of Anna M. Rosenberg to be Assistant Secretary of Defense, and the grave charges made against the nominee, the committee at the conclusion of the recent hearings in the case voted to file a report with the Senate.

ORIGINAL RECOMMENDATION FOR CONFIRMATION

The nomination of Anna M. Rosenberg to be Assistant Secretary of Defense, a position to which she was appointed during the recent recess of the Congress, was referred to the Armed Services Committee on November 27, 1950. On November 29, Mrs. Rosenberg was requested to appear before the committee. She testified under oath relative to her qualifications for the position to which she was appointed, her business connections, alleged membership in disloyal and subversive groups, and other pertinent information. At the conclusion of this hearing the nine members of the committee present voted unanimously to recommend her confirmation to the Senate. A printed record of the testimony of this hearing has been made available for Members of the Senate and general distribution.

CHARGES AGAINST NOMINEE

Shortly thereafter some members of the committee received oral and written statements to the effect that named witnesses could be produced who would swear that Mrs. Rosenberg had been a member of a Communist-front organization, was considered to be a member of the Communist Party, and had assisted in placing Communists in high Government positions.

COMMITTEE INVESTIGATION

The committee met on December 5 to consider these grave charges against the nominee. Subpenas were issued for those persons who were purported to have knowledge of these allegations. The committee held six sessions, each of 3- to 4-hour duration, to hear all witnesses who might have knowledge of any disloyal activities of the nominee. The record of these hearings consists of 1,053 pages of transcribed testimony. The attendance of the committee members at these hearings was excellent, and at no time during the presentation of evidence were there less than seven members present.

One witness, Ralph De Sola, testified that he, of his own knowledge, knew Anna M. Rosenberg to be a member of the John Reed Club in either 1934 or 1935, a known Communist-front organization, while he was also a member. He stated that he saw her at four or five meetings of the club and was introduced and talked to her on one occasion. De Sola stated that he recognized the nominee from pictures and from personal observation to be the same person that he met at a meeting of the John Reed Club in 1935. The person named by De Sola as introducing him to Mrs. Rosenberg did not only fail to corroborate De Sola's testimony but stated that he had never attended a meeting of the John Reed Club and did not know the nominee. Others named by De Sola as prominent in the John Reed Club at that time likewise had no knowledge of Mrs. Rosenberg's membership or attendance at meetings of the club. De Sola further testified that he had in 1937 turned over to an agent of the Federal Bureau of Investigation named George Starr information concerning Mrs. Rosenberg's membership in the John Reed Club and other Communist activities in which she has participated. George Starr in testifying before the committee recalled talking with De Sola but did not recall any mention of Anna M. Rosenberg. He further stated that had De Sola transmitted to him information relative to Anna M. Rosenberg's connection with Communist activities, such information would have been transmitted to the Federal Bureau of Investigation for inclusion in the Rosenberg file.

At the request of the committee, and by direction of the President, the complete FBI files on Anna M. Rosenberg were inspected by a subcommittee of the Armed Services Committee, consisting of Senators BYRD, HUNT, and CAIN. Each subcommittee member indicated that after a thorough reading of the file there was nothing therein to substantiate De Sola's statement or to indicate in any way that Mrs. Rosenberg was a disloyal person.

Other charges of disloyalty to her country brought to the attention of the committee have all been thoroughly investigated with the conclusion that there is no evidence to support the charges.

The transcribed testimony of the witnesses before the committee relative to the nomination of Anna M. Rosenberg has been printed and made available for distribution.

As of December 19, after the completion of hearings, the committee was advised by the Federal Bureau of Investigation that their agents have located an Anna Rosenberg who was associated with the John Reed Club in New York City in the early 1930's. This woman, whose maiden name was Anna Rosenberg, admits to the FBI agents that she was associated with the John Reed Club in New York City from shortly after its founding until 1934, when she moved to California, and that she knew of no other Anna Rosenberg who was associated with the John Reed Club.

QUALIFICATIONS OF THE NOMINEE

Practically the entire working part of Mrs. Rosenberg's life has been spent in personnel, labor-relations, and manpower work. Until her appointment as Assistant Secretary of Defense she was engaged in this type of business in New York, having several responsible and well-known clients. She has also served the Government on many important boards and commissions.

Mrs. Rosenberg was personal representative of President Roosevelt in 1944 and of President Truman in 1945 to study military manpower problems in the European theater. From 1942 to 1945 she was secretary of the President's Labor Victory Board. Further, she was a member of the Advisory Board of the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion from 1944 to 1947. She was a member of the Manpower Consulting Committee of the Army and Navy Munitions Board. She was a member of the President's Advisory Commission on Universal Training and allied matters connected with national defense. During the war Governor Lehman appointed her a member of the New York State War Council and Governor Dewey continued her appointment.

Until recently Mrs. Rosenberg was a member of the Committee on Mobilization Policy of the National Security Resources Board and a special manpower consultant to the Chairman of that Board, Mr. W. Stuart Symington.

At the time of the original hearing on the nomination of Mrs. Rosenberg, General Marshall sent the following telegram to the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee:

"Lovett informs me your committee asked him the circumstances surrounding Mrs. Rosenberg's appointment as Assistant Secretary of Defense. I want you to know that I personally thought of her and selected her for the position without suggestion, or recommendation, or consultation from anyone. I advised no one, other than Lovett and Mrs. Rosenberg, of my selection until I talked to the President on election day.

"G. C. MARSHALL,
"Secretary of Defense."

Since the appointment was made the committee has received messages of unqualified support of the nominee from General Eisenhower, Secretary Stuart Symington, Mr. Bernard M. Baruch, Hon. James F. Byrnes, Col. Oveta Culp Hobby, Hon. Robert P. Patterson, Gen. Bedell Smith, and numerous others. The committee received over 1,000 messages for and against the nominee. It is significant to note that all the messages indicating personal knowledge of Mrs. Rosenberg and her work voice approval of the nomination.

COMMITTEE FINDINGS

After a thorough and meticulous investigation of all the charges made it is the unanimous opinion of the members of the Armed Services Committee that evidence has not been submitted to support the charges against the nominee. Furthermore, it is the unanimous opinion of the committee that the nominee is qualified to fill the position to which she has been appointed.

RECOMMENDATION

It is the unanimous recommendation of all members of the Armed Services Committee that the Senate confirm the nomination of Anna M. Rosenberg to be Assistant Secretary of Defense.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of Anna M. Rosenberg, of New York, to be Assistant Secretary of Defense?

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may insert at this point in the RECORD a statement in regard to Mrs. Rosenberg.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the statement will be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The statement submitted by Mr. BENTON is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR BENTON

Mr. President, it would not be fitting for me to permit Mrs. Rosenberg's name to come before the Senate for confirmation without speaking briefly. I have known her more intimately and have seen her far more frequently than has any other Member of Congress.

In the hearings before the Committee on Armed Services, she has been through what she calls an "ordeal." I shall not now try to draw any moral for the Senate from these hearings. There are many Members of the Senate far better qualified to do this. I hope they will do it. What we can learn applied to future hearings, I leave to my seniors to suggest. But I may say that I very much like one suggestion reported in the press: That public hearings of charges against the character of a nominee for office be given a preliminary screening by the committee staff, or in some other fashion, before they are thrown into the front page headlines and put under the kleig lights.

Mrs. Rosenberg is, of course, far better able to withstand false charges and vilification than are most appointees. The press and radio know her well. She has as large a group of influential and powerful friends as any private citizen in the United States.

I first met her in 1940. I was introduced to her by the chairman of one of our great corporations. He introduced her with the amazing statement, "Here is one of the half dozen most influential people of the United States." I thought I knew the country pretty well. It was my business. Yet I had never heard of her. Her alleged influence came out of the confidence she enjoyed of President Roosevelt, as well as Governor Lehman, Mayor LaGuardia, and many others of our great leaders with whom she worked intimately—and daily. Indeed, Mr. David Rockefeller, at the completion of his term as secretary to Mayor LaGuardia, told me that there was nobody in his judgment in whom the mayor had such implicit confidence.

Many who did not know Mrs. Rosenberg—at that time felt that her influence and her so-called power rested wholly upon these personal relationships. The fact that this is not true has now again been attested to by her choice by General Marshall—as it has previously by her selection on many key boards—and further by her amazing record of achievement in her own private business since the termination of the war.

I first worked with Mrs. Rosenberg in 1940 when we both served as consultants and advisors to Mr. Nelson Rockefeller. Five years later when he resigned as Assistant Secretary of State, he personally told me that without her guidance and counsel he could not have hoped to establish his great record in the field of Inter-American Affairs. Mrs. Rosenberg's firm in New York not only serves Mr. Nelson Rockefeller and other members of the Rockefeller family as clients, but serves Col. John Hay Whitney, the great firm of Lazard Freres, R. H. Macy & Co., and many other of America's great enterprises. I am proud of my own connections with her, which are numerous.

Now, what is the extraordinary quality about this immigrant girl—this girl born in Budapest who migrated to this country at the age 13 or 14—what is the extraordinary quality that makes her so influential year in and year out, and makes her list of clients the finest and most envied in the entire field of public and personal relations.

I once compared her to Mr. Jesse Jones, who for more than a decade so brilliantly served his country in post after post here in Washington. I worked closely with Secretary of Commerce Jones throughout the war years after he appointed me vice chairman of the original board of trustees of the Committee for Economic Development. Mr. Jones personally selected and approved the 45 or 50 original appointments to the group which established the Committee for Economic Development, a group that expanded into some seventy thousand by the end of the war. Mr. Clarence Francis, Chairman of the Board of General Foods, once told me that Jesse Jones was the finest judge of men he had ever seen. Mr. Jones' great administrative gifts grew, I came to believe, from what I shall call his intimate touch with reality. He had an uncanny talent for going to the real heart of a problem. He knew what people wanted. He knew what was actually in their minds regardless of what they said. He knew where the dangers and risks lay. He knew how to use incentives and rewards.

This keen sense of reality is the distinguishing quality which Mrs. Rosenberg's rich clients are willing to pay heavily to get. Mr. Jones has used his talent for himself, and for his country. Mrs. Rosenberg has used hers for her friends and clients and for her country which she loves with an unrivalled passion.

I once said of Mrs. Rosenberg that "She has a genius for candor." But candor is not one of the gods real gifts—unless it is keyed to a keen and unwavering sense of reality

I do not say that Mrs. Rosenberg is the most remarkable woman that I have ever known. I have known remarkable women who shall be nameless on the floor of the Senate—and elsewhere.

But I say unequivocally that Mrs. Anna M. Rosenberg is the most extraordinary human being that I have ever known and that her gifts are unique.

Mr. President, these gifts are today greatly needed by the American people here in our Government in Washington. General Marshall is to be congratulated on bringing them to the service of the people. General Marshall's great prestige makes it difficult for his subordinates to talk up to him. I worked under him for almost a year as Assistant Secretary of State and later served under him, while he was still Secretary of State, as chairman of two United States delegations at international conferences. General Marshall is an avid listener; he is a skilled questioner; but it is not easy for his subordinates, against his great experience and background, to hammer their way into his office and to deliver themselves in a few minutes of opinions and experiences which may have taken months to form. This must be even more true in the Department of Defense where General Marshall served for more than 40 years and where he has forgotten much more than most of his subordinates will ever learn. It is not easy for any executive to find subordinates who can and will speak up, and I ask the Senate to imagine General Marshall's problems in the Pentagon.

General Marshall's appointment of Mrs. Rosenberg shows his talent as an executive. He of course knows that her experience embracing labor management relations and manpower problems, over the past 17 years, is unrivalled by any man or woman anywhere. But he also senses his own need for fearless talk, for outside criticism, for candid and courageous appraisal all of this he will get from Mrs. Rosenberg. He knows she is better qualified for this role—not merely than anyone he can get—but than anybody, anywhere. Indeed, I know that she would never have accepted this appointment had she not herself seen this great need of the general's and properly appraised her own capacity to contribute to it.

This is not the first offer of high post that Mrs. Rosenberg has had in Washington. She has turned down higher. It is only due to the great crisis we face that she accepted this appointment at such personal sacrifice.

Mr. President, as with so many things—which turn out unexpectedly—I believe that this ordeal to which Mrs. Rosenberg has been subjected will prove to be a good thing for the country and a good thing for her and for General Marshall. There is, in these hearings, the operation of what I like to call the law of the opposite effect. This is one of my favorite laws and we see it operating all around us. These hearings were designed to besmirch Mrs. Rosenberg. Their effect is just the opposite. What the hearings have done is to bring to the attention of every single member of the Senate, and to the country as a whole, the remarkable record and background of our new Assistant Secretary of Defense, and her extraordinary qualifications for the job. The hearings have forced each and everyone of us to the realization that we have an extraordinary figure in the Defense Department fully capable to discharge the great responsibilities which are hers. Now that the Senate knows the background of this amazing woman, she will not lack defenders when the attacks mount around her. In her job she will be forced to do unpopular things. Yes, here is a dirty assignment. When she boldly makes the tough decisions, we of the Senate will not have to ask "Who is this Mrs. Rosenberg?" We shall know, and through knowing, we shall have confidence in the action taken. The country will know. And the country will have confidence.

Indeed, Mr. President, a day or two ago I jestingly asked Mrs. Rosenberg whether she had personally planned these hearings. I told her that I had always known that she was smart but I had never thought that anybody could be smart enough to come to Washington with a plan by which Representative RANKIN and Mr. Gerald K. Smith combined their forces in an attack upon him.

Mr. President, I congratulate the Committee on Armed Services on the patience and thoroughness with which it has conducted these unpleasant hearings. I congratulate the committee on the unanimity of its findings. In particular, I congratulate Senator CAIN for his sympathy and support—and I urge upon the Senate the immediate and unanimous approval of this recommendation from the committee on which we are now to vote.

The VICE PRES DENT. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of Anna M. Rosenberg, of New York, to be Assistant Secretary of Defense? [Putting the question.]

The nomination was confirmed.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next nomination on the Executive Calendar is that of Stephen J. Spingarn, of New York. The nomination will be read by the clerk.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Stephen J. Spingarn, of New York, to be a Federal Trade Commissioner.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to his nomination? [Putting the question.]

The nomination was confirmed.

DISPLACED PERSONS COMMISSION

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, do I correctly understand that now that these nominations have been confirmed, the Senate has returned to the consideration of legislative business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Executive Calendar has not been concluded.

The next nomination on the Executive Calendar will be stated.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of John W. Gibson, of Michigan, to be a member of the Displaced Persons Commission.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc.

NOMINATIONS IN THE ARMY, AIR FORCE, NAVY, AND MARINE CORPS

The VICE PRESIDENT. Inasmuch as there has been some consideration of taking an adjournment this week, the Chair suggests that consideration be given to notifying the President of the confirmations of nominations.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, while the Senate is in executive session, I report favorably, with a unanimous report from the Committee on Armed Services, sundry nominations in the Army, Air Force, Navy, and Marine Corps, extending from the grade of admiral or general down through the grade of lieutenant. The committee's report is unanimous on the part of both the Democratic and the Republican members of the committee.

Inasmuch as the printing bill in this case would amount to several hundred dollars, I suggest that there is precedent for considering the nominations at this time. No objections have been raised to them. I ask unanimous consent to that effect.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, let me ask the distinguished Senator from California whether included among the appointments are any of civilians, or are all the appointments in the military or armed services?

Mr. KNOWLAND. There are no civilian appointments; all of them are in the armed services, the military.

Mr. WHERRY. All of them are routine, are they?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Yes; and they are unanimously reported by the committee.

Mr. WHERRY. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc, without the necessity of having them printed in the RECORD.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be notified of all nominations heretofore approved by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the President will be notified in these cases.

SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS, 1951

The Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the unanimous consent agreement entered into earlier today House bill 9920 is the unfinished business.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9920) making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief statement in regard to the bill, so that the Senate will know what has been done by the Appropriations Committee.

The committee very largely accepted the House version of the bill, with the addition of two items. One is the stockpiling item, involving an amount of $1,800,000,000. The other is the atomic-energy item. The two items together constitute a difference, as compared with the amount carried in the House version of the bill, of a little more than $2,000,000,000.

That is all I wish to say.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be read for amendment, and that the amendments of the Senate Appropriations Committee be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the practice which has long been in existence, the committee amendments are to be read and considered first.

MILITARY AND NAVAL CONSTRUCTION

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, from the Senate Committee on Armed Services, I report favorably the bill H. R. 9893 and I submit a report (No. 2687) thereon. I desire to make a very brief statement.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Is this the military construction bill?

Mr. RUSSELL. It is.

Mr. WHERRY. In order that we may be able to plan our program here, may I ask the Senator whether he intends to ask that the appropriation bill be temporarily laid aside and this measure be considered now?

Mr. RUSSELL. I do. I now state very briefly the reasons why I shall do that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the bill by title.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H. R. 9893) to authorize certain construction at military and naval installations, and for other purposes.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, in the second supplemental appropriations bill, which is now the pending business, there are contained a large number of items of appropriations for construction of certain public works which the Department of Defense says are essential to the defense of the United States. The bill passed the House and has been reported by the Senate Committee without having followed the customary method of authorizing these works by express statute. In other words, we have the cart before the horse. In an effort to get the horse before the cart, the Senate Committee on Armed Services this morning reported unanimously, and without amendment, the bill which passed the House on yesterday, giving statutory authorization for the construction of these works. The bill, in round figures, authorizes $1,600,000,000 worth of construction. There are contained in the appropriation bill appropriations for approximately $1,500,000 of that amount. In other words, more than 90 percent of the authorization is already contained in the appropriation bill which the Senator from Tennessee has made the unfinished business.

In the interest of regular parliamentary procedure, I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of H. R. 9893.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. WHERRY. Reserving the right to object—and I shall not object to the request—I am wondering whether the distinguished Senator would merely make another observation as to how passing this bill before the appropriation bill is passed may facilitate the entire procedure.

Mr. RUSSELL. It will certainly remove any doubt whatever as to the authority of the Department of Defense to proceed with these very necessary defense projects.

Mr. WHERRY. And that is the purpose of putting the authorization bill ahead of the appropriation bill, is it?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes; and also to maintain the regular procedure which has always obtained, in that authorizations are generally enacted by the Congress before appropriations are made to carry out an authorization that does not exist.

Mr. WHERRY. Let me ask the Senator this question: The Senator is a member of both the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Armed Services. Is it not a fact that if we pass the appropriation bill, we shall be appropriating a large sum of money, the authorization for some of which are carried in the bill of the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator is correct. As I stated, more than 90 percent of the authorization is carried in the appropriation bill.

Mr. WHERRY. So that they should really go together, but the authorization should come ahead of the appropriation, and that is the sole purpose. Is that correct?

Mr. RUSSELL. That is the only purpose.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I have no objection at all to the immediate consideration of the bill, and I thank the Senator from Georgia for his observations. Of course, we can argue the merits of the authorization, but in view of the fact that we are already appropriating, as the Senator from Georgia said, for 90 percent of the authorization, we may as well get the authorization in first.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Is it not a fact that what the Senator from Georgia is trying to do is to insure that each one of the projects shall go before the respective committees for authorization?

Mr. RUSSELL. That is a fact. Otherwise, the bill might be subject to a point of order. It would not be subject to a point of order in this case, because the House has already approved. But it certainly would be in the direction of orderly procedure to do what has been suggested.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I think the Senator is correct as to the problem as he has outlined it. I think the Senator from Georgia will agree with me that appropriating money without having the proper standing committee of the Senate being given an opportunity to study, pass on, and authorize or disapprove the various projects included is bad procedure. I think the Senator from Georgia agrees with that, and he is taking the only recourse which he can take consistently with getting us back again on the right track.

I should like to say further that so far as the Defense Establishment is concerned, I think, not only in the committee but on the floor of the Senate, the Defense Department and every other department wants to have due notice that in the future they shall proceed in an orderly way, and that the proper legislative committees of the Senate have a full opportunity to hear the evidence and study such a complex and substantial bill as is this one, without coming in for appropriations.

Mr. RUSSELL. Every standing committee of the Senate is very jealous of its powers, and properly so, to consider proposed legislation before appropriations are made.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President——

Mr. HUNT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield first to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia whether he thinks it advisable to take steps to change the law, which has been changed piecemeal, in war emergencies, so that the Defense Department cannot undertake this procedure in the future.

Mr. RUSSELL. I certainly want to exercise every possible precaution to protect the jurisdiction of the Senate Committee on Armed Services. That committee is composed of Senators who have been working intimately with the question of national defense, and I think every step should be taken to see that the Defense Establishment in the future does apprise the Senate Committee on Armed Services of plans and intentions in advance of going to the Committee on Appropriations. I say that as a member of the Committee on Appropriations and as one who is very proud of his membership on that committee. It is a procedure which has been followed throughout the course of the history of our country.

I now yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. HUNT. Mr. President, as I understand the chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, primarily the point he has in mind is that by allowing the appropriation bill to be acted upon before action is taken on the authorization bill we do not thereby establish a precedent which might be dangerous not only during wartime but also in peacetime.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator is correct. I wish to say that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] cooperated wholeheartedly with me in bringing this matter to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I hope the Senator will discuss fully the appropriations, as I understand this bill is being reported without amendment.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. So that the authorizations are the exact amounts approved by the House; is that a fact?

Mr. RUSSELL. That is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. I understand the authorization was $1,650,000,000. The reason why I am asking these questions is that there is no report accompanying the bill. Possibly the Senator had intended to give us all that information.

Mr. RUSSELL. The correct figure is $1,658,000,000.

Mr. WHERRY. My understanding is that in the supplemental appropriation bill the House approved an appropriation of $1,430,000,000 of the authorization. What I should like to have the distinguished Senator point out is that no doubt the House bill was strictly for military construction projects which were absolutely necessary, and I should like to have an explanation, if the Senator can give it, of the projects.

Mr. RUSSELL. I will say to the distinguished Senator that I cannot give the information down to the last dollar and cent, but I will say that most of the difference is in the completion of the projects which are started under the appropriations contained in the bill which is the unfinished business before the Senate. One of the reasons given by the Defense Establishment for not requesting the entire $1,658,000,000 was that they knew there would be another appropriation bill which would cover the difference between the $1,430,000,000 appropriated and the $1,658,000,000 authorized.

Mr. WHERRY. I have not had time to examine the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD this morning. Does the Senator know why the committee appropriated $1,430,000,000, and did not appropriate more? Was it because it was not asked for at that time?

Mr. RUSSELL. That is correct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senate will permit, the Chair desires to congratulate the Senate on its good attendance, but the Chair hopes it will not be denied the right to congratulate the Senate on its good order. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, in the absence of a report accompanying the bill, if the Senator from Georgia can give us the information I have suggested, I should appreciate it.

Mr. RUSSELL. Of course, that question would more properly arise on the consideration of the appropriation bill which appropriates the funds. But it is my understanding that the Defense Establishment did not ask for the money, because it did not feel it could be authorized or contracted for or expended before there would be another appropriation bill. The Committee on Appropriations, under the leadership of the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], has allowed in the bill every dollar which the Defense Establishment sought for military purposes. The Senator from Nebraska, being one of the ranking members of that committee, knows that to be the fact. There may be differences as to our foreign policy, but we have been united as one man in responding to every request of the Defense Establishment to provide for the men of America who are being summoned to the colors in this perilous period.

Mr. WHERRY. So if the House committee considered the bill at the time the Senate considered it, there probably would not be the difference between what was appropriated and what the authorization asked for.

Mr. RUSSELL. I think the difference would still be there. Very frequently Congress will authorize a great deal more than is requested in an appropriation bill because of the length of time covered by a contract.

Mr. WHERRY. Then there is no dispute in the findings of the Senate committee and the House committee.

Mr. RUSSELL. We have reported the House bill without amendment.

Mr. WHERRY. Is the entire authorization for military construction?

Mr. RUSSELL. It is all for military construction.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. My memory is not sufficiently clear, but I think that every project in the authorization bill has been started. There are three or four items which, as the Senator from Georgia has stated, are not appropriated for in full because the Military Establishment did not request the amount in full; but every item has been started.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator has stated the matter, as I understand it.

I now yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, at the beginning of his remarks the Senator said something about public works projects to be authorized. Now he mentions only military projects.

Mr. RUSSELL. If I used the term "public works," instead of "military public works," it was certainly an oversight on my part, because the bill refers only to military projects.

Mr. WATKINS. As a member of the Committee on Public Works, I do not remember that the committee received any communications with relation to such projects.

Mr. RUSSELL. I assure the Senator that the Committee on Armed Services is not in any way infringing upon the prerogatives of the Committee on Public Works. These are strictly military projects which come within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Armed Services.

Mr. WATKINS. I am not at all complaining of any infringement on the prerogatives of the Committee on Public Works. If there were any public-works projects involved, I merely wanted to get straight in my mind what they were. I am satisfied with the explanation of the Senator. I may have misunderstood his remarks with respect to public works.

Mr. RUSSELL. If I did not use the term "military public works" it was an omission on my part, because all the projects involved are military projects.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9893) to authorize certain construction at military and naval installations, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 9893) to authorize certain construction at military and naval installations, and for other purposes, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the report of the committee be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the report (No. 2687) was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Committee on Armed Services, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9893), to authorize certain construction at military and naval installations, and for other purposes, having considered the same, report favorably thereon without amendment and recommend that the bill do pass.

PURPOSE OF THE BILL

The purpose of this bill is to provide the authorization for the construction of facilities required by the Department of Defense and to authorize the appropriation of funds to carry out this construction at locations within and outside the continental limits of the United States. A major portion of the funds required for the construction authorized in this bill, is contained in the second supplemental appropriation bill, 1951 (H. R. 9920).

DISCUSSION OF THE BILL

On December 13, 1950, the President submitted to the Congress recommendations for the additional appropriation of funds for the Department of Defense totaling $16,844,247,000. Included in this amount is approximately $1,500,000,000 for new construction for the military services and for which this bill will provide the major part of the authorization.

The following paragraph is quoted from a letter from the Secretary of Defense to the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee dated December 19, 1950:

"You have inquired as to the emergent nature of the projects contained in the justifications submitted by the three military departments in support of S. 4257. The public-works construction which the Department of Defense seeks by S. 4257 is urgently needed at this time. The projects embraced by that bill are needed now in order to broaden the mobilization base of the Armed Forces so that they will be prepared readily to meet the requirements of any mobilization that may be dictated by the international situation. That international situation has already led to the proclamation by the President of the United States of the existence of a national emergency. Time is of the essence with respect to those projects. Accordingly, it is extremely important for this Department to secure at the earliest possible time authority for the construction of those projects."

The Army second supplemental construction program, titles I and IA of the bill, totals $390,896,900 for authorization. The program was assembled and based on the following principles:

(a) Current strategic requirements will be satisfied to the extent required at this time.

(b) Permanent facilities programmed will not exceed permanent requirements for forces in being on June 30, 1950.

(c) The total of new permanent and existing temporary and permanent facilities at an installation will not exceed emergency requirements.

(d) All existing mobilization-type facilities will be continued in use throughout the emergency and are not to be replaced with permanent construction.

The application of these principles has resulted in a program required by the expanded Army and which consists essentially of permanent construction. It accomplishes two main objectives: First and primarily, provision of long lead time construction items to improve our mobilization base; and, secondarily, provision of an additional increment of our permanent peacetime requirements, by proper location and selection of the facilities to be constructed.

Of the authorization being requested, $299,300,000 is for construction in the continental United States; $91,600,000 is for construction overseas and in Alaska.

The overseas portion consists of: $28,100,000 to continue the program for the deployment of the peacetime forces in Alaska, and to provide logistical supporting facilities there; $57,200,000 for vital facilities in other overseas areas; $4,400,000 for temporary construction in Japan; $900,000 for troop housing in Hawaii; $1,000,000 for the advance design of overseas projects.

The sum of $299,300,000 for the continental United States will provide for the following major categories of facilities: $50,000,000 for facilities for antiaircraft defense of the United States; $37,600,000 for facilities to speed up the research and development program; $37,300,000 for training facilities, including antiaircraft and guided-missile training, as well as specialized training in other fields; $3,800,000 for communications facilities; $13,100,000 for housing of 6,455 troops; $92,300,000 for increased warehouses and equipment maintenance shops, including $29,100,000 for a new signal depot in the east; $26,200,000 for a new finance administration center; $27,500,000 for certain classified activities, including the Armed Forces special-weapons project; $8,500,000 for certain industrial and port facilities and the Armed Forces Institute of Pathology; $3,000,000 for advance design.

This authorization includes 42 sets of family quarters at isolated stations in the continental United States for which funding is not planned at this time. Also included is authorization for 635 sets of quarters in Alaska for which appropriations are being sought in the second supplemental appropriations bill.

The second supplemental program was developed prior to the conditions that now exist in Korea. It, therefore, represents planning which may require some changes dependent on decisions that may be reached on national and international levels. For example, this program accents research and development and improvement of the Army logistic system. Only $13,100,000 is provided for troop housing in the United States. New plans may require a change in this emphasis. For that reason, the Army has asked for a degree of flexibility in the authorization act which is not normally accorded to peacetime programs. It needs the facilities provided for in this program, regardless of any changes in plans; however, new plans may bring into top urgency items not presently so considered.

A total of $319,750,000 is being sought in the second supplemental appropriations bill to support total authorizations of $390,896,900 contained in titles I and IA of this bill, H. R. 9893. It is anticipated that the total appropriation will be obligated during fiscal year 1951.

The Navy's request for authorization for public works in the 1951 second supplemental amounts to $381,655,310, of which $327,548,610 is for continental facilities and planning, and $54,106,700 is for overseas facilities and planning.

The Navy's public works proposal is based on requirements due to the situation in the Far East, the increase in forces afloat, the build-up of our two Marine Corps divisions to full strength, and certain emergency repairs. Projects presented for appropriations are of a deficiency nature, and can be placed under contract before the end of fiscal year 1951.

Requested funds will be applied to the following:

(a) Improvement of fleet-support activities in the western and central Pacific.

(b) Augmentation of the Marine Corps shore establishment.

(c) Airfield runways and facilities to provide safe operation for jet and long-range naval aircraft and for tactical and gunnery training.

(d) Expansion of communications facilities.

(e) Conversion of certain ordnance facilities in order to produce new and improved explosives.

(f) Construction of additional aviation gasoline and jet fuel bulk storage to bring up our reserve storage.

(g) Emergency repairs to certain naval shipyard installations.

Title II authorizes a total of 122 family quarters, all to be located at Inyokern, Calif., at a total cost of $2,017,880. The justification is as follows:

(a) The naval ordnance test station, Inyokern, is one of the important Bureau of Ordnance research stations and is the most important one engaged in research in the field of guided missiles. Lack of proper housing accommodations is the primary factor which most seriously affects the ability of the station to carry out its mission. Very little effective work can be obtained from employees, whose term of employment is from 6 to 8 months. Many new employees report on the station, spend a month or so getting cleared for secret material and being indoctrinated into their jobs, then fruitlessly wait on the housing list for 3 or 4 months, becoming more dissatisfied with barracks-type life all the time. They finally terminate after 6 or 8 months of employment when they find that it will be several years before they can expect to better their housing accommodations. This situation has been aggravated by the present emergency since some of those employees without any housing for their families or with housing which is inadequate, now feel that they had better seek employment elsewhere where conditions are better before they find themselves frozen in their jobs and unable to leave Inyokern.

The total Navy authorization of $381,655,310 has been funded to the extent of $303,378,000 in the second supplemental appropriation bill. It is anticipated that the entire sum will be obligated during fiscal year 1951.

The Air Force request for authorization in title III totals $885,604,000, of which $451,467,000 is in continental United States and $367,150,000 is outside continental United States.

A large percentage of Air Force facilities are of mobilization and "tar paper" (theater of operations) types of construction. In the last 5 years the facilities problem has been aggravated by the accelerating magnitude of demands imposed by new aircraft developments. Subsequent to World War II, public works have been limited.

To meet the facilities requirement generated by the scheduled limit activations and by the Air Force development plan, it is necessary that a vast Air Force construction program be embarked on at the earliest possible moment.

Stemming from the previously mentioned schedule of unit activations and operational requirements, a detailed study was undertaken to evolve a base-utilization program. In such a study as this the factors of force composition and time phasing become paramount. In arriving at the finalized base-utilization program certain basic concepts were employed. They are:

(a) Maximum use of existing facilities currently under Air Force jurisdiction.

(b) Maximum expansion of existing Air Force installations.

(c) Maximum use and expansion of all other facilities available.

In developing this construction program the Air Force has used certain standards of construction, as follows:

(a) Air Force permanent 25-year-life construction: This type of permanent construction will conform to normal competitive commercial standards, providing an economical life of approximately 25 years with normal maintenance. This permanent construction will be used at all bases of the 48-wing plan (July 1, 1950) and for facilities for the associated squadron fighter interceptor deployment bases.

(b) Air Force semipermanent 10-year-life construction: This type of construction will be built on on-grade slabs or masonery or concrete piers, with standard framing of floors and roof trusses. For the sake of economy, a prefabricated wood shell or frame or similar light construction with an economical life of approximately 10 years will be used. If these structures must later be continued in use, they can be made to compare favorably with Air Force permanent construction by adding standard weatherproof siding and roofing, finished floors, and completing interior sealing and trim. This semipermanent construction will be used at all bases other than those at which permanent construction will be employed.

(c) Air Force temporary 5-year-life construction: This is the World War II temporary "theater of operations" type construction with inadequate interior living and working conditions and without standard heating plants or sanitary facilities incorporated in the building. This program does not envision this type of construction. It will be resorted to only in the event of full mobilization or for strictly theater-of-operations construction.

Of the $885,604,000 authorization scheduled for acquisition and construction about $463,200,000 (or 52 percent) is allocated to facilities directly in support of Air Force operations. A further $133,800,000 is for training facilities within the United States.

For depots and logistical facilities the Air Force has scheduled $90,100,000, largely within the United States.

For communications facilities and navigational aids some $35,000,000 is programed of which more than three-fourths is in the overseas areas.

The sum of $22,800,000 is devoted to priority research, development, and test facilities; $20,400,000 for classified facilities, and $53,400,000 for other construction, of which $22,550,000 is for continental United States and $30,828,000 is for overseas.

In addition, the bill includes $67,000,000 additional authorization for an expansion of our land-based aircraft control and warning system.

Facilities to support Air Force operations are critically essential. These shortages are largely in the categories of airfield pavements, fuel-storage facilities, operational and aircraft-maintenance structures.

In this program there is scheduled $95,700,000 for airfield pavements, $82,300,000 for fuel storage and dispensing facilities, $182,900,000 for operational facilities (includes tactical air-control facilities) and plant for aircraft maintenance. Troop housing has been allocated $169,300,000, about 75 percent of which is within the United States. The only Air Force family housing in this bill is in the overseas areas, mainly in Alaska. For base support facilities, including utilities and grounds improvements, $141,900,000 has been scheduled.

Under prevailing conditions, it is readily understandable that situations may arise which will necessitate immediate construction which cannot await normal legislative action without seriously impairing our defense efforts. For that reason the committee has approved a general authorization for "and other construction"—$22,500,000 in continental United States, and $30,828,000 outside continental United States. However, the committee has imposed two restrictions: (1) The authorization shall not be construed as authorizing a separate Air Force Academy; (2) the Air Force will fully advise the committee before proceeding with any projects under the authorization.

The total Air Force authorization of $835,604,000 has been funded to the extent of $807,000,000 in the second supplemental appropriations bill.

The proposed legislation has the approval of the Bureau of the Budget and the Department of Defense, as is evidenced by the letter of the Assistant Secretary of Defense, which is hereby made a part of this report.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, D. C., December 12, 1950.

Hon. CARL VINSON,
Chairman, Committee on Armed Services, House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: There is forwarded herewith a draft of proposed legislation to authorize certain construction at military and naval installations, and for other purposes.

This proposed legislation is a part of the Department of Defense legislative program for 1950 and it has been approved by the Bureau of the Budget. The Department of Defense recommends that it be enacted by the Congress.

Purpose of the legislation: This proposal would authorize the Secretaries of the Army, Navy, and Air Force to construct public works urgently needed by the Department of Defense at this time. That need will become increasingly acute under the expanding military program dictated by the current international situation. It is contemplated that all of the projects covered by this authorization bill will be financed in whole or in part during fiscal year 1951 and funds so to finance those projects are being sought for inclusion in the second supplemental appropriation bill, 1950.

Legislative references: The last major public works bill for the Department of Defense is Public Law 564 of the Eighty-first Congress, approved June 17, 1950.

Cost and budget data: The total amount of authorization included in this proposal is $1,658,719,610, of which $390,896,900 (including $7,500,000 for the Armed Forces special-weapons project) is for the Department of the Army, $381,428,710 is for the Department of the Navy, and $886,394,000 is for the Department of the Air Force.

Sincerely yours,

MARX LEVA.

SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS, 1951

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9920) making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed to state the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the heading "Chapter I—Legislative branch," at the top of page 2, to insert:

ARCHITECT OF THE CAPITOL

CAPITOL BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS

For an additional amount for ' Building," $21,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Department of Commerce," on page 3, after line 18, to insert:

ACCESS ROADS (ACT OF SEPTEMBER 7, 1950)

For expenses necessary in carrying out the provisions of section 12 of the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1950, including $2,000,000 for payments of obligations incurred pursuant to the contract authorization granted by said section, to remain available until expended, $10,000,000, of which $2,000,000 shall be derived by transfer from the unexpended balance of funds heretofore appropriated for carrying out the provisions of section 6 of the Defense Highway Act of 1941 (55 Stat. 765).

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 4, to insert:

Senate Restaurants: For replacement of equipment, Senate Restaurant, Capitol Building, to be expended by the Architect of the Capitol under the supervision of the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration, without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Federal Security Agency," on page 8, after line 7, to insert:

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE

Grants for hospital construction: For an additional amount for construction grants under part C, title VI, of the Public Health Service Act, as amended, $75,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Chapter V—Department of the Interior," on page 9, after line 2, to strike out:

SOUTHEASTERN POWER ADMINISTRATION

CONSTRUCTION

For construction and acquisition of transmission lines, substations, and appurtenant facilities, and for administrative expenses connected therewith, in carrying out the provisions of section 5 of the Flood Control Act of 1944 (16 U. S. C. 825s), as applied to the southeastern power area, including purchase (not to exceed five) and hire of passenger motor vehicles, $1,850,000, to remain available until expended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Chapter VI—Independent offices—Atomic Energy Commission," on page 9, line 19, after the word "amount", to strike out "$840,000,000" and insert "$1,080,000,000"; and in line 22, after the word "exceed", to strike out "two hundred and fifty" and insert "five hundred and fifty."

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, with reference to the Atomic Energy Commission, I should like to ask for some explanation as to why the Commission needs 550 passenger vehicles.

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not hear the Senator's question.

Mr. LANGER. On page 9, in connection with the Atomic Energy Commission, why is it necessary to provide 550 automobiles?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Wyoming had charge of that phase of the bill. I ask that he be permitted to answer the question of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I shall be very glad to explain the reason for the amendment. The Atomic Energy Commission presented persuasive evidence of the fact that busses are needed and used to transport workers from their homes to the various plants at which they work. The use of busses is a timesaver and money saver. The use of passenger vehicles is required in order to make certain in the construction of new projects—and new projects are to be constructed—that management officials will reach speedily the various parts of the projects. The committee was quite convinced that this increase was essential as a money saver. I should like to call attention to the fact that the budget estimate had placed no limitation upon the number of cars to be furnished, but the committee placed a limitation of 550, after having very thoroughly examined the witnesses of the Atomic Energy Commission.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. LANGER. I notice that the House passed the bill with a limitation of 250 cars, and the Senate committee changed the limitation to 550.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes; we added 300 cars because we were convinced by the testimony that the cars were essential to expedite the construction work and to save the time of the men going back and forth to the various projects.

Mr. LANGER. There is nothing in the bill which would prevent the Commission from purchasing 550 Cadillacs; is there?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. There is a general law which provides explicitly that no passenger vehicle may be bought which costs more than $1,400.

Mr. LANGER. I thank the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 10, to insert:

GENERAL SERVICES ADMINISTRATION

STRATEGIC AND CRITICAL MATERIALS

For an additional amount for carrying out the Strategic and Critical Materials Stock Piling Act of July 23, 1946 (50 U. S. C. 98), $1,834,911,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics," on page 10, after line 6, to insert:

SALARIES AND EXPENSES

For an additional amount for "Salaries and expenses," $3,250,000; and the limitation imposed by section 103 of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1951, on the amount available for travel expenses under this head, is increased from "$260,000" to "$300,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Selective Service System—Salaries and expenses," on page 11, line 8, after the word "expenses", to strike out "$10,787,899" and insert "$11,000,000"; in the same line, after the amendment just above stated, to strike out the comma and "of which not exceeding $250,000 shall be available for equipment, and not exceeding $35,000 for travel expenses of special boards", and in line 13, after the word "replacement", to insert a colon and the following proviso: "Provided, That both of the limitations under this head in the Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1951, on the amounts available for travel expenses are hereby repealed."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Tennessee Valley Authority," on page 12, line 2, after the word "amount", to strike out "$64,500,000" and insert "$67,000,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, after line 2, to insert:

CHAPTER VIII

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

(Out of revenues of the District of Columbia)

Office of Civil Defense

For an additional amount, fiscal year 1951, for "Office of Civil Defense," $337,500; and appropriations granted under this head for the fiscal year 1951 shall be available for personal services without reference to the civil-service and classification laws.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I have an amendment to offer on page 16. Is there an understanding that the committee amendments shall be considered first?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Committee amendments are to be disposed of first.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 28, after line 2.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the heading on page 28, line 12, after the word "Chapter," to strike out "VIII" and insert "IX."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Claims for Damages, Audited Claims, and Judgments," on page 28, line 21, after the word "in", to insert "Senate Document No. 244, and", and in line 22, after the word "Congress", to strike out "$5,274,034" and insert "$6,983,938."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the heading on page 29, line 11, after the word "Chapter", to strike out "IX" and insert "X."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "General provisions," on page 29, line 13, to change the section number from "901" to "1001."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 31, line 4, to change the section number from "902" to "1002."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 31, line 11, to change the section number from "903" to "1003."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That completes consideration of committee amendments.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I send two amendments to the desk and ask that they be stated.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so that I may ask for the adoption of two more amendments which I am authorized to present to the Senate by the Committee on Appropriations and as to which I have given notice?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Tennessee for that purpose?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. McKELLAR. I send the first amendment to the desk and ask to have it stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 1, after line 12, it is proposed to insert the following:

PAYMENT OF SUMS DUE DECEASED CONGRESSIONAL PERSONNEL

(a) Section 49 of the Revised Statutes is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 49. When any person dies while serving as a Member of or Delegate to Congress, as Resident Commissioner from Puerto Rico, as an officer or employee of either the Senate or House of Representatives, or as an employee of a joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives, the appropriate disbursing officer of the Senate or House of Representatives shall pay to the widow or widower of such person, or, if there is no widow or widower, to the next of kin or heirs at law of such person, any unpaid balance of salary or other sums due such person at the time of his death."

(b) Section 50 of the Revised Statutes is repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I offer another amendment on behalf of the Committee on Appropriations. Its presentation was unanimously directed by the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 4, before the heading entitled "Chapter III," it is proposed to insert the following:

MARITIME ACTIVITIES

SHIP CONSTRUCTION

The first proviso in the paragraph under the head "United States Maritime Commission, ship construction" in the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1951, is hereby amended by striking out "December 31, 1950" and inserting in lieu thereof "June 30, 1951".

Appropriations and contract authority made available to the United States Maritime Commission for ship construction in the fiscal years 1950 and 1951, and in addition thereto $224,000,000 in contract authority, the totals of which, including not to exceed $500,000 which may be transferred to the appropriation "Salaries and expenses" for necessary administrative costs without regard to limitations thereon in said appropriations, and including not to exceed $15,000,000 for the construction, activation, acquisition, and expansion of plant or facilities, on land whether owned by the Government or otherwise owned, shall be available, without regard to the provisions of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 with respect to essential trade routes, for construction of such additional dry-cargo vessels as the Secretary of Commerce, with the approval of the President, shall find necessary for national security: Provided, That such additional vessels shall not be subject to the first proviso under the head "New ship construction" in the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1950, or the last proviso under the head "Ship construction" in the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1951.

For the payment of obligations incurred on or after July 1, 1946, including obligations authorized herein, for ship construction, reconditioning and betterments, pursuant to the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, as amended, and to the authority granted under the head "United States Maritime Commission" in the several appropriation acts for the fiscal years 1947, 1948, 1949, 1950, and 1951, the unexpended balance of funds heretofore appropriated for the liquidation of such obligations may be consolidated and may, in total, be available for the liquidation of such obligations.

SALARIES AND EXPENSES

Limitation under the head "Salaries and expenses," United States Maritime Commission, in the Independent Offices Appropriations Act, 1951, are amended as follows: "Maintenance of shipyard facilities" is increased from "$452,000" to "$483,000," and "Maintenance and operation of terminals" is decreased from "$765,000" to "$734,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, on behalf of the committee I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 12, after line 2, under the heading "Tennessee Valley Authority," following the word "expended", it is proposed to insert the following: ": Provided, That purchases and contracts for supplies or services may be made by the Authority during the fiscal year 1951 without regard to any provisions of law relating to advertising or competitive bidding."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, on behalf of the committee I offer the amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 21, after line 11, it is proposed to insert the following:

CHAPTER IX—FOREIGN AID

Whenever he determines that such action is essential, the President may from time to time utilize, for the effective carrying out of the purposes of the China Area Aid Act of 1950 (title II of Public Law 535, 81st Cong.), not to exceed in the aggregate 5 percent of the funds made available for the fiscal year 1951 for the purposes of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948 (Public Law 472, 80th Cong.), as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] on behalf of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KNOWLAND subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the point where the 5-percent ECA amendment was agreed to a statement and two letters from the ECA Administrator be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement and letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ECONOMIC COOPERATION ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., December 20, 1950.

Hon. WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR BILL: You inquired as to the general purposes for which we requested a right to transfer 5 percent of our appropriated funds from title I to title II.

As a result of developments since the passage of this year's appropriations bill less money is needed for economic aid to Europe and more is needed for economic aid in the Far East between now and June 30, 1951. In view of this we feel it desirable that the right be given to transfer up to 5 percent from the European to the far eastern title. This would make available a possible total of $125,900,000 in the general area of China.

This authority is sought for these immediate reasons: to increase by $15,000,000 the amount of aid to Formosa, to provide $15,000,000 to inaugurate a program in the Philippines, and to reimburse the sum of $4,500,000 used to purchase grain sorghums in the United States to relieve a threat of famine in India. In addition, it seems prudent to provide authority in case further transfers prove necessary in the critical area of Far East and Southeast Asia where urgent action may be required at any time. Any transfer of funds which ECA proposes would also, of course, require the approval of the Budget Bureau and the President.

The only one of the above programs which has not already been in operation for some months is the Philippine program where we propose to use up to $15,000,000 between now and June 30, 1951, to the extent that projects are submitted by the Philippine Government which warrant ECA approval. The fund would not be used, however, unless the Philippine Government took the necessary steps for social and fiscal reform which were accepted in general terms by the president of the Philippines in an agreement signed on November 14, 1950. I am attaching a press release which outlines the major points in that agreement, which basically were that if appropriate reforms were undertaken by the Philippine Government the President of the United States would propose a substantial program of economic aid to the United States Congress. This program would be designed to extend over a period of years. ECA does not propose to take any other action on the major program other than the $15,000,000 proposed above until the whole plan has been presented to the Congress for appropriate legislation.

However, since the Government of the Philippines is moving rapidly toward the initiation of those reforms, ECA and the State Department, with the approval of the President of the United States, feel that we should initiate some of the projects at once so as to develop further the enthusiasm and support of the Philippine Government and people.

With this financial and moral support from the United States I believe that we can establish promptly an effective aid program which will make possible a major improvement in the whole Philippine situation.

Thanks for the opportunity of commenting on these plans.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM C. FOSTER,
Administrator.

P. S.—You will, of course, recall that the China Area Aid Act of 1950 prohibits the use of these funds in Communist-dominated areas.

STATEMENT IN SUPPORT OF AUTHORIZATION TO TRANSFER FUNDS APPROPRIATED UNDER TITLE I FOR THE EUROPEAN AREA TO TITLE II OF THE GENERAL AREA OF CHINA OF PUBLIC LAW 535

As conditions have developed since the appropriation bill was passed, the demands on the funds for Europe will be less in proportion to the demands on the available funds for the general area of China. It is, therefore, felt desirable that flexibility be provided by authorizing the President to transfer up to 5 percent between the two titles of Public Law 535. This proposed flexibility is the same as the Congress provided for the mutual defense assistance program.

It is not intended to use that amount for any new purposes but simply to have funds available which can be used to meet emergencies in the critical Far East area if necessity requires. I am informed that the Economic Cooperation Administration contemplates only the following additional expenditures: $15,000,000 for the Philippines; $15,000,000 for Formosa, and $4,500,000 to replace funds diverted from Burma, Indochina, Indonesia, and Thailand for the purchase of grain to relieve famine conditions in India. These and any other additional expenditures would, of course, require the approval of the Bureau of the Budget and the President.

The only one of the above programs that is new is the one for the Philippines and these funds would not be used unless the Philippine Government took the steps toward necessary social and fiscal reform which were accepted by the President of the Philippines in an agreement signed with Mr. Foster as the representative of President Truman on November 14, 1950. I have been assured that the major program would not be undertaken until the whole plan has been presented to the Congress and approved. The Government of the Philippines, however, is moving rapidly toward the initiation of these reforms and it is felt that the United States should take advantage of that impetus and initiate some of the projects at once.

The need for additional funds for Formosa is urgent due to increased heavy burdens and unless additional funds can quickly be made available, the economy of Formosa will be seriously jeopardized. These requirements for the Philippines and for Formosa cannot be met by reduction of the scheduled programs for Burma, Indochina, Indonesia, and Thailand without severe risk to the achievements of the objectives of the United States in the whole area. Of course none of these funds can be used in a Communist-dominated area.

DECEMBER 16, 1950.

Hon. KENNETH D. MCKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR MCKELLAR: The Economic Cooperation Administration is now operating in Formosa and Southeast Asia under the authorization of title II of Public Law 535 with funds left over from earlier appropriations for the China-aid program. It is requested that authorization be given the President to transfer up to 5 percent of the funds appropriated under title I to title II of Public Law 535 in order to permit the programs now scheduled to be maintained for the rest of the fiscal year and to provide flexibility to meet contingencies in this strategic and critical area of the world.

About $98,000,000 remained from earlier appropriations for the China-aid program and the Congress earmarked $40,000,000 for the Formosa program, $8,000,000 for humanitarian relief in China and $6,000,000 for Chinese students and teachers in the United States. It was assumed, however, for planning purposes that it would not be feasible to provide relief in China and that the $8,000,000 tentatively earmarked for this purpose would be available for the general area. Fifty-two million dollars were therefore considered to be available for Burma, Indochina, Indonesia, and Thailand, although even this amount was somewhat less than recommended by the Griffin mission which surveyed the needs of these countries during this past spring.

The need for additional funds during this fiscal year for programs which are now scheduled arises primarily because of necessary expenditures which were not anticipated at the time of the original estimates. The President, because of the famine conditions in India, allocated $4,500,000 to purchase grain for that country. Thirty million dollars will also be required to carry out the economic program recently initiated in the Philippines and to maintain the Formosa program which has been changed as a result of the improved military situation of the island from a relief and rehabilitation program operating on a month-to-month basis to one designed to enable Formosa to achieve self-sufficiency within a few years. These additional expenditures cannot be met by reducing the scheduled programs in the other countries without severe risk to the achievement of our objectives in this area. Costs, moreover, have increased substantially since the original estimates were formulated.

As of this date, about $52,000,000 of the $92,000,000 available have been obligated. A good part of the period since the Congress authorized use of these funds in the general area of China, however, had to be utilized in organizing the missions, in negotiating the required bilateral agreements, and in screening the preliminary programs. The program in Burma, Indochina, Indonesia, and Thailand have, therefore, only been in full operation for approximately 2 months, and the amended program for Formosa for about the same length of time. At the rate of obligation which has now been reached and which is required to maintain the momentum of the program, available funds will be exhausted during the third quarter of this fiscal year, even if emergencies do not arise which would require expenditure of more funds than now scheduled. It is considered, moreover, that funds must be available to meet emergency situations.

We, of course, hope that expenditures can be held to the $36,000,000 additional required for the programs now scheduled. The position of the United States in this troubled area should not, however, be risked on the certainty of being able to do so. Authorization is, therefore, requested to transfer up to 5 percent of the funds appropriated for the European area so that funds will be available to meet emergencies as well as to maintain the present programs. For example, it has been apparent in recent weeks that military burdens are weighing heavily on the Formosan economy and considerably more than the amount now estimated may be needed to prevent economic and financial collapse and to preserve the real progress already achieved. The situation in Indochina is critical and the building up of indigenous military forces may impose financial burdens which will require additional economic support. Harvests are again bad in India, and it may again be necessary to help finance increased grain imports if famine conditions are to be avoided. Such examples can be multiplied, but we consider that it is clear that in these days common prudence requires that ample funds be on hand to be used if emergencies do arise.

Authorization to transfer economic-aid funds between areas is required for the same reasons that led the Congress to include such authorization in the MDAP legislation—to enable the United States to move quickly and effectively to meet emergencies threatening our over-all struggle against the forces of the Kremlin. We do not know in advance just where the pressure against the free world is going to build up or in what area it may be wise for the United States to use its economic strength in the general effort to combat Communist pressure. We do know that with resources that can be rapidly mobilized the United States stands a better chance of counteracting the strains and holding the line against the forces of subversion and aggression.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM C. FOSTER,
Administrator.

PROPOSED LANGUAGE

Whenever he determines that such action is essential, the President may from time to time utilize, for the effective carrying out of the purposes of the China Area Aid Act of 1950 (title II of Public Law 535, 81st Cong.), not to exceed in the aggregate 5 percent of the funds made available for the fiscal year 1951 for the purposes of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948 (Public Law 472, 80th Cong.), as amended.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MCKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. I connection with the maritime activities amendment which was adopted a moment ago, providing an additional $224,000,000, could the Maritime Commission buy the two ships which were discussed the other day, the Mariposa and the Monterey?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. MCKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Let me say that it was not in contemplation of the committee or of the evidence which was presented to us that that should be done. This appropriation is designed to enable the Maritime Commission to build new ships which are required by the Defense Establishment.

Mr. LANGER. The amendment specifically exempts the Commission from any necessity for buying new ships. It does not provide that these are to be new ships.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The amendment has to do with new ship construction, as is disclosed by the following provision:

The first proviso in the paragraph under the head "United States Maritime Commission, ship construction" in the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1951, is hereby amended by striking out "December 31, 1951", and inserting in lieu thereof "June 30, 1951."

Appropriations and contract authority made available to the United States Maritime Commission for ship construction in the fiscal years 1950 and 1951, and in addition thereto $224,000,000 in contract authority——

Mr. LANGER. Let me invite the Senator's attention——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I beg the Senator's pardon. Please permit me to answer.

The appropriation acts for the fiscal years 1950 and 1951 which Congress passed last year, and which are referred to, did not contain provisions authorizing the acquisition of the ships referred to, and there was under consideration upon the floor the other day a special bill dealing with that question, which was not passed. I feel quite confident that there is nothing in this amendment which changes the situation with respect to the two vessels to which reference has been made.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. I call attention to the proviso at the end of the second paragraph of the amendment, reading as follows:

Provided, That such additional vessels shall not be subject to the first proviso under the head, "New ship construction" in the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1950, or the last proviso under the head, "Ship construction" in the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1951.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Those provisos were provisos of limitation, by which only a certain number of new vessels could be built. That is all that has been eliminated.

Mr. LANGER. What the Senator from North Dakota wants to know is this: Must this $224,000,000 be spent for new ships?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes.

Mr. LANGER. Or can the Commission buy old hulks?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No. This is for new ships.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Is it not true that by changing the language which is a part of the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, the Maritime Commission is permitted to use, up to July 1, 1951, certain funds which were appropriated for the construction of passenger ships? That language has been changed so that freight-carrying ships may be constructed, ships which will have a speed of 20 knots, draw 30 feet, and hold a certain number of tons.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. New ships.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. New ships; and those new ships are to cost $7,000,000 apiece. By putting in the $224,000,000 in addition to the language change with respect to the $126,000,000, we permit the Maritime Commission to build 50 new ships. Is not that correct?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator is quite correct. Will the Senator not agree with me that it is not the intention of the committee, and there is nothing in this language to authorize the purchase of any old ships?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. It certainly is not the intention of the committee. Absolutely not. Other ships would have to be purchased by the Navy Department from military funds, entirely apart from this appropriation. That is the committee's intention.

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. O'CONOR. Is it not true, in furtherance of the statement of the Senator from Wyoming, that Admiral Cochran of the Maritime Commission and others have urged this measure as essential, so a to provide ships in addition to those which are presently available, and that the entire urge is for new construction to supplement existing facilities?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator from Maryland is quite correct. I think I am at liberty to say that a request is now pending before the Bureau of the Budget for additional sums for the construction of additional ships. This request will be presented in the new budget.

Mr. McKELLAR. At all events, I will say to the Senate that the committee allowed what was asked, because we thought it was a time of danger, and that new ships ought to be made available. After hearing the testimony of the various witnesses we allowed this item to go in.

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield in order that I may insert in the RECORD a statement in support of the committee's position on this question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR O'CONOR

There are few, if any, requirements which have greater merit and call for more immediate action than the upbuilding of our merchant marine.

Despite the costly lessons of World Wars I and II, our Nation has failed to give proper recognition to the important part to be played in an emergency by the merchant marine. Despite the experience of the past, many people considered the laid-up fleet as available for any use when necessity arose.

Some of us saw the inherent dangers in this policy and gave warning that we would be caught unprepared if we did not take forthright and adequate steps to remedy the situation. I might add at this juncture that about a year ago I introduced the long-range shipping bill which, if promptly enacted, would have gone far to remedy the present unfortunate situation.

In the Korean crisis America learned to its sorrow that only a small portion of the laid-up fleet was of the type that could be placed into immediate service in order to answer the need of the hour. It is a matter of great regret to note that we did not have enough troop ships and fast cargo ships ready for the emergency. It was necessary to charter foreign ships and it would have been even more disastrous had we been faced by a foe which had readily available submarines and air forces to repel the Inchon landing.

There is imperative need for ships which can move American troops expeditiously. There is immediate need for fast cargo ships that can continue to help the armed services by transporting ammunition and supplies. The inexcusable neglect evidenced toward the maritime industry has resulted in a deplorable condition with regard to available shipbuilding personnel in the United States. Unless remedial action is taken, and taken promptly, in connection with efforts to mobilize the country's resources against Communist aggression, it would be folly to expect anything but a complete break-down of American shipping and ship construction in the event of the long-dreaded all-out attack by Communist forces.

Recollection of the great number of ships constructed during World War II confuses many of our people, who apparently feel that these laid-up ships could be put back into service at a moment's notice, and would be entirely satisfactory for naval auxiliary and Army transport use. As anyone familiar with the situation knows full well, however, there is quite a time lag between the withdrawal of these vessels from the laid-up fleet and the date of their reentry into service. Much more important, however, is the fact that, by and large, they are not fast enough to keep up with the speedy naval forces of today or to avoid the improved enemy submarines that will be encountered in any future naval engagement.

What is urgently and vitally needed is a continuing program of ship construction which will prevent "block obsolescence", that will permit recruitment and maintenance of a minimum core of experienced shipbuilders, and that will keep the United States at least somewhat abreast at all times of its peacetime and wartime maritime needs.

American private enterprise can be depended upon to do its part in ship construction if only the Nation will give it the opportunity. World War II demonstrated better than anything in history how successfully the maritime industry can respond in an emergency if it is given the sign to go ahead.

Those of us who took active part in the lengthy committee hearings over the 5-week period earlier this year have long since been convinced of the crying need for a strong American merchant marine. This great industry can be of inestimable value during the national emergency, now declared by the President. In past crises patriotic merchant seamen have done their full share in protection of the interests of the United States. Backing them will be ship construction and ship repair organizations who are experienced and able and deserve our support. No finer group of patriotic citizens can be found in America than the key officials, the workers and seamen who together represent a merchant marine of which our Nation can well be proud.

DECEMBER 19, 1950.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C.:

Respectfully urge administration support for long-range shipping bills in Congress, S. 2786 and H. R. 5346. The maritime industry has not had the attention it warrants as part of the national-defense organization. The objections previously put forward by the Treasury Department and the Bureau of the Budget are now entirely overshadowed by the current emergency.

Respectfully yours,

GEO. H. FRENCH,
President, the Maryland Drydock Co.

BALTIMORE ASSOCIATION OF COMMERCE,
Baltimore, Md., December 18, 1950.

Hon. HARRY S. TRUMAN,
President of the United States,
Washington, D. C.:

The Baltimore Association of Commerce, representing 2,300 business and industrial organizations of this community, earnestly requests your vigorous support of the long-range shipping legislation now pending before Congress after receiving approval of the appropriate committees of both Houses.

A strong United States-flag merchant fleet is a fundamental need in this period of national crisis both as a defense measure and for the preservation of our economy. As a center of world shipping and ship construction and repair with experienced personnel whose skills must be preserved for this emergency, Baltimore is particularly concerned. We view the situation, however, primarily as a national issue of the gravest significance.

G. H. POUDER,
Executive Vice President.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President——

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an insertion in the RECORD at this point of some explanatory material?

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, did not I have the floor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair begs the Senator's pardon. The Senator from New Hampshire had the floor, and yielded to the Senator from Tennessee for the purpose of offering some amendments.

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, in view of the action taken by the Senate in enacting the authorization for military public works, I ask that the bill be amended, on page 14, line 14, after the words "Military construction, Army," by inserting "including construction as authorized by law."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that amendment will be made.

Mr. RUSSELL. I offer the same amendment on page 18, line 22, after the word "new", the language to be inserted being "including construction as authorized by law."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask that my two amendments be stated. The amendments are offered on behalf of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CORDON], the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], and myself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire for himself and other Senators will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 16, line 24, after the word "therefor", it is proposed to insert: ": Provided further, That none of the funds provided under this head shall be used for such purposes in any territory of Korea under Communist control."

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, Members of the Senate will find this item on page 16, under the heading "Civilian Relief in Korea." During the hearings I questioned Secretary Marshall and Secretary Lovett about this problem. Let me read this brief quotation:

AMOUNT FOR RELIEF IN KOREA

Senator BRIDGES. I wondered in this bill about the item for $100,000,000 for relief of various kinds in Korea. Considering the current situation there, I should think it would be pretty difficult to apply that now, would it not?

Secretary LOVETT. Yes; I think it would, Senator BRIDGES. General McGruder has the details on that. That was responsive to a request in the Department to estimate the needs on the assumption of course at that time that the pacification of North Korea was in motion. The South Korean portion of it is, of course, in the lap of the gods.

Senator BRIDGES. I notice in the North Korean item, a lot of it is for rebuilding municipal distribution systems in North Korea. I am just wondering whether or not that is at least a necessary thing in this appropriation. We would have to know what the situation was certainly before we rush into this to appropriate for North Korea rehabilitation when it may never be in our hands.

Secretary LOVETT. That will be one of the last items, I am sure, that is justified, Senator BRIDGES, and of course it would depend on the circumstances then.

Senator BRIDGES. Certainly, but I am not sure that psychologically it would be the thing for us to do, to throw $100,000,000 into this to help rehabilitate the Communists in North Korea at this particular time. I think you people will want to center on other things, as I would. I would be enthusiastic about a situation developing, perhaps, of rebuilding some of South Korea, but there would have to be quite a lot of salesmanship done on me to spend a lot of money rebuilding North Korea.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Hampshire yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I have no objection to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] on behalf of himself, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CORDON], and the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] on page 16, after line 24.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CORDON], I offer another amendment which I ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 16, line 21, after the word "transportation;", it is proposed to strike out "$100,000,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$50,000,000."

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I have no objection to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, a good deal of question has been raised by Members of the Senate respecting the progress of the Department of Defense in awarding contracts, how those contracts are awarded, whether by bid, whether by negotiated contracts, and whether or not the rising scale of prices has interfered with the ability of the contractor or the subcontractor to deliver. There is a colloquy in the hearings beginning at the middle of page 26 and continuing to page 31, in which the Senator from New Hampshire submits a series of questions and is joined in them by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], and other Senators. I ask unanimous consent that the questions and answers to which I have referred may be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEFENSE CONTRACTS

Senator BRIDGES. Mr. Chairman, in order to expedite things here, I would like to ask a series of questions, and then allow the Defense Department to answer them in writing at the next meeting on Monday, and that would expedite the thing here, if you will.

1. I would like the approximate figure as to the number of defense contracts awarded up to date.

2. Whether the contracts have been awarded on bid or negotiated basis?

3. If there have been any negotiated contracts, in general, what have they been for?

4. If contracts have been awarded on a bid basis, have there been cases where the successful bidder was unable to assume his obligations in the contract through failure to produce the product? There are a good many rumors on that, in the Subcommittee in the Armed Services.

Then, 5. How many successful bidders have had to ask for more funds subsequent to the date of the contract due to circumstances which they consider beyond their control?

Senator HILL. Would you say "And what were those circumstances"?

Senator BRIDGES. Yes.

6. If from the answers to the above it is obvious that certain contracts are not being fulfilled according to their original obligations, we would like a report made to the committee which would include the following:

The total contracts awarded on the bid basis, on negotiated basis. Contracts awarded on the bid basis subsequently canceled by the Department of Defense, and for what reason canceled. Contracts awarded on the bid basis for which no deliveries have been made by contracting firm or industry, and for what reason. A number of contracts awarded on the bid basis where contracting firm or industry came back for an increase in funds for completion, and for what purpose.

Senator O'MAHONEY. May I interrupt at that point to ask a question subordinate to that? How many contracts contain escalator price clauses?

Senator BRIDGES. That is very good. And what is the policy on subcontracts? In other words, various people of your Department with or without your knowledge are making different statements about subcontracts, and sometimes it is said that the Defense Department has complete jurisdiction over them, and some others say, "Well, now, that is a thing over which we have no jurisdiction and that comes wholly under the contracting firm for the top contract."

I think if the clerk will submit those, and they can be answered in writing, that will save a lot of time here.

Senator O'MAHONEY. Let us add another question: What has been the experience of the Defense Department with respect to increasing prices during the past 6 months?

Senator ELLENDER. May I submit another question, following Senator BRIDGES? I would like to know this: I have been informed that on several occasions bids have been submitted by various contractors, all of whom have qualified, but yet when the time comes to give the bid out, there is a feeling that in many cases the low bidder is not accepted, although he is qualified, but is given to one that has had experience in World War II. Now, I would like to know what the policy is going to be in the future, if the Defense Department is going to invite bidders and give it not to those who have the lowest bid, but to those who have had the experience in the past. It strikes me that it ought to be given to the lowest bidder.

Senator O'MAHONEY. The lowest responsible bidder.

Mr. LOVETT. In Senator BRIDGES' first question, you used the word "obligated" or "contracted"?

Senator BRIDGES. I referred to the number that have been awarded, that is, you can subdivide them under those that have been contracted, actually contracts awarded, or that there are partial steps in so doing.

Mr. LOVETT. I find we frequently cause confusion unintentionally by following the budget description of "obligations" which requires the full contract, whereas all of the services operate really on the basis of commitment when letters are sent out and engineering production starts before the contract is fully completed—the basic agreements having been reached. So if Senator BRIDGES will permit, we will deal with it on the basis of committing funds, and then contracted in addition, so as to give you the full picture. Otherwise it would be misleading.

Senator BRIDGES. There has been called to my attention where I said contracts awarded on a bid basis on which no delivery is made; I mean by that where, for some reason, they have reneged, where you have awarded it in good faith, but where the company has not lived up to the delivery on the contract.

Mr. LOVETT. That is understood.

"DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE PROCUREMENT ACTIVITY JULY 1 THROUGH OCTOBER 30, 1950

"1. Question. Number of Department of Defense contracts awarded and/or committed since July 1. Money value represented by such contracts.

"Answer. During the first 4 months of fiscal year 1951, the Department of Defense placed approximately 500,000 purchase actions. Since this figure includes local purchases (purchases under $1,000), which type of purchase accounts for the great bulk of all governmental purchase transactions, it is probably more significant that there has been committed and obligated from all procurement funds and project authorizations during the period approximately $8,100,000,000. It must be borne in mind that included in the latter sum are commitments to Government-owned manufacturing arsenals and plants. Accordingly, the industrial impact of these commitments has not been fully realized by the award of all contracts thereunder.

"2. Question. Which part of 1 above was negotiated and which part advertised in number of transactions and amount of money?

"Answer. Although our statistical effort is not entirely current for the first 4 months of fiscal year 1951, the best estimate available is that approximately 50,000 transactions were advertised, representing a value of $900,000,000, and 450,000 transactions were negotiated, representing a money value of over $7,000,000,000. Here, again, it must be borne in mind that the negotiated figure includes local purchases which, during fiscal year 1950, represented 75 percent of the total number of negotiated transactions and 3 percent of the value of the negotiated transactions.

"3. Question. In general terms, what items are being negotiated?

"Answer. Generally speaking, the military departments have been negotiating for the following types of items: (a) Those that are highly technical; (b) those for which but one source exist; (c) those which are urgently needed in support of military operations; and (d) those that are in extremely short supply. Included are such items as tanks and military-type vehicles, large and complicated electronic items, aircraft, missiles, aircraft maintenance and overhaul services, airline transportation services, steel, aluminum and aviation gasoline, and the like.

"The Secretary of Defense approved today, December 18, 1950, a policy designed to broaden the industrial base of our procurement programs. This policy requires that contracts be spread across industry as widely as possible. In accomplishing this purpose wider use of negotiation will be required. Formal advertising will continue to be used, but not when its use will adversely affect either the speed-up of the procurement process or the broadening of the industrial base. The declaration by the President of a state of national emergency permits the Secretaries of Army, Navy, and Air Force to authorize negotiation pursuant to the authority of section 2 (c) (1) of the Armed Services Procurement Act of 1947. Copy of the policy approved today is set forth below, showing the 10 points to which the military departments are to pay particular attention in placement of contracts.

"4. Question. Under advertising—

"(a) What is the experience with respect to default by contractors?

"Answer. Defaults in advertised Department of Defense procurements have always been negligible in number. There has been no marked upswing in the number of defaults since July 1, 1950. However, it should be noted that in general it is still too early for default actions to occur with respect to advertised contracts related to the Korean action. The reason for this is that, in general terms, awards made during August 1950 specify delivery dates of from 2 to 6 months. The Department foresees, however, an increase of defaults for the reason of contractor's inability to perform.

"(b) Have the contracts been canceled? If so, for what reason?

"Answer. There have been the usual number of 'terminations for the convenience of the Government.' In addition, there have been cases of termination for default which, upon investigation, are found to have been justified under the provisions of the contract. In these instances the cases are converted and terminated 'for convenience of the Government' and not by 'default.' Where the justification does not exist it is necessary that the excess costs, if any, of the default be held against the defaulting contractor's account. Appeals are permitted in the instances where differences of opinion are not resolved between the contractor and the contracting officer.

"(c) Have upward revisions in prices been requested? For what reason?

"Answer. Yes. Upward revisions in prices have been requested in order to prevent serious loss to contractors due to continuous and serious price increases. In those instances in which the contract did not specifically provide for the price redetermination or escalation, the requests were refused, since there is no legal basis for adjusting prices upward without legal consideration.

"(d) Are awards made to the lowest bidder? Under what circumstances does production experience in World War II result in an award to other than the lowest bidder?

"Answer. Yes; awards are made to the lowest responsible bidder, price and other factors considered. Prior to receiving the award of a military contract, a bidder must show evidence of his financial and technical qualifications to perform. Previous successful production experience, including that of World War II, is one indication of such qualification. However, award is never made solely because of World War II production experience to other than the lowest responsible bidder.

"5. Question. In general terms, have contractors requested upward revisions in prices without consideration or under price redetermination or escalation provisions contained in the contract? Upon what basis have the revisions been requested?

"Answer. In situations in which the contracts do not contain price redetermination or escalation clauses, contract modifications have been requested on the basis of serious financial loss due to the unforeseen price increases. Since no legal consideration passes to the Government, relief cannot and has not been granted. In situations in which price redetermination or escalation clauses are included in the contracts, upward price revisions have been allowed in accordance with the terms of the particular contract.

"6. Question. In general terms, how many contracts contain provisions for price escalation?

"Answer. Very few. Every effort is made to purchase military requirements on a fixed-price basis. Price escalation and price redetermination is authorized only when there are unknown pricing factors which will become evident as production under the contract progresses and, by including the clauses, contingency charges will be minimized. It should be noted that there is considerable pressure for price redetermination and escalation provisions in procurements now under consideration. If economic conditions continue as at present, it can be expected that further pressure for such escalation will be exerted.

"7. Question. In general terms, what is Department of Defense experience in price increases in the last 6 months?

"Answer. The Department of Defense has undertaken, within each of the military departments, a continuing study of price levels. Price comparisons for end products purchased by the military departments are difficult to make because of the constant evolution and development of the product, and our price studies indicate that price increases have varied considerably by types of products. We have also even found that there have been price decreases resulting from greater volume production. Both the Air Force and the Navy have indicated a general experience of an over-all price rise of approximately 10 percent occuring over the period in question. Price studies of the Army made by each of the technical services of representative items procured by the technical services show:

Technical services	Items	Average price increases, percent
Signal Corps	Radio set and field wire	9.7
Corps of Engineers	Lumber and miscellaneous construction equipment	18.3
Quartermaster	Cotton and wool cloth, wool (foreign and domestic), leather and shoes	30.5
Transportation Corps	Railroad cars and cargo pallets	12.8
Ordnance Corps	Metals, chemicals, etc	30.8
Medical Services	Miscellaneous medicines, chemicals, and medical devices	34

"8. Question. What is the current Department of Defense policy in regard to subcontract management?

"Answer. One of the principal services the Government obtains from industry under a contract is contractor management which includes, among other things, subcontract management. Although the Military Departments promote the widest possible subcontracting by the prime contractor and particularly small business, and reserve the right to approve the more significant subcontracts, they do not intervene in any way nor direct the contractual relationship between the prime contractor and his subcontractors.

"BROADENING OF POLICY RELATIVE TO THE INDUSTRIAL BASE OF PROCUREMENT PROGRAMS

"The President has declared a national emergency. The issuance of this declaration permits the Secretaries of the Military Departments to authorize the negotiation of purchases and contracts pursuant to the authority contained in section 2 (c) (1) of the Armed Services Procurement Act of 1947. The Munitions Board recommended, and I approved, the following statement of policy.

"The Military Departments have already received instructions to accelerate procurement actions in connection with second supplemental 1951 funds. It is essential in complying with these instructions that contracts be spread across industry as widely as possible in order to broaden the industrial base of our procurement program. Broadening the base will require wider use of negotiation. Formal advertising will continue to be used in appropriate cases, but not when such use will adversely affect the acceleration of procurement or the broadening of the industrial base contemplated by this directive.

"The Military Departments should pay particular attention to—

"(a) The greatest possible integration of current procurement contracts with the industrial mobilization program and the accepted schedules of production.

"(b) The equitable distribution of procurement contracts among the maximum number of competent suppliers. The concentration of contracts with a few leader suppliers is to be avoided unless the necessity therefor is clear.

"(c) The utilization of existing open industrial capacity to the maximum. Expansion of facilities should not be authorized when open capacity can be found. Whenever time permits, and in order to broaden the mobilization base, additional contractors should be utilized in lieu of multishift or overtime operation.

"(d) The fullest possible use of small-business concerns.

"(e) The utilization in negotiation of competition and multiple awards, whenever possible.

"(f) The aggressive encouragement or requirement of subcontracting by prime contractors.

"(g) The provision of maximum incentive to the producer for the reduction of his costs.

"(h) The placement of contracts with a view to economies in the use of transportation facilities.

"(i) The availability of manpower in distressed employment areas or in areas of manpower shortages.

"(j) The reservation of special skills and abilities for the more difficult production tasks.

"To the extent necessary, departmental procurement procedures and practices should be modified to conform to the foregoing. Particular attention should be paid to the caliber of personnel engaged in the negotiation of contracts."

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I offer as an amendment a new section, which I ask to have inserted at the proper place in the bill, and which I ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the appropriate place in the bill it is proposed to insert:

SEC. —. In order to stimulate production of strategic minerals and metals from small deposits located in the United States, the RFC is authorized and directed, pursuant to regulations duly promulgated in that regard, and provided a claim has been filed or is filed within 6 months immediately following the date of the enactment of this act, to pay to a producer of strategic or critical minerals or metals, an amount equal to the unrecovered costs, including capital expenditures, not, however, in excess of $100,000,000 to any one producer, incurred during the period between September 8, 1939, and August 14, 1945, in a good faith effort to furnish or arrange to furnish any of said materials or metals for use in the prosecution of the war, whether contracted for in writing or in response to any oral, written, or published request, solicitation, appeal, or offer to purchase from a contracting agency defined in the Contract Settlement Act of 1944, Seventy-eighth Congress, Public Law 395. A claim otherwise allowable under the provisions of this act shall not be barred by reason of (1) prior rejection under the Contract Settlement Act of 1944, Public Law 395, Seventy-eighth Congress, or (2) the lapse of a corporate charter, where the claim is filed by a surviving stockholder.

Mr. McKELLAR. This is evidently legislation. We have had no hearings on the subject at all. We do not know whether it is good legislation or bad legislation. I am instructed by the committee to enter a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his point of order for a moment?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. MURRAY. I wish to call attention to the fact that if we are going to produce some of the scarce critical metals which are essential in the war, it is necessary that the action proposed by the amendment be taken. In World War II a great number of small mining operators, as a result of being requested, or acting upon the statements made by the procurement agencies of the Government, undertook to develop some scarce metals and minerals. When the war ended they had not been able to cover the costs of their operations. The amendment seeks to bring about that just action, that just compensation for these mine operators. If we are going to expect them again to undertake development of mines producing scarce minerals we must treat them with fairness and prevent them from incurring great expense for which they would not be compensated. It seems to me it is an amendment which is necessary in order to encourage the small mine operators to go to work on mines that contain metals and minerals of a kind which are essential to war production.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I will say in reply that we do not know with what the amendment deals. It has not been recommended to us. There is no budget estimate for it. There has been no testimony taken about it. The only thing we know is that at the last moment the Senator from Montana offers the amendment. It may be a very good thing, but the Senator will have to offer it at the next session of Congress. It cannot go into this bill. I make the point of order against it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPARKMAN in the chair). Will the Senator from Tennessee withhold his point of order until the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] has spoken?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I desire to take only several minutes of the Senate's time today on the subject of governmental red tape as it pertains to this country's acute shortage of war metals and minerals.

The Congress enacted into law on September 8, 1950, the Defense Production Act of 1950 with the express purpose of facilitating the production of goods and services necessary for national security. Section 302 of the act gave the President authority to make provision for loans for the exploration, development and mining of strategic and critical metals and minerals. Section 303 of the act gave the President authority to make provision for the encouragement of exploration, development, and mining of critical and strategic minerals and metals.

I believe I can say without successful contradiction that it was the intent of Congress through the act to secure minerals and metals as speedily as possible to build up our depleted reserves. I believe it was the further intent of Congress that the administering agencies designated should have the same thought in mind.

However, the Congress did not reckon with the red-tape experts in its timetable of implementing national security.

More than 2 months after enactment of the Defense Production Act, these red-tape experts in the National Security Resources Board were still hard at work trying to formulate a questionnaire under which an applicant might file for Government loans under terms of the act.

Three months after passage of the act these application forms were finally completed. In fact, they were so complete that an outstanding mining engineer with 25 years of experience told me he could not fill out one of the application form monstrosities if his life depended upon it.

This application form is a masterpiece of "red tape intellect." Each form has 12 pages of searching questions whose answers would no more indicate the production potential of a mine than it would predict a probable date for armageddon. Whether a one-man mining company wants to borrow $5,000 to sink a mine shaft or a big corporation wants $100,000,000 to build an H-bomb plant, the same questions must be answered.

Each questionnaire must be submitted in quadruplicate. An item overlooked by the "red tape experts" was that the paper on which the forms were printed is so heavy that a squad of typewriters cannot make a carbon impression on a duplicate copy, let alone on the triplicate or quadruplicate copies. Perhaps, a miner's jackhammer would be more appropriate.

Let me point to a part of the text of this application form. There are 18 basic questions, with 26 subheadings, plus a comprehensive financial statement, a comparative statement of income and expenses, and a comparative statement of condition of the applicant.

A mining company would be eligible to secure a loan application only if its metal or mineral were on the essential list. Strangely enough, this questionnaire asks the applicant to set forth the existent shortages of the metal or mineral, either regionally or nationally, presumably, the true shortage of a metal such as copper, lead, or zinc, is top-secret information known only to the munitions board, the joint chiefs of staff, and the National Security Resources Board itself.

The form asks the miner to go one step further and do a "crystal gazing act" by predicting to the National Security Resources Board what the future shortage of the metal or mineral might be. Again, such predictions can come only from the munitions board, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and the National Security Resources Board.

The applicant must also provide his "blank check" to the Federal Government, by agreeing to "reimburse any agency upon demand for any expenses incurred in connection with or arising out of this application or any loan made pursuant hereto."

Meanwhile, the mining men of the West, who are asking for a chance to dig out minerals vital to any war effort, are plagued with this "comedy of errors."

The National Security Resources Board time and again vetoed suggestions of the Defense Minerals Administration, staffed by some dollar-a-year leaders in the mining industry, that an application form or at least some of the questions have a relevance to the mining industry. Instead, four economists from the National Security Resources Board were allowed to dictate their "red tape whims" to a mining industry trying with every means at its command to build up our mineral reserves.

The Defense Minerals Administration, charged with marshaling our mineral and metal potential, rebelled to no avail against the "red tape dictates." Instead, today, the miner must fill out the 12-page National Security Resources Board form, plus a 10-question Defense Minerals Administration statement of facts. The latter deals with the practical aspects of mining, such as the extent of deposits, assay reports, production records, and production facilities.

One miner has written to me that in dealing with this "red tape," he will probably have to use more lead in writing out the practically endless forms than he will be able to dig out of the ground for some time to come.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. McCARRAN. I shall finish my statement in a moment.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I simply wish to make a comment regarding the Senator's speech.

Mr. McCARRAN. Very well, I am glad to have the Senator from Wyoming do so.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am very happy, indeed, that the Senator from Nevada has made this statement for the RECORD. The facts, as he relates them, are correct, as they have been found by members of the staff of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. I should like to have the Senator know that the committee will endeavor to induce the authorities who have prepared this amazing questionnaire to see a little light of reason and draw up an application form which a mining engineer can understand and can fill out.

I thank the Senator very much for his statement.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I am grateful to the Senator from Wyoming for his contribution. Let me say that it should not be necessary for a mining engineer to fill out the form, because the practical miner who tramps the hills and finds the ledges and knows what a ledge or a lode or a vein is, is usually able to give comprehensive advice as to what he has found. Technical matters—such as, for instance, assays and the like—may follow thereafter.

Mr. President, I am protesting this "red tape monstrosity" to Chairman Stuart Symington, of the National Security Resources Board, in the hope that a more sensible approach may be taken to a critical problem.

I bring this commentary to the attention of the Senate in the further hope that we may be able to point out to the administrative agencies that total war, if it comes, might be lost in a maze of red tape. Such a total war can only be won with planes, tanks, and guns.

This Nation must have minerals and metals—not on paper application forms, but in fighting equipment in the hands of our soldiers, sailors, and airmen.

I thank the Senate for its attention.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in regard to the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], I make the point of order that it proposes the addition of legislation to an appropriation bill. I am very sorry to have to make the point of order. I do so upon instructions of the committee.

Mr. President, at this point I ask unanimous consent that the clerks at the desk be authorized to correct chapter and section numbers in the bill to correspond with the amendments which have been made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I merely wish to associate myself with the remarks which have been made by the distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN]. He has clearly shown the need for a revision of the questionnaires he has discussed. Not only must that be done, but we must adopt some kind of a fair and decent attitude toward the small mine operators if we are going to get them to undertake to develop the scarce and strategic minerals which are essential to the defense preparations of our country.

In the last war, many hundreds of the small mine owners went to work because they felt it was their patriotic duty to undertake to open up deposits which they thought would be promising and would furnish the Government with the necessary metals and minerals for the prosecution of the war.

That is the reason why I offered my amendment today. I am sorry that it is going to be made the subject of a point of order. I hope that at some proper time we may be able to have this matter taken care of.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Our committee will be glad to hear the Senator at any time.

Mr. MURRAY. I thank the Senator very much.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] has made a point of order that the amendment of the Senator from Montana proposes the addition of legislation to an appropriation bill.

The amendment is clearly legislation proposed to an appropriation bill; therefore, the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may we have the third reading of the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment of the amendments and third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

The bill (H. R. 9920) was passed.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, request a conference thereon with the House of Representatives, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. McKELLAR, Mr. HAYDEN, Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma, Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. McCARRAN, Mr. O'MAHONEY, Mr. BRIDGES, Mr. GURNEY, Mr. WHERRY, and Mr. CORDON conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. MAYBANK subsequently said: Mr. President, in connection with the appropriation for the Treasury and Post Office Departments, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a statement I have prepared, having reference especially to the Coast Guard.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

As chairman of the subcommittee for the Treasury and Post Office Departments appropriations bill, I feel it is an opportune time to advise the Senate of the splendid work being done in these trying days by the personnel of the Treasury Department, especially by the military and civilian personnel attached to the Coast Guard Service. As Senators know, this service has been in long existence, and has many varied and complex functions, the most recent being the important port security program which was authorized by the so-called Magnuson Act of August 8, 1950 (Public Law 679). To implement this program there is included in the second supplemental pppropriation bill for 1951 $14,700,000 for operating expenses, and $7,900,000 for acquisition, construction, and improvements.

The bill also carries $3,900,000 additional funds for allowances for dependents of enlisted members of the Coast Guard, as provided by the Dependents Assistance Act of 1950 (Public Law 771). The regular bill for 1951 carried under these two heads the respective sums of $136,000,000 and $17,000,000, thus making the total requirements for 1951, $154,600,000 for operating expenses and $24,900,000 for acquisition, construction, and improvements for the Coast Guard Service.

For the most part these fund requirements are essential to our national defense. They represent without doubt the minimum needs of the Coast Guard at this time. Additional military personnel and essential matériel are being procured at an accelerated rate.

It is to be remembered that members of the Coast Guard perform essential and distinguished service both in time of peace as well as in time of war; however, in time of war the Coast Guard operates as a service in the Navy. Therefore, it is of paramount importance to the country that the Coast Guard be maintained in a high state of military readiness, and only through the sufficiency of funds and the continued good work of the Coast Guard personnel can this be accomplished.

Mr. McCARRAN obtained the floor.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I desire to call attention to the fact that the appropriation bill which has just been passed carries a total sum for the Department of Defense of $16,845,181,000—an extraordinary sum of money.

In this connection, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the part of the report of the committee, beginning on page 3 and ending on page 4, entitled "Increasing Prices and National Defense Procurement." I ask unanimous consent that these 2 pages of the report, chapter 7, which deal with national defense, covered in chapter 7, may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INCREASING PRICES AND NATIONAL DEFENSE PROCUREMENT

The committee has been profoundly disturbed by continuously increasing prices of commodities affecting national defense and feels that it is the responsibility of the Department of Defense to leave nothing undone to translate into orders at the earliest possible time, the appropriations which are made in this bill. The committee requested of the Department of Defense specific information with respect to the variations in price for military matériel and equipment since immediately before the outbreak of the Korean War. This report filed with the committee by the Office of the Secretary of Defense when analyzed carries the startling information that inflation has cut the value of the dollars of the sums appropriated for defense since pre-Korea by approximately $3,000,000,000.

The Office of the Secretary of Defense reports of the committee that "these price rises are becoming increasingly widespread despite efforts to reduce costs wherever feasible by simplification of specifications and substitution of materials." Again the Office of the Secretary of Defense reports, with respect to the purchase of aviation gasoline; not only that prices have increased by some 3 to 14.6 percent but that "part of the aviation gasoline supplies are being derived from marginal productions * * * that are not economical under normal conditions" with the result that "premiums of varying amounts are being paid for the supply increments furnished from marginal sources reaching from 5 to 45 percent."

It is the opinion of the committee that time is of the essence in the placing and delivery of orders for all defense materials and equipment for which appropriations are here made. The committee will watch carefully and anxiously to see how clearly the Department will accelerate its procurement of vital materials. It demands action by the Department; it hopes the Department will show results.

The committee is aware of the problems involved in putting into effect wage and price controls but believes that the sooner a termination of this problem is concluded, the quicker the monster of inflation may be defeated.

A review of the basic raw materials which go into the production of military commodities clearly shows the impossibility of separating prices on civilian production from prices on military production.

It has come to the committee's attention that quantities of strategic materials have been sold by our friends to Russia and China. It is to be hoped that the free nations allied with us will take steps to at once stop such transactions.

Specific examples of this startling upward trend of prices for military procurement may be set up as follows:

BASIC RAW MATERIALS

Eleven basic raw materials used by the military show an average increase in price from April 1950 to December 1950 of 72.3 percent. Ten of these eleven items had price increases between September and December ranging from 1.2 to 40 percent.

PRICE INCREASES ON SELECTED MAJOR ITEMS

Aviation gasoline purchased through normal channels increased 3–3.2 percent on the Gulf coast and 13–14 percent on the west coast. Prices of supplies obtained from marginal sources are from 5 to 45 percent higher.

Increases in some other important items are as follows:

	Over-all percent increase, April to October-November 1950	Percent increase occurring between August-September and October-November
Army:
Tires, 7.50 by 20	38.3	14.7
Bailey bridge	37.0	----------
Trousers, cotton, khaki	30.8	12.6
Boots, service, combat	42.4	----------
Cloth, wool, serge, 15-ounce	39.8	10.3
Navy:
Rope, wire, 9/16-inch	100.0	----------
Mattresses	65.4	65.4
Sheets	50.7	50.7
Shell, smoke	55.8	----------
Air Force:
Height finder, AN/TPS-10D	38.9	14.3
Parachutes:
T-7A, parachute assembly with service canopy	51.7	----------
100-foot cargo chute	39.8	----------

In April 1950 the Army paid $23.99 for a 7.50 by 20 tire. In December 1950 that same tire cost the Army $33.18—and nearly $4 of the increase has occurred in the last 2 months.

In April 1950 the Army paid $37,796 for a Bailey bridge. That same bridge now costs the Army $51,792.

In April 1950 it cost the Army 74 cents to cut, make, and trim a soldier's cotton khaki trousers. To perform those same operations in December 1950 costs the Army 97 cents. Nearly half of the increase in the cost of these operations has occurred since September 1950.

In April 1950 the Army paid 57.5 cents for a soldier's wool socks. By December 1950 those same socks cost 68.1, 5 cents of the increase occurring since September.

In April 1950 combat boots cost the Army $5.72 a pair. Those same boots in December cost $8.15 a pair.

In April 1950 the Navy paid 11.9 cents a foot for 9/16-inch wire rope. In December 1950 the price is exactly double, or 23.8 cents.

In August 1950 the Navy paid $8 for mattresses. Those same mattresses cost $13.23 in December.

In August 1950 the Navy paid $1.50 for sheets. Those same sheets cost $2.26 in December.

In April 1950 an Air Force flying jacket cost $16.50. This same jacket in December cost the Air Force $25.

In April 1950 a parachute assembly with service canopy cost the Air Force $198.30. To get this same assembly in December cost $300.77.

In April 1950 the Air Force could buy a 100-foot cargo parachute for $1,287. In December 1950 they must pay $1,798.66.

RELIEF OF NEW YORK QUININE & CHEMICAL WORKS, INC., ET AL.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, by arrangement with the majority and minority leaders, I at this time move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar Order 1596, the bill (H. R. 4653) for the relief of the New York Quinine & Chemical Works, Inc., and others.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the bill by title.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H. R. 4653) for the relief of New York Quinine & Chemical Works, Inc.; Merck & Co., Inc.; and Mallinckrodt Chemical Works.

Mr. AIKEN. I suggest the absence of a quorum. I do so in order that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HENDRICKSON] may be present before action is taken on this request.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I was about to make that suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, in order to expedite the work of the Senate, let me say that the Senator who is interested in this particular piece of proposed legislation is now on the floor, and unless there is some reason for continuing with the quorum call, I ask unanimous consent that the order for a quorum call be rescinded, and that further proceedings under the call be suspended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nevada that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 4653.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the Senate, I wish to discuss this bill.

This is a private claim bill which involves the payment of $139,000.

Because of the substantial amount involved, the bill was referred by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary to a subcommittee, composed of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE], the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON].

A public hearing was held on the bill. The bill remained before the subcommittee for some months following the hearing, and was reported favorably to the full committee on May 17.

This is a somewhat complicated matter, but I shall attempt to state it as simply as possible.

This claim arises out of wartime transactions for the purchase of opium from Turkey. The three claimant companies, who are chemists and drug wholesalers, were the ultimate receivers and distributors of the opium. The original purchase from Turkey was made for the account of the Defense Supplies Corporation by one of the three claimant companies, under an arrangement worked out at the request of the Government. The purpose of this arrangement was to stockpile opium, which was then in short supply, and to make the stockpile available for distribution in the United States, through regular channels.

It is a trade practice of long standing to buy and sell opium on the basis of the morphine content. That is, an initial price is agreed upon on the basis of an assumed morphine content, by percentage; and when the opium is delivered, it is sampled and tested, and the price is then adjusted, up or down, depending on whether the morphine content is higher or lower than the assumed percentage.

In the purchase of this particular opium, this trade practice was recognized in the exchange of correspondence and cablegrams between this country and Turkey. Subsequently, when the opium was parceled out in smaller lots to the three claimant companies, this trade practice was not in terms incorporated in the letters of acceptance which constituted informal contracts for the purchase of the opium by the claimant companies.

The Defense, Supplies Corporation paid the Turkish suppliers for the opium; and subsequently, the American companies who are claimants here paid the Defense Supplies Corporation for the opium which they received. The Defense Supplies Corporation made a profit on the deal in excess of $300,000.

The opium was below standard in the sense that it had a lower morphine content than the assumed percentage. Therefore, the Defense Supplies Corporation was entitled to a refund from the Turkish suppliers. The Department of State attempted, over a long period, to secure this refund, but was unsuccessful in doing so. Then the American company which had handled the original negotiations with Turkey offered to attempt to secure the refund, and by the device of deducting the amount of the refund from the billings to it, by the same Turkish suppliers, of other opium subsequently purchased, was successful in collecting the entire amount. Then, assuming that in accordance with the usual trade practice, this refund would be pased on to the companies which received and distributed the opium, a proposal in this regard was submitted to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, successor to the Defense Supplies Corporation. The RFC took the position that from the purely legal standpoint, since the contract with the American companies did not contain any specific provision for adjustment of the price in proportion to the morphine content of the opium, and did contain a provision that the opium was being accepted "as is," the amount of the refund could not be passed on to the claimant companies. The RFC did agree that the money should be retained by the company which had collected it, until a determination of the matter; and representatives of the RFC testified that they felt these claimants had an equitable case, and did not oppose enactment of this legislation.

Boiled down, the situation is this: Through the efforts of one of these claimants, the Government has recovered a refund which, in accordance with trade policies, should be passed on to the ultimate purchaser and distributer of the opium in each case. This sum is in excess of a profit of over $300,000 which the Government already has made on the deal. For the Government to get this money, it would constitute a windfall. If the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, through the State Department, had itself successfully recovered this refund, under the accepted trade practice, there would be a moral obligation to pass it on to the claimants here; though it is admitted that it is extremely doubtful whether there would be any basis for legal enforcement of this equitable claim.

Under all the circumstances, it was felt by a majority of the committee that the bill should be approved.

The bill has been passed by the House of Representatives and has come from the House to the Senate. I submit the matter to the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, first of all I wish to commend the able Senator from Nevada for his very enlightening statement of the equities involved in the pending bill. I, too, wish to join in strongly urging that H. R. 4653 be passed by the Senate. Since I have previously presented my views on the bill, and since the distinguished Senator from Nevada has also made a full explanation of it, I shall not take the time of the Senate to repeat the arguments which have heretofore been made.

I refer my colleagues to pages 11971 and 11972 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for August 8, 1950, for a concise statement of the views of my distinguished colleague, the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] and to page 14695 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for September 13, 1950, for a detailed and convincing statement made by the able Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN].

In fairness to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] who, as we all know, is out of the country on official business, I think I should say that he objected to the bill when it came up on calendar call. Because of the objections of the Senator from Michigan, I have reexamined the bill very carefully, and I am absolutely convinced that this is a clear case in which considerations of equity completely outweigh strictly legal technicalities which, in themselves, are certainly arguable.

In the light of all the circumstances, the three companies named in the bill should certainly not be forced to turn over to the Government the amount of $139,293.55, which was collected from the Turkish opium monopoly because of a morphine deficiency in the opium the companies bought from the Government. The United States Government has already made a substantial and unexpected profit on its opium stockpiling program, and every consideration of equity supports the retention of the amount provided in the bill by the companies named. I know that if my distinguished senior colleague were on the floor of the Senate this afternoon, he would join in urging that the bill be passed at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUMPHREY in the chair). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4653) for the relief of the New York Quinine & Chemical Works, Inc.; Merck & Co., Inc.; and Mallinckrodt Chemical Works?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FEDERAL CIVIL-DEFENSE PROGRAM

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 2678, the bill (S. 4268) to authorize a Federal civil-defense program, and for other purposes.

Before we begin to debate the measure I should like to suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I desire to reserve my right to object to consideration of the bill until I can ask the Senator from Illinois a few questions with respect to it.

Mr. LUCAS. I shall be very glad to listen to any inquiry with respect to it.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Has the Senator from Illinois discussed the subject with the minority leader?

Mr. LUCAS. On yesterday I advised the Senate that we would take up the civil-defense bill before we concluded with the business of the present session of Congress.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I agree that the bill should be considered. I am not raising any question with respect to that point. However, there was some discussion yesterday about the desire of a number of Members of the Senate on this side of the aisle to have time to look at certain provisions of the bill. I do not know whether they have had such opportunity.

Mr. WHERRY. I was not present when the distinguished majority leader made his request. I wonder if he would object to having a quorum call. I believe some Senators who are interested in the bill desire to offer amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader stated that he would suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I understand that the request of the Senator from Illinois has not been acted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request of the Senator from Illinois that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill is pending.

The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the quorum call be suspended.

Mr. MORSE. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon objects. The clerk will proceed with the call of the roll.

The legislative clerk resumed the call of the roll.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I have discussed the matter with the able Senator from Oregon, and I again ask unanimous consent that the order for a quorum call be rescinded, and that further proceedings under the call be suspended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I now withdraw the request, which is pending before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois withdraws the request which is pending before the Senate, which is that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the civilian defense bill.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas is recognized.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, inasmuch as there was a colloquy between the majority leader and the minority leader relative to the request he is withdrawing, I was wondering whether the majority leader would not state the reason for withdrawing the request at this time.

Mr. LUCAS. I shall be glad to do that. It is my understanding that a tentative agreement was made between members of the Armed Services Committee that certain amendments should be offered to the civilian-defense bill, and that the bill would not be taken up until tomorrow. Under those conditions, of course, I withdraw the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In other words, it is the intention of the majority leader to move for the consideration of the bill tomorrow, is it?

Mr. LUCAS. Yes. The moment we finish with the other matters which may be pending in the Senate this afternoon, I shall make a motion to take up the civilian defense bill, and in view of the understanding between the members of the committee, of course, we will consider the bill tomorrow. I hope we may debate it this afternoon, with the understanding that the vote on the bill will be taken tomorrow, if that is satisfactory to the Members of the Senate.

Mr. WHERRY. It is perfectly agreeable. That will give every Senator an opportunity to offer an amendment if he desires to do so, but the votes will come tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas has been recognized.

AMENDMENT AND EXTENSION OF TITLE II OF THE FIRST WAR POWERS ACT, 1941

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Calendar No. 2680, Senate bill 4266.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the bill by title.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 2466) to amend and extend title II of the First War Powers Act, 1941.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Expenditures in Executive Departments with an amendment, on page 2, line 3, after the word "designate" to strike out the period and insert a comma and the words "but in no event beyond June 30, 1952," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 201 of the First War Powers Act, 1941 (55 Stat. 838) is hereby amended by striking out the words "the prosecution of the war effort" and the words "the prosecution of the war", appearing in such section, and inserting in lieu of each stricken provision the words "the national defense."

SEC. 2. Title II of such act, as amended, shall remain in force during the national emergency proclaimed by the President December 16, 1950, or until such earlier time as the Congress by concurrent resolution or the President may designate, but in no event beyond June 30, 1952.

SEC. 3. Nothing in this act shall prejudice anything heretofore done under the said title II of the First War Powers Act, 1941, or the continuance in force of any action heretofore taken thereunder.

Mr. WHERRY. Before we proceed with the consideration of the bill, I should like to ask whether the bill as it comes from the committee has to do only with title II.

Mr. McCLELLAN. It has to do with title II. It makes the powers granted applicable to the present emergency. The committee reported the bill with a limitation, that the powers conferred by the bill are in no event to continue in force longer than June 30, 1952.

Mr. WHERRY. There is no objection to the immediate consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas wish to make further comment?

Mr. McCLELLAN. In view of the answer I have just given to the distinguished minority leader, I do not believe it necessary to discuss the bill. I am sure every Senator is familiar with it and understands it, and I ask that the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, line 3, after the word "designate", it is proposed to insert the words "but in no event beyond June 30, 1952."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I am trying to get this matter clear in my own mind. This bill would amend title II of the Second War Powers Act, would it?

Mr. McCLELLAN. That is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. I am in favor of the legislation, I may say, but will not the Senator state why it is necessary to do what the bill provides for?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I can point out the reason. The powers which were conferred by title II in the original act of 1941 contained this language:

The President may authorize any department or agency of the Government exercising functions in connection with the prosecution of the war effort—

That referred to the war effort of that time. In the bill now pending the language has been changed so as to read "in connection with the national defense." The intent is merely to bring the statute up to date, to make it applicable to the present emergency, rather than to World War II.

Mr. WHERRY. I am not sure of the number of the section, but does not section 401 of the Second War Powers Act provide that the power shall remain in full force and effect until a concurrent resolution adopted by the Congress terminates the war?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I may say that the position many take is that the war is still in force, but the original enactment referred to the "war," which meant World War II. We are not now proceeding under a declaration of war, so far as the present national emergency is concerned, and the purpose is to amend the War Powers Act, since it is still in force, so as to make the powers apply to the national emergency which the President declared a few days ago.

Mr. WHERRY. I think the Senator knows my feelings, and that I am absolutely in favor of what the Senator is attempting to accomplish. But in order to keep the record straight, I will say that, in my opinion, section 401 of the Second War Powers Act is in full force and effect so far as national emergency is concerned, and if it is the power is already in existence. I am not concerned over taking the action now proposed. I think it is a good thing. It shows what the intention is. But I ask: If it is necessary to amend title II of the act to do what the Senator proposes to do with respect to contractual authority, what about title I under which it is proposed to set up the central agency for Mr. Charles Wilson?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I may say to the distinguished minority leader that he certainly knows that the President requested such powers, or amendments of title I, so as to confer those powers.

Mr. WHERRY. But does the Senator from Arkansas think title I is necessary?

Mr. McCLELLAN. That I have not decided. I may say that our committee has held hearings on the matter. We are still holding hearings on that question. We have not reported a bill for that purpose. We simply know there is a distressing situation existing in regard to contracts.

Mr. WHERRY. I am in favor of alleviating that situation.

Mr. McCLELLAN. If legislation for that purpose is not immediately passed the defense effort may be retarded. Therefore the committee acted as quickly and expeditiously as it could with reference to that subject. There can be no question as to the importance of this authority.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am glad to yield to the majority leader.

Mr. LUCAS. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Am I correct in my understanding that Mr. Wilson will appear before the Senator's committee tomorrow?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. Wilson will appear before the committee tomorrow at our invitation. I may say I intended to announce this afternoon to all Members of the Senate that the hearings were in progress; that Mr. Wilson will appear, and because of what I believe to be adequate considerations, I have concluded that that should be an executive session, of course with an invitation extended to any Member of the Senate to be present who may care to attend.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I commend the Senator from Arkansas for the expedition and speed with which he has handled this phase of the recommendations made by the President. I think everyone understands the importance of immediate legislation on the contract feature of the World War II Powers Act. I also believe that something will have to be done with respect to title I. I do not know what Mr. Wilson will say about it. But I am satisfied, from what I can learn in a cursory way, that some legislation will have to be passed if Mr. Wilson is to have the kind of power he believes he ought to have. I know the Senator from Arkansas will consider that and, of course, establish safeguards with respect to any and all reorganization features, which we have heretofore discussed from time to time.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I may say to the able majority leader, that the immediate problem, of course, is to ascertain just what powers are actually needed. The committee felt yesterday, after the conclusion of hearings such as we were able to have, that we should invite Mr. Wilson to discuss this subject with the committee and give us the benefit of his thinking at this time.

I may assure the majority leader that it is the purpose of my committee to expedite these matters. Certain safeguards may be necessary. We are trying to give the subject full consideration, and not act hastily or blindly. We are trying to obtain all the facts in respect to the subject, and do what we honestly believe to be in the best interest of our country by providing the powers we find are needed.

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. O'CONOR. Is it not a fact that the method devised of having a separate enactment such as proposed by the majority leader, and also by the Senator from Arkansas, is the preferable method because of a unanimous decision of the committee that there should be a termination date fixed, which, as provided in the bill, is June 30, 1952. Rather than attach it to the existing law, this separate enactment is considered to be the preferable method?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I think so. I think the committee is trying to handle the matter in the most judicious manner possible.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I am heartily in accord with what the Senator is attempting to do. I am glad the Senator from Arkansas reported the bill as amended, restricting it to title II.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I may say to the able Senator we felt there should be no delay about the matter.

Mr. WHERRY. I understand. Has the distinguished Senator made up his mind with relation to the observation previously made that, if the authority requested already exists, the proposed legislation might in any way take away any of that authority?

Mr. McCLELLAN. The bill would take away nothing.

Mr. WHERRY. As the Senator knows, I spoke previously with reference to title I.

Mr. McCLELLAN. The pending bill has no relationship whatever to title I. Title I is still in the same category, has the same status, has the same force and effect it has had.

Mr. WHERRY. But assuming, if the Senator will, that section 401 continues titles I and II in full force and effect, what I am asking is if the amendment is needed? What does it do?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I think it is to make the powers applicable to a declared emergency rather than to the prosecution of a former war.

Mr. WHERRY. That is something that should be cleared up.

Mr. McCLELLAN. It certainly does no harm. It clarifies the language. If the proposed legislation is enacted there can be no question with respect to the powers.

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. O'CONOR. Is it not a fact that there are now a total of some 45 disputed matters in connection with which there has been a difference of opinion on the legal side as to whether they can be handled under the existing law?

Mr. McCLELLAN. There are 45 such contracts in the Army alone. That does not include the Navy and the Air Force. We have that much positive testimony. How many there are in other branches the committee does not have information, but there are similar situations in the other branches of the service. This proposed legislation is important and is needed. I am convinced that unless it is enacted, deliveries and production may be retarded, and we ought not to incur any delay.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one more question?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. If the position of the Senator is maintained so far as title II is concerned, then is it the Senator's opinion that additional legislation will have to be asked for to amend title I, to carry out its provisions?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I may say that the committee is proceeding on that premise at the present time.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, there is no objection to the bill on our part.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment to Senate bill 4266, on page 2, line 3.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FREAR obtained the floor.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I ask for a vote on the measure.

Mr. FREAR. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas asks for a vote on the measure.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Delaware also wishes to be recognized, but if the junior Senator from Delaware desires to proceed with his speech, I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The junior Senator from Delaware is recognized, and he may proceed with his remarks.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Delaware to yield until we can conclude the business at hand, without his losing the floor thereby.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas has asked that the junior Senator from Delaware may yield, without losing the floor thereby, so the Senate may conclude the business at hand. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I have no objection to that request, if it can be understood that I may be recognized after the junior Senator from Delaware has concluded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is sure we can cooperate in the spirit of brotherly love.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill (S. 4266) was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 201 of the First War Powers Act, 1941 (55 Stat. 838) is hereby amended by striking out the words "the prosecution of the war effort" and the words "the prosecution of the war," appearing in such section, and inserting in lieu of each stricken provision the words "the national defense."

SEC. 2. Title II of such act, as amended, shall remain in force during the national emergency proclaimed by the President December 16, 1950, or until such earlier time as the Congress by concurrent resolution or the President may designate, but in no event beyond June 30, 1952.

SEC. 3. Nothing in this act shall prejudice anything heretofore done under the said title II of the First War Powers Act, 1941, or the continuance in force of any action heretofore taken thereunder.

H. R. 9236. An act for the relief of H. Halpern & Bro., Inc., of Boston, Mass.

PROPOSED MEETING OF THE DISTRICT COMMITTEE DURING THE SESSION OF THE SENATE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] is recognized.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FREAR. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. May I ask the Senator how long he expects to speak?

Mr. FREAR. I may say to the distinguished majority leader it will be about 8 or 10 minutes.

Mr. LUCAS. Will the Senator yield to me in order that I may place before the Senate a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. FREAR. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Illinois if I do not lose my right to the floor by doing so.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator may yield to me without losing his right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the District of Columbia may be permitted to meet during the session of the Senate today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection——

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object; was that a request, may I ask the distinguished majority leader, for unanimous consent that the Committee on the District of Columbia may meet?

Mr. LUCAS. This afternoon; yes.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I shall have to object to that request. I object in response to requests made by members of that committee who are attending other committee hearings.

The reason I have been asked to object is that those Senators were not present to vote on the appropriation bill and they felt that the other committee hearings were more important. They asked me not to give consent to this matter, at least until they could be notified.

If it is not absolutely mandatory that consent be obtained at this time, I wish the majority leader would wait until tomorrow.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator does not have to make any excuses; I think I understand.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Senator. I withdraw the excuses, then. [Laughter.]

FEDERAL CIVIL DEFENSE PROGRAM

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, in line with the preceding statement, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of Senate bill 4263, providing for a Federal civil-defense program.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, there is no objection to the immediate consideration of the bill, if the Senator will go a step further and will say that he intends to have the bill debated this afternoon, and to have the votes taken on the bill tomorrow.

Mr. LUCAS. That is the understanding, and no excuses will be offered.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4263) to authorize a Federal civil-defense program, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is taken up at this time in accordance with the understanding reached earlier in the day.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, does the majority leader feel that any other business which might necessitate yea-and-nay votes may be taken up this afternoon? Several Senators are preparing to leave.

Mr. LUCAS. I cannot guarantee that no Senator on either side of the aisle may not move to have some other measure taken up at some time later today. However, I understand that no Senator on this side of the aisle will do so. On the other hand, during these last 2 days of my life in the Senate, I refuse to guarantee anything. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I think we can rely on the Senator's understanding in that regard.

ANNOUNCEMENT REGARDING CALL OF THE CALENDAR

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, a number of Senators have asked about a call of the calendar. I think that on tomorrow we can proceed, if we have the time—as undoubtedly we shall—to have a call of the calendar of bills to which there is no objection, beginning where the last call of the calendar concluded. However, under no circumstances will I agree to have any other bills considered during the call of the calendar. I am not willing to have the Senate debate over again a number of bills which have been debated heretofore.

Mr. WHERRY. If I correctly understand the position the Senator takes, it is that if a call is had of the calendar of bills to which there is no objection, the call will include only the bills on the calendar beginning at the point where the previous call of the calendar ended.

Mr. LUCAS. If we have a call of the calendar tomorrow—and I am certain that we shall—we shall begin where the last call of the calendar ended, and we shall discuss and debate only the bills to which there is no objection. We will not return to the bills previously on the calendar, before the unobjected-to bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then it is the understanding that the call of the calendar will commence following the end of the last call of the calendar.

SOUND MONEY

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, I have no desire to detain the Senate or prevent it from making progress at this time on its ambitious program. I shall take only a few minutes of the very valuable time of the Senate.

Mr. President, the excess profits tax bill which we have passed has been urged on the Congress as an equitable way of increasing the Nation's current payments on the defense program. The measure recognizes a condition which is common to all periods of rising prices and expanding activity. That condition is the wide differences among corporations and among individuals with respect to size of income and with respect to increases in income.

The tax legislation requires payment of additional taxes by corporations which acquire unusual profits from defense contracts or from civilian business. When such revenue is added to the tax increases already imposed on individuals and corporations in the Revenue Act of 1950, substantial additions are made to the funds available for meeting the requirements of our expanding defense program. The tax also has the objective, beyond that of an equitable current payment for the defense program, of encouraging defense production. It does that by limiting the profits, and thus the attraction of the alternative, which is civilian production.

If the defense program is put on a pay-as-you-go basis, by means of this tax and other actions which the Congress may take, and if it is made effective quickly by a rapid increase in defense production, the total cost of procurement will be held to a minimum consistent with the effectiveness of defense; the mobilization program will not pump credit into an economy which already is inflated; and the future value of the dollar will not be endangered by further accumulation of indebtedness that requires repayment as well as interest costs. As I see it, the tax bill is not designed with the one aim of maintaining the future value of the dollar. However, like other legislation, such as the Revenue Act of 1950, and the Defense Production Act, it has that aim, along with the aim of meeting immediate conditions of a more particular nature, such as raising revenue, reducing profiteering, authorizing priorities, controlling installment and real estate credit, and so on. The aim of maintaining the soundness of the dollar should always be included when the justification of a legislative proposal is offered during inflationary circumstances.

This aim, a sound dollar, is common to many legislative enactments. It is of greater importance than any of the particular objectives sought by those enactments. Unless the aim of sound money is realized, attempts to attain the other objectives are, in my opinion, without much point. The reason for this is simple and fundamental. The people of our Nation make their living by producing for sale to other people, and by buying from others, the things they need but do not produce or own. The common denominator for stating the value of commodities produced, and the value of productive work, and the means for making payment when buying commodities or services, is the dollar. Without a common denominator for such diverse items as bushels of wheat, work at a machine, consideration of legislation, railroad transportation, and the many other products and occupations familiar to everyone, an economy of free bargaining, free choice of occupation, free business enterprise, would be impossible. Many or most of the products and occupations would be impossible.

If the common denominator fails to function properly, or if it is forced into disuse, the form of our economic system will change.

The common denominator must be sound; that is to say, its value must be stable from day to day and year to year, so that those who work, save, borrow, lend, and invest, can plan ahead, develop efficiency and skill, build productive capacity, and provide for their own future. That is what sound money means. It does not imply a particular form of currency; but it does imply that whatever the form, it will continue; and the value of it, in terms of the things and work for which it is a common denominator, will go on without great interruptions and changes. Sound money in this sense is the basic requirement of capitalism, and always should be given first consideration when appraising our economic situation and any proposals for legislation affecting it. Unfortunately, sound money as a descriptive term, sometimes has been identified with a specific form of money which, whatever its other virtues, would require discontinuation of the form then current. In debates over monetary proposals, the term sound money has fallen somewhat out of repute. But the objective of sound money, which is a reliable common denominator for exchange, and for planning of the affairs of individuals and of governments probably is more important today than at any time within the last three quarters of a century.

The first of the circumstances which makes sound money of such importance is the obvious one that more of the Nation's people depend on money income and expenditure for their living than in the past. The second is the circumstance, likewise well known, that more people are debtors or creditors, and for larger amounts, than in the past; and, of course, that the Federal Government has a greater volume of debt than in the past. The third circumstance is that the value of the dollar has depreciated considerably in recent years. The fourth and most compelling reason for attention to the soundness of the dollar is that we are nearer than in many years to a danger point at which money begins to lose its acceptability as a common denominator of value in trade and industry. This is the point at which individuals and corporations may begin resorting on a wide scale to inflation hedges, then to barter and to theft rather than to the use of money, for exchanging or acquiring commodities and services. It is also the point at which the Government is compelled to use requisitions rather than money to obtain what it wants. Development of these latter conditions usually is followed by introduction of a new money, and is accompanied with political disturbances, sometimes of a revolutionary nature.

The circumstances referred to above, in my opinion, make sound money at least equal in importance to military strength. Any appraisal of our position and prescriptions for it, require at least a brief description and analysis of those circumstances.

Since our economy is entirely a money economy, it seems to me that its soundness is essential if production is to be adequate, either for ordinary consumption and business purposes, or for these, plus defense preparations. We must remember that the whole economy is organized around money payments.

Money measures the value of work and of commodities, and so it measures debts and credits. Sound money is essential to equity between debtor and creditor. The biggest debtor is the Federal Government. Its direct obligations at the end of November 1950 totaled $257,076,619,514. Its biggest group of creditors were the banks, which held slightly less than one-third of these obligations. Individuals held slightly less than one-quarter of the total. Insurance companies held about one-twentieth. Other corporations held about the same portion. The principal other holder, United States Government investment accounts, held as much as insurance companies and nonfinancial corporations together. Nearly all of the Federal debt is World War II debt. Those who loaned money to the Government during World War II have lost purchasing power on long-term securities which they have retained. The loss on about $150,000,000,000 of long-term Treasury bonds and Savings Bonds issued before 1950 and still outstanding has amounted to something more than $40,000,000,000 in purchasing power. The Government, of course, has not necessarily gained that much. It is not essentially true that the Government's ability to obtain tax revenues has changed by the same amount as the price index which indicates a loss in purchasing power to investors. There have been both increases and decreases in real wages which, with other factors, determine ability to pay taxes to the Government. With reference to some periods, the gain in taxable capacity may have exceeded losses to creditors.

There have been increases in debt and credit in many places other than the Government. For example, new nonfarm mortgages of less than $20,000 each have amounted to one billion one hundred million to one billion six hundred million dollars in each month of the last year. Any change in the value of the dollar would affect seriously the creditors who have extended the money secured by these mortgages, and would as well affect the hundreds of thousands of borrowers. As another example, consumer credit has increased to about $19,300,000,000, an increase by 28 percent during 1 year. Bank loans increased nearly $5,000,000,000 in the first 3 months after the beginning of war in Korea. The inequities between creditor and debtor probably have been, and will be, less in the case of business and installment loans than in the case of real estate loans and Government bonds. The reason is that the term is shorter and the amount smaller.

The fluctuations of the value of the dollar in recent years, and particularly in recent months, have come with considerable changes in the position of groups other than creditors and debtors. While the value of the dollar has declined by two-fifths since the beginning of World War II, money wages have tripled; profits after taxes have quadrupled; dividends more than doubled; rental incomes doubled. Federal taxes have increased more than eightfold. This span of years has comprised three periods of depreciation of the dollar—the war, the postwar years of 1946–48, and the months of 1950. In each of these periods, the different indicators of economic change have varied with respect to which moves first, which moves fastest, and which moves farthest. The rates of change in consumer prices in 1950 have been only three-fourths as fast as in 1946–48, while wholesale prices have risen one and a sixth times as fast. Sales have risen two and three-quarters times as fast; profits two and two-fifths times; total wages only nine-tenths as fast; industrial production four times as fast; employment less than half as fast, and weekly earnings one and one-quarter times as fast. A comparison of recent months with 1939–44 shows a different picture. As in comparison with 1946–48, however, wholesale prices have risen faster in recent months than in the earlier periods; this has been true also of profits.

What has been the moving force toward depreciation of our money? In the first half dozen years of the war and postwar inflation, the moving force clearly was the increase in Federal Government expenditures. In the period 1946–48, money saved out of the period of large expenditures was spent in a period of inflation, while governmental expenditures were being cut very sharply. In the recent months, inflation or depreciation of the value of the dollar has proceeded without an increase in Government expenditures. However, in the period of the sharpest recent increases, additional Government expenditures have been anticipated and have led both business and consumers to spend more. Federal expenditures have been of such a large amount as to maintain the economy close to full employment, even though they have been financed principally out of taxes. An increase in such expenditures now, particularly if it is made by pumping additional money into the economy, will increase prices more than proportionately. The reason is that production is near to capacity throughout the economy, and responses to higher prices and better markets will be made only if the benefit of a response if unusually high; that is, only if much higher prices can be obtained.

As the value of the dollar depreciates, a danger point may be reached. Mr. Edwin Nourse has spoken of that danger point as follows:

> The greatest thing we have to fear in the economy of the United States is a spreading fear of the future of the dollar. That distrust is already upon us in some degree. It is not too late to cure it by sound public and private policy. * * * The signs of fear are daily accumulating as people ask each other, "What is the best hedge against inflation?" Hedging against inflation is a flight from the dollar. * * * Those who are ready to take a chance on "containing" inflation may well ponder what happens when a stampede once gets started.

Mr. McCLELLAN, Mr. KEFAUVER, and Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma in the chair). The Senator from Arkansas is recognized.

DEATH OF FORMER SENATOR HATTIE W. CARAWAY

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, it is with sadness and deep regret that I announce the death of my esteemed former colleague in this body, the Honorable Hattie W. Caraway. Death came to Mrs. Caraway at the Whitehall sanitarium, Falls Church, Va., at 11:15 a. m. today as the result of an illness she has suffered since early last January.

Senator Hattie W. Caraway, the widow of former United States Senator Thaddeus H. Caraway, had a most enviable career as a public servant. Upon the death of her illustrious husband, the Honorable Thaddeus H. Caraway, while he was serving as a Member of this body, she was appointed a Member of the United States Senate from the State of Arkansas on November 13, 1931, to fill the vacancy occasioned by his death. Thereafter she was elected by the people of Arkansas to fill out the unexpired term. She was subsequently elected to this high office by the people of Arkansas in 1932 and in 1938 for 6-year terms.

As I recall, Senator Hattie W. Caraway was the first member of her sex ever elected by the people of a sovereign State of this Union to represent it in the United States Senate. Her reelection to two full terms is a testimonial to her and proves the great esteem and confidence in which she was held by the citizens of my State.

After her term as Senator expired on January 2, 1945, she was appointed by the President of the United States as a member of the United States Compensation Appeals Board, in which position she served faithfully until recently, when she was compelled to resign on account of ill health.

In the course of her service here she attained national recognition as an able legislator and made a host of admiring friends throughout the Nation, who, I know, today share with the citizens of my State the deep sorrow that they feel in the loss of this distinguished woman.

It was my extreme good fortune to have her warm personal friendship and to have labored with her as a colleague in the United States Senate. Her attitude toward me as a junior member of this body during the 2 years in which I served with her was one of utmost kindness, consideration, and cooperation. These magnificent personal qualities she exemplified in all of her labors.

She was in her womanly tenderness and understanding devoted to the cause of human welfare, and was always solicitous and diligent in her efforts to promote and advance the interest of the common man and to contribute in every way possible to a higher standard of life for our people and toward the building of a stronger Nation.

Among relatives and loved ones who survive her are two distinguished sons, Col. Paul Caraway and Col. Forrest Caraway, of the United States Army, both of whom are graduates of the Military Academy at West Point, and both of whom have dedicated their lives in the service of the defense of their country.

Mr. President, I extend to those relatives and loved ones my heartfelt sympathy. I share with them the sorrow and grief that I know they are experiencing in the loss of their mother, who was my esteemed friend and for whom multitudes of American citizens mourn today.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I wish to associate myself with the sentiments expressed by my colleague, the senior Senator from Arkansas. It was with profound sadness that I heard of the death of former Senator Hattie W. Caraway. She was an old and close friend of my mother and of myself. Her husband, the late Senator Thaddeus Caraway, was, as many Members of the Senate know, one of the outstanding Members of this body for many years.

Former Senator Hattie Caraway was a fine character and was greatly devoted to the interests of her State and of the Nation. She labored long and faithfully in behalf of her country and of the people of my State. I know that I speak for all the people of Arkansas and all the Members of the Senate in expressing my deep sympathy to her family.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I desire to join the distinguished Senators from Arkansas in what they have said in regard to former Senator Hattie W. Caraway. I am very glad I had the opportunity of knowing her and that I can be remembered as one of those who were her friends. She was a lovely lady. She served her family, her State, and her Nation well and with great distinction.

THE GOVERNMENT'S DISPOSAL OF ESSENTIAL AGRICULTURAL COMMODITIES UNDER CLASSIFICATION OF "SURPLUS AND NONESSENTIAL"

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, last Friday the President, in speaking to the American people, emphasized that our country was confronted by two grave threats: First, the threat of communism; and, second, the threat of inflation.

To combat these threats the President called upon the American people to forget the "business as usual" policies and requested that we all pull together in an effort to rebuild our Military Establishments, conserve our natural resources, and check the current inflationary spiral.

To accomplish this goal the President on the following day declared that a "state of emergency exists in our country," and thereby paved the way for price and wage controls.

Conferences are being held today in Washington between leaders of the meat industry and administration officials to discuss the need of price controls on meats. Price controls have already been declared in effect in one major industry, and similar conferences to those which are being held today are scheduled with representatives of other industries.

On Monday of this week the Price Stabilization Director, Michael V. Di Salle, indicated that later this week he would call for an honor-system freeze on all prices and wages, appealing to the patriotism of the American people to cooperate with their Government in this grave emergency.

From reading the American newspapers in which the plans of the Government officials are outlined, we are given the impression that at long last the administration has recognized that a war is going on. The days of reckless Government waste accompanied by the politics as usual slogans are being replaced by a call for a united effort, without regard to politics, for greater production, stockpiling, and conservation of our Nation's resources.

At this point I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an article which appeared in the Evening Star of December 18, 1950, entitled "United States Aims at 10 Percent Rise in 1951 Crop Output."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES AIMS AT 10 PERCENT RISE IN 1951 CROP OUTPUT; WOULD TOP 1948 PEAK

The Government's crop production targets for 1951 will call for at least 10 percent more food, livestock feed, and fiber commodities than was harvested this year.

Under the threat of war, the Agriculture Department is outlining production programs which, if realized, would top the record farm output of 1948.

This year's crop volume turned out to be bigger than had been forecast. In its final report of the year, issued yesterday, the Department said the harvest was the third largest of record.

LONG FALL SEASON WAS FACTOR

A prolonged fall season for maturing and harvesting crops helped improve the quantity and quality of many items, the Department said.

The aggregate volume of this year's harvest was 126 percent of the 1923–32 average. This compares with the record of 137.5 percent in 1948 and 132 percent in 1949.

Much of next year's increase will be sought in cotton, wheat, and corn. A very short cotton crop this year has led the Government to urge farmers to produce at least 60 percent more in 1951.

LARGER CORN CROP SOUGHT

While supplies of corn are large the Government would like to see next year's crop top this year's by 15 to 20 percent. Corn is the major raw material for production of meat, milk, and poultry products.

This year's harvest was a well-balanced one, with the single exception of cotton. Only a few crops in themselves set records—soybeans, grain sorghums, and sugar beets. But many crops were far above average.

In the class of large crops were corn, oats, hay, rice, potatoes, tobacco, cranberries, and alfalfa and sweetclover seeds. Larger-than-average crops of flaxseed, sorghum, silage, peanuts, sugarcane, hops, apples, pears, cherries, citrus fruits, and truck crops were harvested.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, in this article it is pointed out that the Department of Agriculture is calling on the farmers of this country to increase production of all basic agricultural commodities, and they emphasize the fact that these commodities are essential to our national welfare. It also calls attention to the critical shortage with which this country is faced in regard to cotton.

In view of this background and after listening to the patriotic appeals on the part of the President and other administration leaders, I was shocked this week to find that the administration, while calling upon the American people for greater sacrifices and expressing great concern with the threatening rising cost of living, were at the same time launching one of the greatest international bargain day sales of the twentieth century.

In order that the Members of Congress might realize the size of this bargain day sale, I shall insert in the RECORD a copy of United States Department of Agriculture Bulletin No. 2873–50 dated December 1, 1950, in which the Department of Agriculture announced its December sales prices for agricultural commodities which are listed as nonessential, declared surplus, and offered for sale in export trade only. These commodities are being offered with a strict provision that under no circumstance are these bargains available to the consumers in the United States or its Territories, nor are they available for purchase by foreign countries using ECA dollars.

At this point I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD the above-described bulletin.

There being no objection, the bulletin was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CCC ANNOUNCES DECEMBER EXPORT SALES PRICES FOR SURPLUS COMMODITIES

Ralph S. Trigg, President of the Commodity Credit Corporation, United States Department of Agriculture, today announced the prices at which approximate quantities of the Corporation's commodity holdings will be available to commercial exporters for export sale during the month of December 1950. The following commodities will be available during the month: Dried whole eggs, nonfat dry milk solids, raw linseed oil, flaxseed, dry edible beans, dry edible peas, Austrian winter pea seed, wheat, oats, barley, corn, grain sorghums, potato starch, fresh Irish potatoes, and gum rosin.

The list, which varies from month to month as additional commodities become available, or commodities formerly available are dropped, is designed to aid in moving CCC's excess inventories into export through regular commercial channels. By knowing in advance the commodities and quantities that are available, private exporters are in position to develop export sales before the commodities are actually purchased from CCC.

Since the beginning of the program, in January of this year, sales for export, reported through November 23, totaled $77,374,780, covering the following commodities:

Commodity	Quantity	Dollar value
Mexican canned meat pounds	30,242,260	$2,747,977

[1] Includes sales only through April 1950. In May this commodity was dropped from sales list and sold "as available."

The December list of commodities, the approximate quantities for sale, the points where available, and the export sales prices, are given below. Sales are restricted to buyers not using ECA dollars or other funds of the United States Government, but commodities for which the sales prices are not less than the domestic market price on the date of sale may be resold to buyers using such funds.

The CCC will entertain offers from prospective buyers for the purchase of any commodity on the current list. Offers accepted by CCC will be subject to the terms and conditions prescribed by the Corporation. These terms include payment by cash or irrevocable letter of credit before delivery of the commodity, and the conditions require removal of the commodity from CCC storage within a reasonable period of time and proof of exportation.

Announcements containing all terms and conditions of sale will be furnished upon request. Interested persons are invited to communicate with the Production and Marketing Administration, USDA, Washington 25, D. C., with respect to all commodities.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I wish to call particular attention to the fact that included in the bulletin are 100,000,000 bushels of wheat, 100,000,000 bushels of corn, and millions of bushels of other grains. They are all listed as surplus. At the same time that they are being classified as surplus and nonessential the Department of Agriculture is asking for greater production, and the Price Administrator has said this week he would consider setting price controls on such commodities in order to hold down the price. Nevertheless they are still being declared surplus and nonessential.

In this bulletin it will be noted that under this surplus-disposal program, the sales since January through November 23, 1950, total $77,374,780. As of June 23, immediately prior to the outbreak of war in Korea, the sales under this program for the first 6 months totaled only $11,366,648.

Immediately following the outbreak of the war in Korea and during the succeeding months, export sales under this surplus disposal program jumped an average of over 600 percent, and it is significant that the sales during the month of November jumped an average of 1,300 percent over the average sales for the 6 months prior to the outbreak of the war in Korea.

The dollar sales recorded do not tell the full story since they do not reflect the losses which were sustained on some of these commodities.

For instance, in this $77,000,000 reported as sales there is reflected only the amount we received in payment and not the cost of the goods to the American taxpayers.

As an example I call attention to the fact that the 4,801,385 bags of potatoes, 100 pounds each, were sold at an average price of 1 penny per bag, and the amount reflected in the receipt column is only $48,014.

This is an extreme example, but nevertheless in each instance the total volume is reflected only as the amount received and in practically all cases the sales price was substantially below the cost of the items.

I call attention again to the fact that these commodities which are being offered for export are not a part of the agricultural commodities which are being shipped to Europe under the ECA program.

It is almost beyond comprehension that we find our Government through the Commodity Credit Corporation today, 5 months after the beginning of the Korean War, still liquidating its inventories under the classification "surplus and nonessential."

This is particularly hard to understand when we find that the same Government agency, the Department of Agriculture, only yesterday issued an appeal to the American farmers to put forth an all-out effort to increase their production of these same agriculture commodities in 1951 by at least 10 percent.

I fully recognize that if these commodities are held in reserve at this time and if during the subsequent months the war clouds were to vanish, our Government would not realize as much money in their sale as it would under the existing circumstances. However, the difference in the price which we would receive for these commodities today and that which we would receive in the event of world peace 1 year from now, is a small amount to pay for this country's security.

On the other hand, if the war clouds continue and we become involved in a third world war, the vast inventories of agricultural commodities in this country which we had on hand at the beginning of the Korean episode would prove a godsend.

At a time when our country is being threatened by an outside aggressor, with the cost of living reaching an all-time high, with price controls being considered on all food and agricultural products, and at a time when every sensible and loyal American recognizes that we must conserve our resources, there is absolutely no possible justification for the existing policy of treating these inventories as "surplus and nonessential."

It is inexcusable that this administration, through the Department of Agriculture, while under the threat of war clouds, should continue stripping the American cupboard bare and distributing our resources to the far corners of the earth.

To further emphasize the contradiction of this dumping program, I call your attention to the fact that only today the Congress is being asked to appropriate about $17,000,000 to be used in the replenishing of our stockpiles of strategic materials and in the rebuilding of our national defense.

Also, we are proposing to draft millions of American boys in the Army. These drastic measures are being authorized on the assumption that there is a grave threat of another world war.

Yet we still find the same administration which is advocating these wartime measures conducting its activities in the Department of Agriculture as if there were no threat either of inflation or of war.

In order that the Members of Congress might better realize the gigantic scale upon which our reserves are being depleted through international bargain sales, I shall summarize these offerings, reduced in terms of carload lots, basis 50 tons for each car.

Remember all of these are still classified as surplus.

First. Two thousand four hundred carloads dried milk solids, or 240,000,000 pounds.

Second. Five thousand carloads raw linseed oil, or 529,000,000 pounds, representing 66,000,000 gallons.

Third. One thousand one hundred and twenty carloads bulk flaxseed, or 2,000,000 bushels.

Fourth. Nine hundred and twenty carloads dried pinto beans, or 92,000,000 pounds.

Fifth. Two hundred and fifty carloads dried pea beans, or 25,000,000 pounds.

Sixth. Five hundred and seventy carloads dried red kidney beans, or 57,000,000 pounds.

Seventh. One thousand three hundred and seventy carloads Great Northern dried beans, or 137,000,000 pounds.

Eighth. One hundred and twenty-six carloads dried pink beans, or 12,600,000 pounds.

Ninth. One hundred and fifty carloads dried baby lima beans, or 15,000,000 pounds.

Tenth. Six hundred carloads dried edible peas, or 60,000,000 pounds.

Eleventh. Seventy-three carloads Austrian winter pea seed, or 7,300,000 pounds.

Twelfth. Sixty thousand carloads wheat, or 100,000,000 bushels.

Thirteenth. Three thousand seven hundred carloads oats, or 11,675,000 bushels.

Fourteenth. Fifteen thousand carloads barley, or 28,300,000 bushels.

Fifteenth. Fifty-six thousand carloads corn, or 100,000,000 bushels.

Sixteenth. Sixteen thousand carloads grain sorghum, or 1,600,000,000 pounds.

Seventeenth. Fifty-four carloads potato starch, or 5,460,000 pounds.

Eighteenth. An unspecified quantity of fresh Irish potatoes, listed as available at a price of 1 cent per hundredweight at the farm.

Nineteenth. Four hundred carloads gum rosin, or 80,000 drums.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. FREAR. I think the Senator made reference to fresh Irish potatoes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. Does not the senior Senator from Delaware think the unspecified quantity will be higher in the next few months than it was when the present figures were prepared?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In this bulletin issued on December 1 they did not place any figure or quantity with reference to surplus potatoes. They listed potatoes as an unspecified amount. That is the language they used. Apparently the potatoes which are being offered are potatoes which are now coming from the State of Maine, and they are being sold as fast as they are received. Apparently they do not know how many they will have, and therefore they did not specify the amount of potatoes which are to be offered. They did say it would be a substantial quantity.

Mr. FREAR. Does it not seem to the senior Senator from Delaware that there may be good reason for using the term "unspecified amount" or "unspecified quantity"?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In view of the fact that they used specified amounts with respect to other commodities, it would seem to me that the reason for using the reference to an unspecified amount was because they did not know how many potatoes they would get from the State of Maine, although they estimated it would be in the millions of pounds. Prior to this, they had sold 4,000,000 bags of potatoes at a penny a bag.

Mr. FREAR. Does not the senior Senator from Delaware think it is reasonable to assume that the quantity will be so high that public opinion in this country on the potato issue will be what it was about 12 months ago?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Unless I miss my guess, public opinion will not only be the same with reference to potatoes, but there will also be public resentment to any agricultural commodity's being classified as surplus or nonessential when at the same time the Government is asking Congress to give them power to put price controls on such commodities in order to hold down the price. At the same time, they are calling on farmers for an all-out increase in production of the same commodities which are classified as surplus and nonessential. To make matters worse, we are losing hundreds of millions of dollars annually on the disposal program.

Mr. FREAR. I thank the Senator, and I thoroughly agree with him.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There are also 210 carloads of dried eggs representing 63,000,000 dozen in shell form. Altogether this accounts for approximately 160,000 carloads of agricultural commodities, most of which are nonperishable.

It is estimated that there are about 110 freight cars to the mile. If they were all put into one train they would make a solid train of surplus commodities reaching from Independence, Mo., to the White House. Instead of calling it the Missouri mule train, it should be called the international gravy train.

In addition to the sales of agriculture commodities through export, substantial quantities of our inventories as of June 30 have been sold to domestic merchants, who in turn have redistributed the goods through domestic channels or export.

That portion of sales which has been made to domestic dealers does not affect the over-all national supply since the goods if sold to domestic dealers, would still be in this country and available to the American people.

However, it does make a great difference when these inventories are sold for export either directly by the Government or indirectly through private exporters.

Of course those commodities which are perishable must be moved in some form, but the perishable commodities represent but a small percentage of the over-all sales and offerings covered by the list of December 1.

A major percentage of the commodities which have been declared surplus as of December 1 and offered for resale—export only—are nonperishable commodities and commodities which could readily prove essential to our national welfare in the event of war or of an unexpected crop failure.

Reserve supplies of wheat, cotton, wool, corn, linseed oil, dried beans, and all other types of grains are just as essential to our national defense program as are guns and planes. These, nonperishable items should be stockpiled particularly in the face of a grave international crisis—even more so than some items which are currently on the stockpiling list.

I have previously called attention to how our Government during the recent months declared surplus and disposed of a huge inventory of wool at a loss to the taxpayers of around $25,000,000. Now they are proposing to replenish this inventory at an increased cost of more than 50 percent over its sales price.

Cotton: Since the outbreak of war in Korea on June 25 our Government has liquidated its holdings of approximately $600,000,000 worth of cotton. Large quantities of this cotton which have been sold since the outbreak of war have been exported from this country with the result that today our Government finds itself extremely short of this critical war material as was pointed out yesterday by the Secretary of Agriculture, when he appealed to the southern farmers to increase their acreage in 1951. Yet we have completely liquidated the 3,500,000 bales of cotton from the inventory which we had June 30, 1950, valued at approximately $600,000,000. A substantial amount of that cotton has been exported.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR] has called the attention of the country to the fact that substantial quantities of other war materials have been exported from this country to China since the outbreak in Korea, and the country as a whole has been rather critical of the shipping companies which have been named as transporters of these goods.

I made the statement previously—and I am sure the Senator from Maryland will agree with me—that while we do not excuse any American shipping company from their obligation to reject shipments to China under the wartime conditions existing since June 1950, we are not so much interested in the names of the shipping companies who were acting as common carriers but in the names of the exporting firms and manufacturers in America who were attempting to profiteer by selling war materials to an enemy of our country in time of war.

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. O'CONOR. I am in entire agreement with the statement just made by the Senator from Delaware. So far as investigations have progressed thus far, I do not feel that the entire blame rests upon the shipping companies. It is unquestionably true, as the senior Senator from Delaware has just stated, that when those carriers are presented with licensed items for transportation, items with respect to which approval has already been received from the Government, they are faced with a difficult situation. When manufacturers undertake to make the shipments, it is understandable that the shipping companies face that situation, and may not, therefore, be entirely to blame. I quite agree that the Senator has very properly stated the situation.

While I am on my feet, I should like to pay tribute to the senior Senator from Delaware for the painstaking study he has made of this particular subject matter. I express the hope that the subject will be thoroughly investigated.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am sure that under the leadership of the Senator from Maryland the subject will be investigated, because I know that the committee of which he will be the chairman, and of which I am hoping to be a member, intends to go into this question. I believe that that is one of the main things the American people want to know. They want to know who is responsible for these shipments. The shipments are going out of this country with the endorsement and blessing of our Government. We should know the names of the Government officials who are endorsing these shipments, and the departments in which they operate. Perhaps we should know the reasons why they endorse them.

I should like to point out, as I have stated before, that at the outbreak of war we had 3,500,000 bales of cotton on hand with the Government, which was a very good stockpile with which to enter a national emergency. About $600,000,000 of the money of the American taxpayers was invested in this reserve. Since June 1950 that reserve has been liquidated, with the exception of a little less than $20,000,000 worth of cotton.

The exports from this country are as follows: During the month of June we exported 740,533 bales; during the month of July we exported 265,000 bales; August, 355,000 bales; September, 372,000 bales; October, 283,000 bales, or a total of over 2,000,000 bales. The value of these exports since the outbreak of the war in June exceeds $371,813,000, not including the large quantities for which export license have been granted since October.

On September 8 the Government put in export controls over cotton. One would think that the Government was going to stop the exports, but it seems that it was merely desired to channel the exports to those whom the Government wanted to handle the business. Since export licenses have been put into effect, the allocations requested for cotton exports have increased. On October 10, the Department of Agriculture approved the allocation of 2,000,000 bales of cotton for export. On November 2 it approved the allocation of 146,000 bales. On November 7 it approved the allocation of 1,350,000 bales of cotton. The Department of Agriculture approved the allocation of this cotton for export on the assumption that cotton was not a strategic material and was not essential to our national welfare. Any man in his right senses knows that cotton is an essential wartime commodity. The country recognizes that there is a great shortage of cotton at this time.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Does the Senator from Delaware have any information as to whether any of this cotton which has been shipped abroad has been sent behind the iron curtain, to any country which is in conflict with our desire for world peace?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am coming to that. Some of this cotton, unfortunately, has gone to China and other communistic controlled countries. As I have stated before, I do not know to what countries the wheat, corn, beans, potatoes, and other commodities were exported. I refer to those which have been exported since the outbreak of the war. However, it is an established fact that substantial quantities of cotton and other essential war materials of which there is a critical shortage in this country have been exported since the outbreak of war in Korea. A substantial quantity of cotton has been going behind the iron curtain, and even direct to China.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, does the distinguished Senator from Delaware have any information as to whether or not reports have been made to the proper agency and to the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of what has actually been transported since the outbreak of the Korean War in this respect?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not being a member of the Agricultural Committee, I am unable to answer that question. I will say that it took quite a while to dig out this much information. So it must not have been too much of an open book so far as the Senate is generally recognized.

We know of six shipments involving 50,000,000 pounds of cotton which have been exported to Manchuria and Red China direct since the outbreak of the war in Korea. How much more through rerouting I am unable to say. These shipments from this country to China have been with the full knowledge of the administration officials. They were made from New Orleans during the months immediately following the outbreak of the Korean episode. These shipments were made from allocations directly from the Commodity Credit Corporation's inventory, with the full knowledge and consent of that agency, to the exporting concern with the understanding they were going to Red China.

These shipments were as follows:

Date	Amount exported (bales)	Destination
July 13, 1950 (2 shipments)	13,000	Dairen, Manchuria.
	1,857	Do.
July 17, 1950	7,520	Do.
Aug. 7, 1950 (2 shipments)	3,946	Do.
	10,127	Do.
Aug. 21, 1950	3,615	Tientsin-Taku Bar, China.
Aug. 24, 1950 (2 shipments)	800	Do.
	2,839	Dairen, Manchuria.
Aug. 28, 1950	4,859	Do.
Total	48,563

Do not forget that these were allocated by the Commodity Credit Corporation to this export concern to go to China and Manchuria under these contracts after we had gotten into the war with China.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Does the distinguished Senator from Delaware have any information that would throw any light upon the proposition of why these shipments of somewhat critical material, such as cotton, would be made after war was under way? Does the Senator have any explanation as to how that came about?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I talked with the Department officials, and they said their excuse for shipping this was that prior to the outbreak of war in Korea they had entered into negotiations with China and Manchuria, by which they were to send them certain amounts of cotton in return for soybeans. These soybeans, as Senators know, are not strategic war materials, and can be bought freely. They said that after the war—or rather, after the police action broke out in Korea—since it was not recognized by the Government as a war, they felt that they were to a certain extent honor bound to continue these shipments and complete their agreements.

Of course, I fail to understand that, because prior to June 24 we also had a gentlemen's agreement that we would not shoot the Chinese or North Koreans, and that they would not shoot us, but that gentlemen's agreement was broken after June 24, as any American soldier in Korea will tell you.

It is ironic to note that the cotton used to fill these orders was allocated to the exporting firm by the Commodity Credit Corporation, who at the time knew that the shipments of cotton were going to Manchuria and Red China.

Altogether approximately $370,000,000 worth of cotton was exported from this country, a substantial portion of which was accounted for by Government sales, how much, if any, of the other commodities mentioned have been exported to China or other communistic countries, either directly or through rerouting in transit, I am unable to say at this time. I am advised by the Department officials that it will take some time for them to compile the information, but I shall insist that this information be furnished to the committee.

I am advised that the customary procedure to follow in licensing the export of these commodities is that the exporting firm will put on his shipping statement that he is guaranteeing to ship the commodity to X country. There seems to be no follow-through to see that the shipment goes to that country. The main thing the Government agency seems to endeavor to ascertain by its follow-through is that the commodity is shipped out of the country. There does not seem to be too much of a check here as to whether or not the commodity is rerouted in transit or what finally happens to it. One segment of our Government seems more concerned about stripping the American cupboard bare and getting rid of these commodities and getting them out of the domestic markets.

With $600,000,000 worth of cotton being sold at domestic prices and under the threat of export controls the market naturally was not as high as the world market. Following the sale of that cotton to the American cotton merchants, export releases were made of 3,500,000 bales whereby that cotton could be exported out of this country into a world market which averaged about 20 to 30 percent higher than the domestic market. The profits which automatically accrue to the firms which bought this cotton prior to the allocation of these export licenses run into the hundreds of millions of dollars, and I am determined to find out who made this profit.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Does the Senator from Delaware have information as to the names of the concerns to whom these sales were made?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have the names of one or two of the concerns, which I would rather not give at this time for certain reasons. The only exporter whose name I am going to reveal at this particular time is the Government itself. I think the American people are entitled to know the names of all manufacturers in this country, exporters, or any business concerns, that have been trading with the enemy since June 24. They are entitled to know the names of all Government officials or agencies who have condoned this practice. I think the American people are especially entitled to know that one agency of the Government itself, namely, the Commodity Credit Corporation, is guilty. So I do not think we should be too harsh in our criticisms of some of our corporations for doing what the Government itself is doing, and that is failing to recognize that a war is going on.

I am reporting this information to the Senate and the country since I believe that each of us should know what this Government agency has been doing since June 23 while the American forces have been fighting in Korea.

I am ashamed of the fact that the name of the first exporter to be revealed as responsible for shipments of strategic materials to Red China since the outbreak of the Korean War should be an agency of the United States Government. Their effort to excuse these shipments on the basis that a contract was entered into prior to the outbreak of the war has no weight whatsoever. It is common knowledge that war cancels all prior contracts, and the mere fact that the administration has seen fit to describe the conflict in Korea as a police action instead of war in no way lessens their responsibility to see that all aid to our enemy was stopped immediately.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma in the chair). Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I have not had the pleasure of hearing all of the Senator's speech. However, I know something about the subject matter and about what is covered by his remarks. I should like to state that I am in complete sympathy with the observations the Senator has made.

It is unfortunate that at this late date we have now to begin to investigate these matters. I was proud of the fact that the Committee on Rules and Administration reported immediately the resolution providing for the creation of a special committee to investigate the very violations—as I call them—or, at least, the procedures under which the Government agencies have been operating.

Mr. President, I do not seek to take credit for what has been done; but while I am on my feet I wish to say that I am sure some Senators will remember the determined fight which has been made in the past 2 or 3 years by distinguished Senators. At one time a resolution was signed by some 53 or 55 Senators, calling for an investigation of the shipment of strategic materials to Russian satellite countries; and Senators asked that such shipments at least come within the provisions of our own export controls. I refer now to the goods which were shipped from the United States to Russian satellite countries, under the reciprocal trade agreements and bilateral agreements.

As long as 2 years ago it was pointed out that Russia and the satellite countries were obtaining strategic materials, which were being sent from the United States, at the expense of the American taxpayers, to the ECA countries. Now we find that those goods have been used to make the very bullets that are killing our boys in Korea.

Certainly it is most regrettable that the horse is out of the barn. The failure of those in charge of the foreign relations of our country to act effectively to stop the flow of war materials to Russia and her satellites is one of the contributing causes of the national emergency that now confronts the United States. We are reaping the whirlwind of many failures in foreign policy.

I think it behooves the next Congress—for it looks as if the present Congress is about to end its session—to appropriate the money required for the investigations which I hope will be conducted by the very able Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR] under the provisions of the resolution, so that this matter will be investigated, and so that these infringements and violations, as I call them, will be terminated by the Government. Certainly some new procedures should be entered into.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thank the Senator from Nebraska for his statement. I know that on numerous occasions during the past few years he has led the fight to stop the shipment of such strategic materials to Russia and her satellite countries. I also wish to join him in paying tribute to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR], because I think the action of the Senator from Maryland in calling our attention to the fact that such strategic materials were leaving this country and were going to China is certainly one of the greatest contributions which has been made by any Senator, and I am proud of what he has done. I shall join him in the future in all attempts to get to the bottom of this problem and to stop these shipments.

Mr. WHERRY. I hope the Senator will remember the names of all of the 55 Senators who signed the resolution, and that the Senator will especially recall the work done by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. KEM], who about a year ago compiled many statistics in regard to the shipments of strategic materials. That job was a very difficult one, because it was almost impossible to obtain those statistics from the Government agencies. However, the junior Senator from Missouri did a masterful job in reporting that information to the Members of the Senate and to the people of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thank the Senator. Many shipments have been made. However, even as of today the Government is declaring 60,000 carloads, or 100,000,000 bushels, of wheat to be a nonessential, surplus commodity, and 100,000,000 bushels of corn to be a nonessential, surplus commodity. They are offered for export, except that they cannot be sent to ECA countries as a substitute for ECA funds.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I do not wish the Senator to misunderstand what I said.

When I said the horse is out of the barn, I was referring to what the investigation will reveal.

However, the point is that when this matter was pointed out 2 years ago, and then was very forcibly called to the attention of the Senate, we were very much better off in respect to that situation than we are now.

I am totally in sympathy with the resolution, and I favor it. We reported it from the Committee on Rules and Administration the same day it was called to our attention. The resolution has already been agreed to and the committee has been set up to hold hearings until January 31, at which time it will be necessary to request a new authorization for the committee. I certainly hope the Senate will support the request at that time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thank the Senator, and the country would have been much better off today had the administration heeded the advice of the Senators from Nebraska and Missouri in checking the shipment of these strategic materials.

Mr. President, I think the Government should put an immediate end to the exporting and declaring as surplus of any agricultural commodities, particularly those which are not perishable. I think there is no excuse at all for the classification of a long list of agricultural nonperishable commodities as surplus and exportable. It is absolutely inexcusable for this Government, since the outbreak of war, to have completely liquidated its cotton holdings, comprising approximately $600,000,000, and to have agreed, as it has, to the exportation of practically all that cotton from this country, when we need it here in the United States, and when at the same time the Government has been calling for the farmers of the United States to increase their production.

I think the greatest contribution this Government could make to the war effort would be to have a Cabinet meeting downtown and for those in charge of the executive departments to make up their minds whether we are in war or out of war. If we are in war, then let the Government itself begin to make its contribution to the war effort.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. I wonder whether the Senator from Delaware saw in the New York Herald Tribune of this morning the report headed as follows:

Hong Kong Sees United States Embargo as a Peril to It—Colony Charges That Curb Will Strangle Trade and Provide Red Propaganda.

The article is by Homer Bigart, a special correspondent to the New York Herald Tribune.

The first part of the article reads as follows:

HONG KONG, December 20.—Faced with possible economic ruin by the American embargo on shipments to Red China, this British colony, grown incredibly fat on record trade profits of the past 2 years, is trying with pathetic intensity to believe that everything is going to be all right.

The initial reaction to the embargo was one of bitterness against the United States. That was perfectly normal, since this colony lives by trade and at least one-fourth of its business is with Communist China. If the embargo and Peking's retaliatory measures are effective, Hong Kong stands to lose the equivalent of nearly $800,000,000 a year.

A similar article appears in the New York Times, Mr. President.

I shall not read further from the article. However, let me state that it appeared that last year there was done from Hong Kong, largely with Red China, over $1,000,000,000 worth of business.

Is it the idea of the Senator from Delaware that the impact of those shipments, in terms of the attacks upon our boys in Korea, may be a matter of very vital concern?

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is no question at all about that. I may say that in addition to the shipments I have mentioned, substantial quantities of cotton have been shipped to Hong Kong. When I referred to shipments made to China I was not referring to shipments going to Hong Kong, but I was then referring only to shipments going directly to China. Although there is no question but that shipments made to Hong Kong eventually go to Red China, yet such shipments are made under the guise of sending materials to the British colony of Hong Kong. I think it is past time that all such shipments were stopped.

Mr. President, I shall ask unanimous consent to have inserted at this point in the RECORD, immediately following my remarks, a chart which outlines the exports of cotton from the United States between June and October of this year. These figures are the latest I have been able to obtain.

These exports are broken down by countries. The figures are presented both in terms of bales and in terms of dollar volume. They represent exports of 2,017,687 bales, or about two-thirds of the inventory in the hands of the Commodity Credit Corporation as of June 30, 1950, and they represent a sales volume of $371,813,000.

I now ask that these statistics be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statistics were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

United States exports of raw cotton—June to October 1950

COMMENTS ON THE ADDRESS TO THE NATION BY HERBERT HOOVER

Mr. MORSE obtained the floor.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I have been seeking recognition in order that I might begin the debate on the civil defense bill.

Mr. MORSE. I do not think I shall be very long in making the speech, but I should like to exercise my right to make it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair wishes to say to Senators that there is on the desk before him a list of Senators desiring to speak, which list the Chair has been endeavoring to follow.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I rise, with a great deal of temerity, to discuss extemporaneously various questions of foreign policy which were raised last night in a speech by a great American. I find myself in agreement with a great many parts of the speech. I find myself in disagreement with certain assumptions which I think were made in President Hoover's speech, which are false assumptions. I feel free to discuss his speech because as he has pointed out in the speech itself, debate on foreign policy is very desirable. Therefore, Mr. President, in these extemporaneous remarks I wish to present at least a point of view on foreign policy which I think I owe it to myself to make clear for the record.

In view of the fact that this is a purely extemporaneous speech, I shall not yield during the course of the speech, because what it really represents is the junior Senator from Oregon thinking aloud on vital questions of foreign policy, as he sees them, which have been raised by former President Hoover's speech. The junior Senator from Oregon has not had the time since the deliverance of the Hoover speech to prepare a manuscript, which would protect him as to the continuity of his remarks in case of interruption as he proceeded; therefore, he will not yield at any time during the speech, until he finishes it. He will then be very glad to yield for such questions as his colleagues may wish to ask him.

At the outset I wish to say that in my opinion, it is incumbent upon my party, the minority party, which, in recent months and in recent days in this session of Congress, has been taking stands on foreign policy in conflict with what we thought was a bipartisan—nonpartisan foreign policy, to come forward with a specific foreign policy program of its own. I register a strong dissent from the notion that it is the primary duty of the minority party merely to take a negative, critical attitude toward the foreign policy of the present administration. I think that if the leaders of the Republican Party do not wish to support the foreign policy program of the present administration, they owe it to the American people to specify wherein they except and to offer constructively and affirmatively their substitute proposals on each one of the issues in regard to which they take exception with the administration. Certainly in an hour that is so dark and critical as this, my great party, the Republican Party, cannot justify standing before the American people and saying "We ask you to support us, because we oppose the foreign policy of the administration, in part or in whole," and then refuse to tell the American people exactly and specifically and affirmatively what substitutions they would make for any part of the program of the administration.

I desire to make it very clear that in these extemporaneous remarks I speak only for myself; but I honestly believe, in presenting the views I express here this afternoon that there will be found support for them among millions of Americans and among millions of voters within the Republican Party and among millions of voters within the ranks of the independents, as well as among the Democratic voters of the country. I desire to say again as I have said so many times in the past, that in my judgment we are dealing here with an issue so vital to the very survival of America that the challenge of statesmanship which confronts everyone who holds office in these days is to rise above the level of partisan politics and take the great question of foreign policy to the heights of statesmanship. We should keep faith with the principles of the platforms of both major parties of 1948 when, in essence, they pledged themselves that partisanship would stop at the water's edge so far as foreign policy was concerned.

I do not speak for him this afternoon, Mr. President, but I would, in my humble way, honor him this afternoon and pay tribute to him, when I say that, in my judgment, one of the great statesman in the field of foreign policy in the past decade has been the great giant from the State of Michigan, the senior Senator from that State, Mr. ARTHUR VANDENBERG. And I think it is well in this hour of crisis that my party, the Republican Party, review again the basic tenets of the doctrines on foreign policy which the giant statesman from Michigan has so valiantly presented and defended and promulgated in this body in a series of historic speeches, and which he has exemplified and sought to implement as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, under the leadership of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] when the Democrats have been in a majority, and under his own brilliant leadership during the Eightieth Congress, when my party was in power. As I have thought through these great problems of foreign policy during the past critical weeks, I have tried to answer with complete intellectual honesty this question: "What vote that you have cast on foreign policy since you have been in the Senate of the United States would you now change, not on the basis of the facts you had then, but on the basis of the facts you have now?"

To my way of thinking that is the acid test. O Mr. President, each one of us can say, in a spirit of rationalization, that on the basis of the facts we had when we cast our vote we would still stand by that vote, but I think the acid test of the voting record of each one of us is this: How would you vote now on the same issue, if, ab initio, this were the first time the issue was presented to you? How would you vote now on the basis of the facts you now have?

Mr. President, there is not a single vote on a single major issue of foreign policy that I have cast during my term of office that I would change on the basis of present day facts if I were now called upon to vote.

Having said that, Mr. President, I think I have summarized and epitomized as well as I can my chief evaluation of the speech delivered last night by a great American, former President Hoover, because, on the basis of some of the assumptions set forth in that speech, if the facts supported the assumptions, I would have answered the question differently. On the basis of some of the assumptions contained in that speech, some of my votes in the past 6 years would have to be modified. However, I am satisfied that the facts do not support certain assumptions made in Hoover's speech last night.

I intend, Mr. President, later in this speech, to take specific paragraphs of former President Hoover's speech of last night and tell wherein I find it impossible for me to go along with certain of his assumptions. But let me say this early in my speech, that I find myself, as the RECORD tomorrow will show, on the basis of my remarks today, in agreement with many of the major points of the Hoover speech. But, with equal clarity, let me say that I do not think the Hoover speech last night enunciates the specific points for a foreign-policy program either for the Republican Party or for the American people that either group should follow in toto. There are some statements in it which I would make a part of the Republican foreign policy if my party is going to be insistent upon establishing a Republican foreign policy in contrast with the foreign policy of the administration instead of meeting the challenge of working on a cooperative and consultative basis with the administration. I believe that so far as Republican policies are concerned, my party should raise this great issue to a level of statesmanship and support one foreign policy for the United States, a foreign policy around which all leaders of America can gather and which they can in unity and unison support.

In fact, Mr. President, in comparison of the Hoover speech last night with the speech delivered a few nights ago by the titular head of the Republican Party, the Governor of New York, Mr. Dewey, I would say that I think that, in the main, the Governor of New York made a much more objective and realistic speech, in view of present world conditions, than the great ex-President of our country made last night. When I say that, it is not to be interpreted that I think the Dewey speech was the complete answer as to what the Republican position should be, nor does it mean that I do not believe there should be some modifications or revisions of the Dewey speech as the basis for a foreign policy program. But there is this great difference between the two speeches: In my judgment, the Governor of New York, in his great speech, was much more realistic in connection with one all-important, vital fact than was the great former President Hoover in his speech last night. I think the speech made by the Governor of New York recognized that the security of America is dependent upon the survival of Europe to a much greater extent than that point was recognized by the former President of the United States in his speech last night.

It is because of that fundamental difference in point of view on foreign policy which I think exists within my party at this hour, that I, with great temerity, rise to speak extemporaneously of some of my views on foreign policy.

Mr. President, as I read through the Hoover speech and concluded my reading of it, I said to myself, "That would be a great speech if all the assumptions in it were true. That would be a reassuring speech, a comforting speech, a speech that would appeal to my desire to be safe and to my desire to have 160,000,000 fellow Americans safe, if all the assumptions in it were true."

Unquestionably, many of the assumptions in it are true, but in regard to the importance of Europe to the survival of America, it seems to me the great Mr. Hoover failed in the preparation of his speech to give adequate weight to certain realities which confront us in respect to Europe.

Mr. President, some days ago the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] not only on the floor of the Senate but elsewhere, expressed to those of us who always are eager to get his point of view on foreign policy—and I think this body knows the high esteem in which I hold the junior Senator from Massachusetts and the confidence I have in his thinking, leadership, and statesmanship in the field of foreign policy—the warning that we should not underestimate the importance of the Ruhr to the security of America. He made that statement before Mr. Hoover made his speech.

One of the things that concern me about some of the assumptions in the Hoover speech of last night is the great danger that psychologically it will be looked upon by many in Europe as an invitation to surrender Europe to communism. We Americans cannot take the position that we and we alone are going to dictate the terms of European cooperation. We Americans cannot take the position, from the standpoint of our own safety and survival of the freedom way of life in the world, that all the freedom-loving nations within the United Nations, who have so much at stake and so much to risk so far as the threat of spreading communism is concerned, must abide by our decisions, our wishes, and our mandates.

Mr. President, though certainly the great ex-President of the United States had no such intention—and I hope the fear I am about to voice is ill-founded, but I doubt it—I fear that there are many people in Europe who will look upon the speech as a weakening of the North Atlantic Pact. I fear that psychologically the speech will not lend strength to the North Atlantic Pact at almost the hour of the close of the Brussels Conference.

I am not in a position to say with authority how successful the Brussels Conference was. I shall have to await a full disclosure of the agreements, commitments, and understandings which were entered into. However, to the extent that I have been advised informally and unofficially, as a Member of this body I was greatly cheered today by advice and information which I received in connection with the Conference at Brussels. Such advice and information caused me to believe that great progress has been made at Brussels. The Conference apparently moved forward for a strengthening of the North Atlantic Pact. The appointment of the great American soldier and leader, Gen. Dwight Eisenhower, as the head of the North Atlantic Pact military forces is enthusiastically received by our allies in Europe. It is a great builder of morale. The conference gave every indication that our allies in Europe fully understand the importance of their cooperating with us shoulder to shoulder, manpower for manpower, industry for industry, in building up the defenses of Europe in order to meet the potentialities of a Russian attack.

I would, Mr. President, that the speech last night of the great Hoover had laid greater emphasis upon the importance of the North Atlantic Pact and the progress which has already been made in connection with the North Atlantic Pact, instead of being phrased, as it was, in terms which I feel will cause too many of our loyal and enthusiastic friends in Europe to be filled with discouragement. I fear the Hoover speech will cause too many dissident groups in Europe that are seeking to spread propaganda against us to spread further misrepresentations about the heart and soul of the American people in this fight for freedom. I fear that Russia will undertake to paint the picture that we are ready to walk out on Europe and leave her to her own protection and defenses. I fear that because of the assumption of the speech that the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans are sufficient protection for our national security if we arm the Air Force and the Navy to the teeth.

Speaking now as a member of the Committee on Armed Services, and on the basis of my knowledge as a member of that committee, but again speaking only for myself and not for the committee, I think the American people need to be told today by our Government that arming our Air Force and our Navy to the teeth is no guaranty of the ultimate security and survival of America.

The Hoover speech failed to take into account some of the military realities about which I think it is perfectly proper to speak.

The Soviet Government and its satellite forces have in being today a tremendous submarine power. In my judgment the submarine power of the Communist part of the world in being today necessitates some modification of the assumptions in the Hoover speech to the effect that we can survive safely by withdrawing into ourselves and rely upon the oceans, and our Navy and Air Force for internal security. The Hoover speech clearly implied that he thinks it would be safe for us to walk out of Europe. I think it would be a very dangerous thing to do.

Likewise, I think the great ex-President overstated his case from the standpoint of the military aspects of it, with his emphasis on the Navy and upon air power. By all means we must keep the American Navy as strong as possible, both so far as surface and undersea vessels are concerned, and we must strengthen it as quickly as possible. The record is perfectly clear that such has been my plea ever since I have been a member of the Armed Services Committee or member of the old Naval Affairs Committee. As a member of that committee I have been constantly urging and pleading for greater strengthening of the naval forces as well as the air forces and the land forces of our country.

There was another assumption in Hoover's speech of last night in which I think he overstated his case from the standpoint of our military posture. That was the assumption that with the two oceans, with the American Navy on them, plus the arming of the Air Force to the teeth, we would be secure against Russia.

He overlooked the fact that Russia, too, is arming to the teeth, both as to submarines and as to all types of air force. He overlooked the fact that the tremendous Russian air forces based both in Siberia and Manchuria, the ones in Manchuria being close to thousands of American boys at this hour, are now capable of delivering a strike of devastating proportions. That striking power will not be limited to areas of the world other than the continental United States.

I happen to be one who believes that the Russian striking forces will first be leveled at the United States, with tremendous leveling consequences on our major cities when and if it strikes. So, Mr. President, I will not be a party to a proposal which seeks to arouse in the American people a sense of security which would be a false security. I think the Hoover speech will cause many Americans to assume that they are more secure than they really are. I think it was a serious mistake for him to give the American people the view that if we direct ourselves to a maximum strengthening of our Navy and a maximum strengthening of our air forces, we have reasonable assurance of survival no matter what happens in Europe. I would emphasize, if I emphasize nothing else in these extemporaneous remarks, the point made by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] the other day, that the industrial power of the Ruhr is of vital importance to the security of America.

Comforting as a head-in-the-sand attitude may be, emotionally satisfying as wishful thinking sometimes is, I urge the American people today to evaluate very carefully and consider long what I think is the clear import of the Hoover speech of last night, that we can survive if we withdraw unto ourselves and try living unto ourselves alone with a powerful air force and a powerful navy, letting Europe go down if necessary, provided Europe does not do exactly what we desire to have it do.

I wish to be fair to the ex-President in my critical analysis of his speech. As I read portions of his speech in a moment I shall point out for the RECORD where I clearly agree with him, but also where I would urge caution on the part of the American people, who at this hour are looking for anything that will give them hope that they are going to be secure. The American people would welcome a psychological escape, but there is no escape, psychologically or otherwise, from the realities of the situation which confronts us.

In this country we have always rallied, in times of great crisis around the principle that "United we stand, divided we fall." We have rallied around it as applied to the people of the United States; but I wish to plead with the American people today to recognize that now we must rally around the principle "United we stand, divided we fall" as applied to and as encompassing our freedom loving allies abroad, because I repeat that if Europe goes down Russia will have the Ruhr. If Russia obtains the industrial war-making power of the Ruhr and the rest of Europe, with the slave labor which her police-state methods will make it easy for her to obtain, she will have the potential war-making power to drive against America, not for 1 year, but for a quarter of a century, or for so long as it will take gradually to whittle us down and finally subdue us.

I believe that the great danger which confronts America is that the plan of Stalin to isolate us from the rest of the world may prevail if Communist Russia succeeds in isolating us from Europe. Who will stand with us once Europe is down? Then we are in for a death struggle with communism. I do not think the realities support what I consider to be the false assumption in the great ex-President's speech of last night. We cannot isolate ourselves and survive.

Mr. President, I wish to emphasize in these extemporaneous remarks that I think the military implementation of the North Atlantic Pact, the allied military forces, naval, land, and air, contemplated by it, and the allied plans within it under the leadership of the great Gen. Dwight Eisenhower, presently represent the greatest defense America has. I think it is the only hope for preventing the Ruhr from falling into the hands of Russia, the only hope for preventing the industrial war-making power of our allied friends in Europe from falling into the hands of Russia. I believe this basic point—and I would call it a basic fact, because I think it is basic—must not be lost sight of by the American people. Our security and possibly our survival depends upon preventing Russia from capturing the war-making power of Europe.

It seems to me it was not given the proper emphasis in the speech by Mr. Hoover last night, but, in my opinion, it is the point that should be emphasized above all else. Thus, in this great parliamentary body in the weeks ahead as we proceed with what all evidence indicates is going to be one of the most historic debates ever held within these walls—a debate on foreign policy between sincere and patriotic men on each side of the aisle—we must not lose sight of the relation of Europe to our security. Let me say here and now for the RECORD that I have complete confidence in the patriotism and the sincerity and the motives of those within my party and within the party of the opposition with whom I do not agree as to what the objectives of our foreign policy should be. I pray they give to those of us who disagree with them credit for the same high motives of patriotism and sincerity and a desire to do anything and everything we can that the facts indicate should be done to protect the security of our freedom way of life.

Mr. President, as I interpret portions of the Hoover speech of last night I am left in doubt as to how the ex-President would have answered the question that at the beginning of my remarks I said was the acid test question, if he had been a Member of the Senate during the critical years just past, when, under the leadership of the giant from Michigan, Senator VANDENBERG, we developed what has become known as a bipartisan foreign policy.

Let us take some of those major issues. There were those of us who followed VANDENBERG, and, we hope in our humble way, helped the development of the great idea which, after all, was the basic tenet of every pronouncement he ever made on the floor of the Senate in the field of foreign policy; namely, the goal of eventually setting up a system of international justice through law. There is no hope for the survival of mankind itself, Mr. President, unless in the century to come we reach that goal. Later I shall speak further on that point. As we followed the leadership of the great Senator from Michigan we voted for the Truman doctrine in Greece. Let those who today, on the basis of the present facts, to say nothing of the facts that existed at the time we cast that vote, who now think they would not vote that way, make their position clear in the historic debate that is to come in the weeks ahead. Let them explain what they think would have happened if we had not gone to the aid of Greece.

For the junior Senator from Oregon I want the record perfectly clear that if the vote on the Truman doctrine in Greece was before the Senate today I would vote for it still. Yet in a recent campaign in my State, those who sought to defeat me because of my position on foreign policy, cited it as one of the votes which they claimed justified my defeat.

Let us move to the next great issue. Let those in my party and in the Democratic Party who are now making such a fight on foreign policy, who yet have to come forward with a constructive program of their own, but who voted for ECA, rise on the floor of the Senate in the historic debate ahead and tell the American people that if they had that vote to cast again—not on the basis of the facts that existed when they voted, but on the basis of the facts that exist today—they would vote differently.

O Mr. President, in applying this acid test I want to give them every benefit and every advantage. I want to let them meet the issue as to what they would do today on foreign-policy issues. Yet as we listen to some of their public pronouncements and as we check some of their votes within the party conference as well as their statements on the floor of the Senate, I think we are led to believe that apparently they would now change their votes on foreign-policy issues if they had an opportunity to change them. But, as for the junior Senator from Oregon, let the RECORD be perfectly clear that respecting ECA I would vote today exactly as I did when I first cast the vote. Why? Because, Mr. President, it is my opinion that Europe today would be overrun by Russian communism if it had not been for the millions upon millions of American taxpayer dollars that went to the economic rehabilitation program in Europe through ECA. I think the millions of dollars we have spent for ECA were well spent for American security and were a sound investment in freedom. In my judgment, those millions of dollars were spent at a time when it was nip and tuck in Europe, touch and go, as to whether or not Italy and France, for example, would capitulate completely to the rising tide of communism which the vicious, false, lying propaganda of the Russians was selling to the troubled minds of the people of Europe. A vicious propaganda that was used as a psychological bombardment upon their minds, developed to the point that many of us were fearful as to whether Italy and France would survive as free nations.

Oh, of course, there were wastes, there were mistakes, and many of them. There were some administration failures. But let me hasten after that sentence to add here a word of tribute to and commendation of the great Paul Hoffman who did such a statesmanlike and valiant job as the Director of the ECA. I think he is one of the great Americans of our time; a man who saw the vision of the century.

Mr. President, the great goal of this century is to establish a system of international justice through law. However, there is no hope of doing that; the possibility of it is extinct the moment Europe goes down to communism.

To my friends in the Republican Party who do not share my views on the need for a nonpartisan, coalition foreign policy, I continue to ask them the question, What chances do you think there are for a system of international justice through law in the century that is ahead of us, if Europe becomes a totalitarian state? My answer to that question is, "None."

That is why, Mr. President, I say that one of the basic assumptions of the speech Mr. Hoover made last night—namely, the return to the concept that the Atlantic and the Pacific Oceans can protect us and keep us secure—constitutes an overstatement on his part. I think he failed to evaluate correctly the significance of the industrial war-making power of Europe and the threat of that war-making power to the United States once it falls into Russian hands. We must prevent that threat to our security from occurring. Russia must not be allowed to get the Ruhr.

Mr. President, at this point in my remarks I wish to say that the American people should not overlook the fact that a great revolution is going on in the world. A little later I shall say something about the attitudes of our allies in Europe. Our allies in Europe should not forget that there is going on in the world a great revolution which will probably last 100 years before there will be reached a point of social and political equilibrium that will permit of the successful operation of a system of international justice through law. That revolution is the revolution of the colored masses as well as suppressed and exploited peoples of all color of the world for a better way of life. At the present time it is not a revolution involving a political ideology. For the most part, those millions are illiterate, ignorant, uninformed, with little understanding, if any, as to the distinctions between the great political system of democracy and systems of totalitarianism. They are millions of human beings who for the most part are motivated by their feelings and their instincts, their desire to survive, and their recognition that, after all, they have a right to a better way of life. They are going to struggle and to fight, if necessary, for food and shelter and clothing and security for their offspring. That is one of the great realities of the time in which we live. I fear that Hoover failed to give it sufficient consideration when he prepared his speech.

Mr. President, that revolution is rather basic, so far as its instinctive motivations are concerned. That revolution is going on, and nothing can stop it. I think it is an inevitable part of the evolution of mankind itself.

In that revolution we Americans have a tremendous stake. We have a stake so important that I think the outcome of that revolution in the coming century will determine the destiny of America itself. If in the midst of that revolution we play a short-sighted policy and if we proceed to allow the totalitarian states to capitalize, by means of their propaganda, upon an American policy which supports either colonialism or imperialism in the backward areas of the world, I fear that at the end of that revolution we may find ourselves with the colored masses of the world alined against us. As they improve their industrial power, as their standard of living gradually rises during the course of that revolution—as I believe will be the inevitable result—we had better find ourselves on one side of the colored masses of the world, and not aligned against them. Therefore, Mr. President, I think that in the century ahead we Americans are going to have to take freedom to them and manifest it, in the first place, in the form of economic freedom. That is why I have been heard to say, and why I have repeated here today, for the purposes of emphasis, that before we can instill an understanding of the ways of democracy in the minds of the colored masses of the world who are in revolution, we have to pay some attention to their empty stomachs.

That is why I have felt that the point 4 program is so important. Incidentally, it is not alone a Democratic program; in fact, I think one of the paradoxes involved in the discussion we are having today in this country is that the basic principles of the point 4 program were germinated and generated in the administration of a great former President of the United States, Herbert Hoover. If we study the policies of his administration, both when he was a great leader as Secretary of Commerce, and later as President of the United States, we find that he understood the importance of bringing to the backward peoples of the world an improved economic status, a better way of life. We see that he recognized the importance of putting into practice the great Christian principle that we are our brother's keeper, and that political democracy itself is bottomed upon and rests upon great religious tenets, all of which flow to the basic principle that a society of free men believes in protecting the dignity of the individual.

Mr. President, you cannot study our constitutional debates, you cannot study the biographies of our constitutional fathers, you cannot analyze the Constitution and the Declaration of Independence, you cannot fully understand the rich meaning of the San Francisco Charter, without recognizing that the American people, from the birth of our Nation to this day, have always dedicated themselves to the proposition that, under our system of self-government, we seek to protect the dignity of the individual. We must apply that ideal in our foreign policy. We must apply it in connection with our relationships to backward countries. Therefore, most politely but with great sincerity of purpose, I would say to my friends in Great Britain, in France, in Holland, and in the other allied countries, "We who are ready to make a fight for the freedom way of life need to recognize that imperialism and colonialism in the world are through, and that we only play into the hands of Communist propaganda, if in our foreign policy we follow a course of action which seeks to perpetuate in any degree colonialism and imperialism." That means that in developing our foreign policy, we should exercise much greater care than we have in the past, in seeing to it that we do not in the countries to which we seek to bring aid place our stamp of approval upon reactionary economic, social, and political policies and thereby allow our action to be interpreted as favoring a perpetuation of exploitation of the weak through imperialism and colonialism.

In furtherance of that basic principle, let me say, particularly in view of some discussion which took place on the floor of the Senate earlier this afternoon, that I think in the years gone by we should have been emptying thousands upon thousands of tons of food which is surplus in America into empty stomachs abroad rather than into empty Government bins, when our Government knew that from 20 to 60 percent of such surplus foodstuffs would be wasted by becoming unfit for human consumption before they ever came out of the bins. I think we should have exchanged such foodstuffs for good will, if that is all we could have exchanged them for. But we know, Mr. President, that thousands of tons of food could have been exchanged, in years gone by, for strategic materials. Such an exchange would have placed us in a stronger position today in this great fight for freedom around the world, and would have been one of the most effective answers we could have given to the voice of Russia which has bombarded the air waves of the world with its lying, false representations against us. The former President of the United States very correctly deplored last night in his speech the lying tactics of Russia.

Mr. President, what I am trying to say is that we, the people of the United States, are going to have to demonstrate to the other peoples of the world that we intend to practice our democratic principles, that we intend to put into practice the spiritual meanings of democracy, that we intend to translate into action our faith in the dignity of the individual and our resolve to set up, in the century of struggle ahead, a system of international justice through law, under which great issues of international conflict can be settled through the processes of adjudication, rather than through a contest of armaments.

I believe we need to demonstrate to the world that we stand ready and willing to execute, along with all other countries, including Russia—and necessarily Russia must be included—a true disarmament program, as one of the steps which eventually must be taken if peace is to replace war in the relations of mankind. If in the century ahead we do not so develop a system of international justice through law that peace can replace war as an instrument for settling disputes among nations, then I think I make no overstatement when I say that I seriously doubt the survival of freedom in the world. However, talk of disarmament today is but wishful thinking, so long as Russia commits one aggression after another.

Now, Mr. President, with these as general principles, outlining at least my philosophy in regard to the approach which I think we ought to take in our foreign policy, I desire to turn to certain very specific arguments and proposals made in the Hoover speech last night. Let me insert at this point a conclusion to the argument which I began a few moments ago, and from which I digressed. I had come to the point of ECA, and I asked the question, "How many who voted for ECA would now, on the basis of facts as they exist today, change their votes? I placed myself on record as one who would not. Let us now move into the next great specific proposal which has characterized our bipartisan foreign policy. Bipartisan foreign policy must not become to the American people merely a name or a label. As leaders in the Congress, we have the obligation of taking to the American people point by point the platform, indeed, the specific planks of the platform of our bipartisan foreign policy.

The next great milestone in its development was the North Atlantic Pact. On the basis of conditions as they exist today—not only as they existed when the vote for the pact was cast, but as they exist today—how many of those on the Republican side of this aisle, who are now apparently so critical of the foreign policy of the United States, but who voted for the North Atlantic Pact, would vote differently today? The junior Senator from Oregon wants the RECORD to show that he would cast the same vote today on the North Atlantic Pact that he cast when the vote was taken.

The next great step in the development of the so-called bipartisan foreign policy was the military implementation of the pact about which a series of international conferences have been held and in regard to which, primarily, the recent conference in Brussels was held. How many of my Republican colleagues who, in their public statements, are now so critical about the bipartisan foreign policy, who voted for the military implementation of the pact, would change their vote today on the basis of facts as they today exist, if they were given such an opportunity? Let them speak out, Mr. President, when the debate proceeds at the beginning of the next session of Congress, because their votes are a matter of record.

The American people are entitled to know from them "What do you, as Republicans, propose to substitute for the record which a majority of the Republicans made in the Senate of the United States under the leadership of the great giant from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] and how does it differ from the specific proposals for which you voted?"

I repeat, Mr. President, that an obligation rests upon my party not only to criticize the specific things with which it disagrees—and I would it would be more specific in its criticism—but the obligation also rests on the Republican Party to come forward with a specific program on the very issues which now, apparently, through the hindsight of some, they would change if they were in power.

If the specific proposals in the Hoover speech are to be the foreign policy of the Republican Party, then let us formally tell the American people so, and, in keeping with our democratic processes of a free ballot, let them in due course of time, when the opportunity presents itself exercise their choice. But, as for me, Mr. President, I would again vote for the military implementation of the North Atlantic Pact. Mr. Hoover said last night that there is a clear obligation upon the people of Europe to do their share, and in that I am in complete agreement. But I feel that the North Atlantic Pact and its implementation is the greatest defense America has at the present moment.

What else, Mr. President, in broad outline, encompasses the bipartisan foreign policy in Europe? I think the great issues I have mentioned are the major ones. Does the attack on our foreign policy limit itself only to Asia? If so, then the leaders of my party should make that crystal clear.

Let us now take a look at Asia, Mr. President. Of course, as we all realize, with respect not only to Asia but everywhere else in the world following VJ-day, we demobilized too rapidly; but I am proud to say, Mr. President, that we did not demobilize too rapidly with any encouragement from the Armed Services Committee of the United States Senate. The record is perfectly clear. Our attitude could be described as dragging our heels, urging that the process not proceed too rapidly. For that too rapid demobilization the primary responsibility has to rest on the shoulders of the 160,000,000 American people, because, after all, Congress, under a system of self-government, is bound to reflect to a remarkable degree the attitudes and the pressures of the electorate. There is nothing surprising about that, and there is nothing bad about it, either. As individual Members of Congress, we have an obligation of leadership, and we all agree we should not yield on principles. But men who hold office are human beings, and although I would not take away from the Congress its fair share of responsibility for a demobilization program which went too fast, nevertheless I would place the primary responsibility for it upon the American people themselves. The demand of the overwhelming majority of the people of the country in the months following World War II, for fast demobilization at such a rate that the security of America abroad was endangered was yielded to by the Congress and by the administration. That demobilization program played right into the hand of Communist Russia, for during those months and years Russia did not demobilize.

As we were weakening our Armed Forces Russia proceeded to devote a totalitarian economy to the building up of the weapons and arsenals of war. That has been the Russian program. We knew it. The leaders of our Government knew it. Yes, Mr. President, I think we can take judicial notice, so to speak, of the fact that the American people knew it. The record is perfectly clear. Too many of our people were bent on returning to business as usual, profits as usual, yes, an over-all pattern of selfishness as usual.

That is, again, something that is easy to understand, so far as human behavior is concerned. But we are talking today, Mr. President, about causes and effects. We are talking today about results of a pattern of behavior which we laid down for ourselves as a people. We are trying to balance accounts, and we find that our liabilities, because of our own shortsightedness, are large. Of course, our rapid demobilization affected the situation in Asia, because we now know that we did not leave ourselves in an adequate position of defense in Asia. We did not leave ourselves in an adequate position of defense at the outposts of America, which, figuratively speaking, are within a stone's throw of tremendous concentrations of Russian forces. We followed such a shortsighted policy following VJ-day, that we greatly weakened the defenses of the outposts of America in Alaska, for example. This can now be said, because it no longer is true, but at one time since VJ-day we weakened those defenses to such a point that Alaska could not have offered effective resistance to an oncoming Russian air-strike. The defenses of Alaska were utterly weak, at a time when one of the greatest concentrations of air power ever gathered in the world was assembled by Soviet Russia in Siberia. During the period of time that Alaska was in such weak condition the American people, in my judgment, as far east as Chicago were at the mercy of that Russian Air Force. It is to our credit that we proceeded to strengthen those defenses. It is to the credit of the Congress of the United States that from time to time since VJ-day, as the public and the Congress became aware of the critical security situation in which we found ourselves, it appropriated the funds necessary to start to rebuild the defenses of our country.

I use Alaska only as one example. There are many other examples I could cite to show that the demobilization program of America weakened our position in the world, not only militarily, but psychologically as well, because our allies were at a loss to understand why we should do it, knowing full well what Russia was doing by way of directing her whole program into building up her arsenals of war.

What was our next mistake? As I have said so many times, and as I have indicated very briefly today, I think the greatest weakness in our foreign policy has been our Asiatic policy. One of the first great mistakes we made was in our failure in China to link together military aid and economic reform which would bring to the Chinese people themselves the benefits of the millions of dollars we were pouring into China. It is not a good record in the pages of American history, and I do not think the white paper is an answer to it, an explanation of it, or a full disclosure of what happened. In my opinion the white paper contains within it too much alibi-ing and rationalizing of a mistaken policy in Asia.

The responsibility for it must be placed primarily on the doorstep of the State Department. I think every effort should have been made by members of both parties to insist upon a correction of our Chinese policy. It is my understanding that for the most part during that period of time the State Department did not carry out to the full measure it should have done the joint consultation and bipartisan cooperation which characterized its policy with respect to Europe. This is only to the best of my recollection, and I am not certain as to the dates, but I believe the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will show that a colloquy took place on the floor of the Senate during the Eightieth Congress in which the great giant, the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, was specifically asked how long it had been since the administration had consulted with the Committee on Foreign Relations with regard to Asiatic policy. A checking of the RECORD will show, I think, that the Senator from Michigan replied to the question by rather reluctantly admitting that it had been many months.

In the same colloquy discussion took place with respect to whether or not the Foreign Relations Committee had been apprised with respect to the contents of the Wedemeyer report. I think the record will show that the reply of the Senator from Michigan, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, was to the effect that the committee had not been apprised as to its contents. So I say here today, as I have said so many times in the past several years, that in my judgment, the State Department is deserving of severe criticism and censure for its failure to keep the Congress of the United States and particularly the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate and the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House informed as to the State Department's policies in Asia.

Mr. President, I hope that sometime during the debate in the weeks ahead evidence can be submitted to those of us who are not members of the Committee on Foreign Relations which will show that our viewpoint in regard to the shortcomings of the State Department in this respect is in need of some revision. However, if there is any evidence existing at the present time which would support a revision of such viewpoint the State Department itself has been derelict in its duty not bringing forth the evidence.

I should like to stress the failure of the State Department frankly to advise the Congress of the United States through the Committee on Foreign Relations of information and facts which the State Department might have had in regard to specific programs, specific issues, and the specific problems as they arose in Asia. Had that been done, we might today find America following quite a different course of action throughout Asia. The assumption that under the Constitution the only thing the administration need submit to the Committee on Foreign Relations is something which it pleases to call a treaty, and not something which it pleases to call an executive agreement is in my opinion unsound as a matter of constitutional theory and causative of much of the misunderstanding over foreign policy which has developed in our country. Again I say that the responsibility for the growth of that misunderstanding must rest squarely on the doorstep of the State Department.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. No. As I have already explained, I shall not yield until I have concluded my remarks. There is no one to whom I should be more pleased to yield than the senior Senator from Maine. However, I am thinking out loud on this subject, and for the sake of continuity I want to go along on the general points which I desire to cover. Then I shall be glad to submit myself to cross-examination.

Mr. President, I shall not engage in personalities. I did not join in a resolution of my party in conference recommending that the Secretary of State resign primarily because I thought it was a great mistake, particularly at the time the resolution was submitted, to adopt such a resolution. I know what I would have done if I were the Secretary of State. I have said this publicly many times in my State and elsewhere. I know what I would have done had I been Secretary of State and found myself in a position where I seemed unable to win the cooperation of a large section of the Senate of the United States, which has such great responsibility in regard to foreign policy, greater responsibilities, Constitution-wise, than has the House. I know that if I were satisfied that I could not regain the confidence necessary for cooperation in carrying out a truly bipartisan foreign policy, if I could not thrash out in consultation and conferences differences at least to the point that we could have a friendly understanding and could go forward united in executing a bipartisan foreign policy, I would resign. I am satisfied that if I had reached the conclusion that it was hopeless to try to win the confidence of the Members of the Senate as to make it possible to execute a bipartisan foreign policy, then, from the standpoint of protecting the interests of my President, I would resign.

The Secretary of State did not decide to follow that course of action, and I considered it a personal matter between himself and the President. I felt that it was a great mistake, practically on the very eve of his departure to represent our country in Brussels, to adopt a resolution which at best could not strengthen him at Brussels. It certainly could not be interpreted by anyone that the resolution passed by a majority of the Republicans would be an aid to him in the conference in Brussels.

I felt also that the resolution represented more a negative reaction to a personality than to a policy. I thought the resolution was a contribution to national disunity rather than to unity. When we come to the specific questions of foreign policy which we have passed upon point by point in the Senate of the United States during the past few years—the Truman doctrine in Greece, the ECA, the North Atlantic Pact and its military implementation, Asiatic aid, Korean aid, and the final decision to go back into Korea—the majority of my Republican colleagues, under the leadership of the great VANDENBERG, voted for those proposals. Many of us have disagreed with some of the State Department procedures in respect to Asiatic policies, but for the most part we have agreed as to the objectives of those policies. Therefore, I could not convince myself that this manifestation of a lack of confidence in the Secretary of State, as set out in the Republican resolution, was basically bottomed upon a disagreement with policy, unless those who supported the resolution wanted to answer in the affirmative the question which I stated at the beginning of my remarks was the acid test by saying, "Yes, we would vote differently now on the major provisions of our bipartisan foreign-policy program of recent years." If that is their view I am sure that as the historic debate of the next few weeks progresses they will say so. If that is their view, then I think there may be some fallacy in the argument which I now make when I say that I formed the feeling primarily that the anti-Acheson resolution was just what my label indicates—anti-Acheson rather than anti-policy. But I did not feel that the time the resolution was offered was the hour to make a manifestation of personal disapproval, which I am persuaded many of those who voted for the resolution had in mind. I felt that at that hour, as the Secretary of State was about to go forward to a historic world conference, which I believe will prove with the passage of time to be of tremendous importance to the future security of America, we should have buried our personal differences and sent him forth to the conference armed as fully as he could be armed with the backing of his government, hoping that as our representative—as he had a right to be at that time under the Constitution of the United States—he would come back with agreements and understandings which would strengthen America's position in this fight for freedom.

That is why I could not vote for the resolution, although, as I have said, I am sure that if I had been in Mr. Acheson's position in recent months and had become satisfied that the chances of winning the full cooperation of an overwhelming majority in the Senate of the United States were not very good, I would have resigned.

Mr. President, I do not wish to be misunderstood if I can prevent being misunderstood, although I know that we are discussing a subject today which can easily give rise to misunderstanding. No matter what one may say or how carefully he may try to phrase his remarks, there is always the possibility of misunderstanding. I have sought to phrase my remarks very carefully. That is why I have spoken so deliberately, and I am sure it must have appeared to the listeners rather ponderously. No matter how careful one is these days in phrasing his remarks, on the very controversial subject of foreign policy there will be some who will be bound to misunderstand him. In an endeavor to protect myself as best I can, I wish to turn now to a few of the paragraphs of the great Hoover speech of last night. I wish to point out my complete agreement with some of them, and my reservations with respect to other parts.

Mr. Hoover said among other things:

> We may first survey the global military situation. There is today only one center of aggression on the earth. That is the Communist-controlled Asian-European land mass of 800,000,000 people. They have probably over 300 trained and equipped combat divisions with over 30,000 tanks, 10,000 tactical planes and further large reserves they can put in action in 90 days. But they are not a great sea power. Their long-range air power is limited. These congeries of over 30 different races will some day go to pieces. But in the meantime they are cannon fodder.

Mr. President, with much of that paragraph I agree; but there are two assumptions contained in it which I would modify by way of reservations.

I point out that the implication that since Russia is not a great sea power we are relatively safe because of the assumed protection of the Pacific and the Atlantic Oceans needs to be qualified. As I suggested earlier, at this moment Russia is a great submarine power. We cannot be sure that her possible superiority in submarines may not prove to be a greater asset than superiority in surface craft. Whether Russia is superior in submarines today I do not know; but I do know, Mr. President, that they have tremendous submarine striking power, and when I say that, I disclose no military secret, because that information has been made available to the American people for many months past.

The next assumption in that paragraph which I would qualify is that—

> These congeries of over 30 different races will some day go to pieces.

I say most respectfully, Mr. President, that I deem that to be a bit of wishful thinking on the part of the ex-President. Would that we could be sure of it. I pray to God it might be true. But we must not count on it. I think it is a false assumption categorically to state that these congeries will eventually go to pieces. I think it is based on the assumption that totalitarianism cannot survive, and that police-state methods cannot control masses of people in subjugation for centuries. I think it is also one of the most serious mistakes of assumption made by the great ex-President last night in his significant speech.

We Americans cannot afford to engage in the wishful thinking, the false assumption, the adoption of a false security attitude that the Communist section of the world which is pitted against us will eventually and for a certainty go to pieces. It will not go to pieces, at least in time to save the freedom way of life in the world in the century ahead unless the freedom-loving peoples of the world unite around the principle to which I referred earlier in my remarks and to which we must now rededicate ourselves, namely, that united we stand, and divided we fall. That principle must be applied by and to all the people in all the freedom-allied countries of the world.

We cannot justify withdrawing into ourselves on this continent and taking solace in the assumption of the great ex-President that sooner or later these congeries, comprising more than thirty different races will some day go to pieces. Mr. President, such as assumption in history gone by was made by foreign peoples with respect to the United States. In fact, it is a part of the Communist philosophy today that eventually capitalism and democracy will disintegrate. We think we know better.

When we are dealing with an enemy I like to assume he is just as smart as we are. One of the things the American people must do, in my opinion, is to take it for granted that in this struggle for freedom around the world we are pitted against forces and leaders who in many respects are as smart as we are. We can be pretty sure that they are going to do everything in their power to see to it that this assumption of the ex-President of the United States does not come to pass. I seriously question that there is any possibility of it coming to pass within our generation or within a period of time soon enough to prevent the destruction of America if we proceed to withdraw into ourselves and live unto ourselves alone, and accept the assumption which is interwoven in the speech of the great ex-President that we can proceed in safety if we arm our Navy and our Air Forces to the teeth, and rely upon the Pacific and the Atlantic Oceans for protection, forgetting, as I said earlier, what will happen to us if the great industrial war-making power of Europe falls into the hands of Communist Russia.

Later in his speech the ex-President said:

> Facing this menace on the continental European front there are about 160,000,000 non-Communist people who, excluding Spain, have less than 20 combat divisions now available, few tanks and little air or naval force. But their will to defend themselves is feeble and their disunities are manifest.

It is that language, Mr. President, I had in mind when I said earlier in my speech that from a psychological standpoint I thought there was language in the ex-President's speech that was unfortunate, and I cite that as my exhibit. I cite it as my exhibit particularly when there has just closed in Brussels a conference which sought to strengthen the North Atlantic Pact and the military implementation program thereunder, a conference which sought to bring greater unity and determination to our allies in Europe and to make clear a manifestation on the part of the American Government that we fully recognize the threat Russia is to freedom in Europe and through Europe to freedom in the United States. I think the language of Mr. Hoover which I have quoted will be interpreted by many in Europe as language of defeatism, as language of surrender on the part of the United States so far as support of Europe is concerned. I think it came at a very unfortunate time, so shortly after the Brussels Conference.

Mr. President, let me make clear, if I make nothing else clear in the course of this speech, that I believe it is most important that the American people and the other freedom-loving peoples of the world understand that the aggressive enemy of freedom today is primarily Russia, with her tag-along satellite nations who, under her police-state methods, are helpless now, in my judgment, to do anything else but carry out her program of aggression and totalitarianism. I would have my country—as I said over a national radio broadcast three times within the past 2 weeks—face the fact that today Russia is carrying on a form of hot war against us. Russia has been making hot war against us ever since the Berlin incident. I do not know whether she will go into an all-out, full-scale hot war, but I know that we are sticking our heads in the sand for a certainty if we fail to recognize the fact that today Russia is carrying on a hot war against freedom. We cannot with safety follow the language of that part of the Hoover speech which might be—and, I fear, will be—subject to the interpretation that now we are ready to withdraw into continental United States, to protect our freedom against that hot war, unless the peoples of Europe follow a course that meets with our pleasures and decisions. No, Mr. President; in view of the circumstances which exist today in the world, I think that statement by ex-President Hoover which I have just quoted from his speech was an unfortunate one.

The next important paragraph of Mr. Hoover's speech to which I would call attention is as follows:

> Of importance in military weight at this moment there is the British Commonwealth of 150,000,000 people, with probably 30 combat divisions under arms, a superior navy, considerable air force and a few tanks.
> And there are 150,000,000 people in the United States preparing 3,500,000 men into a gigantic Air Force and Navy, with about 30 equipped combat divisions.
> If we weigh these military forces as they stand today we must arrive at certain basic conclusions.
> (A) We must face the fact that to commit the sparse ground forces of the non-Communist nations into a land war against this Communist land mass would be a war without victory, a war without a successful political terminal. Any attempt to make war on the Communist mass by land invasion, through the quicksands of China, India, or Western Europe is sheer folly. That would be the graveyard of millions of American boys and would end in the exhaustion of this Gibraltar of western civilization.

Mr. President, with the basic premise of that paragraph, I am in agreement. I am in accord with the view that we cannot and should not fight a land war in the sections of the world which the great ex-President enumerated in that paragraph of his speech. However, I would have my country be on guard against the over-all conclusion which I fear he draws in his speech after he lays down these sound premises.

I agree with his next major premise, when he says:

Even were Western Europe armed far beyond any contemplated program, we could never reach Moscow. The Germans failed with a magnificent army of 240 combat divisions and with powerful air and tank forces as contrasted with the 60 divisions now being talked about.

However, Mr. President, I think there should be added to that observation on the part of the ex-President, the very important one that without an adequate mass of land troops in Europe, in case the hot war becomes an all-out war, we cannot stop the mass of Communist land troops from extending itself all over Europe. That is why I think there was need in the speech of the ex-President for a greater emphasis on the North Atlantic Pact program. It seems to me he overlooked, in this part of his speech, the importance of a mass of Allied land troops in Europe and its ability to prevent an invasion of Europe by the massed Russian forces. I do not agree with any assumption that the North Atlantic Pact and the Allied nations participating therein cannot, through the navy and the air forces and the land troops, build up a resistance which will stop an invasion of Europe by Russia. We are not talking about an invasion of Russia, to Moscow; but we are talking about saving the Ruhr from falling into the hands of Russia, because on the control of the Ruhr depends, I believe, the ultimate security of this country in an all-out war with Russia.

The ex-President's next point in his speech is as follows:

(B) Equally, we Americans alone with sea and air power can so control the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans that there can be no possible invasion of the Western Hemisphere by Communist armies. They can no more reach Washington in force than we can reach Moscow.

I say most respectfully, Mr. President, that I believe that assumption by Mr. Hoover is glaringly false. I would that his assumption were true. However, if we become encircled by Communist countries, if all Europe falls to communism, if we lose any foothold in the Pacific, in my judgment, any assumption that Communist armies cannot invade America is clearly false, and represents, I am sorry to say, an example of wishful thinking. In my opinion, there would be great danger of invasion of America by Communist armies if we should lose our Allies abroad and find ourselves encircled by communistic regimes and police states. That false assumption on the part of the ex-President in his speech is so serious that I think it colors a great many of the other conclusions he reaches.

Mr. President, if, in the years immediately ahead, we become encircled by Communist countries, as the result of the fall of Europe and the loss of American strongholds in Asia; if, for example, a Pearl Harbor should occur in the area of Korea, today, both to our naval forces afloat there, and to our Armed Forces located there and to our Air Force located near there in combat with what is known to me to be a powerful Russian air force based not far from them, we would find it difficult to tell the people of the Pacific coast that there would be no danger of an invasion of the west coast. Why, Mr. President, if Alaska should fall to Communist attack and the Communists obtain bases there, you would have a most difficult time telling the people of the West, as far east at least as Chicago, that there would be no danger of a Communist invasion of the west. I think that this part of Hoover's speech which I am criticizing will have the effect of giving those who assume it to be sound a sense of false security in America, if they are not warned of its unsoundness. I think the American people ought to be told that there will be danger of invasion by Russia, if we become encircled by Communist countries and Russia obtains the great war-making industrial potential of the Ruhr, for example, or knocks out Alaska, or stages a Pearl Harbor attack on our Air Force and Navy in the Pacific, and gets by with it. The danger is real, and I propose to raise my voice in expressing to the American people the sincere belief that it is real, and that the assumption of the ex-President, contained in this paragraph, needs marked qualification.

Mr. Hoover further said:

(C) In this military connection we must realize the fact that the atomic bomb is a far less dominant weapon than it was once thought to be.

I think he is entirely correct, and I believe it was well he told the American people that. I am afraid there has been stirred up in the minds of the American people a sense of false security so far as the atomic bomb is concerned. It is a devastating weapon, there is no doubt; but, that it is the type of weapon which will knock out Soviet Russia for a certainty, is at best exceedingly questionable; and the ex-President, according to my view, is completely correct in making the point he does about the atomic bomb. I think the American people need also to realize that we have no monopoly on it; that, devastating as that weapon is, it can be used against us as well as for us. We need to recognize that there is also a great difference in the industrial concentration and dispersement of the war-making power of the two nations. I am satisfied that the atomic bomb, once the Russians get a stockpile in numbers closely approaching our own, can wreak greater damage on the United States than we can wreak on Soviet Russia, so far as future war-making potentialities are concerned. That is true because it is pretty well known that our great industrial institutions are more concentrated, whereas Russia has followed to a greater degree, so we are informed, a program of dispersement and a policy of effective concealment, so far as her war-making plants are concerned.

The ex-President then says:

(D) It is obvious that the United Nations have been defeated in Korea by the aggression of Communist China. There are no adequate forces in the world to repel them.

I think he is dead right. I happen to be one who believes that we should withdraw from Korea to a line in the Pacific we can defend; that we should stretch as effective a blockade against Communist China as we can; that we should encourage guerrilla warfare in Communist China by Asiatics; that we should make very clear to Great Britain that she, too, has an obligation to cooperate in this matter, and that no American boys are going to die to save Hong Kong. Great Britain must recognize that Hong Kong is a war casualty, and Great Britain's good faith in this joint enterprise to defend freedom, for herself and for us, must cause her to take a realistic position about Hong Kong. We cannot stand by and see her feed Communist China economically, and American boys die as a result of the war goods which the Chinese Communists get from the Russian Communists as the result of a direct and indirect trade cooperation by Great Britain. But I think it is a matter that can be settled and determined in honest, sincere, good-faith conferences between the leaders of these two great democracies.

In my judgment the ex-President is right in pointing out that we cannot hold Korea; but in making that statement I hasten to add that it does not justify the assumption that we made a mistake in Asiatic policy, in drawing the issue with Russia over Korea. We drew the issue with Russia when we went back into Korea after the invasion by the Russian sponsored North Koreans. I think the invasion of South Korea by the North Koreans, backed, as we now know, by the Communist Chinese and the Communist Russians, was a signal on the part of the Communist section of the world that they intended to carry on an aggressive course of action in Asia. I think, also, it was the test put up to us as to whether that was the time for Russia to start her conquest of Asia. Although we have suffered a military defeat, and although I think it is shameful that we were not in a position more adequately to protect the lives of American heroes who fought in the Korean War and who are dying there today, nevertheless the decision to go back into Korea had to be made. The mistake was, not in the decision, but in the fact that we were not strong enough at that hour to back up the decision with greater military strength.

No, Mr. President; I am not one of those who think it was a mistake to call Russia's hand, because, after all, we called not the North Koreans alone, not the Communist Chinese alone, but Russia's hand. We made the decision to go back into Korea in opposition to her renewed aggressive course of action in Asia.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point for a question?

Mr. MORSE. I should like to yield, but I said at the beginning that I would not yield until I finished my speech. I am merely thinking out loud, and speaking much longer than I intended to, maybe selfishly, but, at least, from the standpoint of my record, I want the people of my State to know my thoughts on foreign policy questions as they come out of my head today in response to what I think is a very, very critical situation which exists.

Of course, Mr. President, I believe we made some very serious mistakes on the Korean issue long before the invasion. Some Senators have previously heard me say that I think we made a mistake as early as July 1945, and some of us in this body felt, at the time the San Francisco Charter was before the Senate for ratification that we should insist upon the recognition of the provisional government of Korea and should insist that a trusteeship or mandate of the United Nations be placed over Korea until such time as a free election could be held. That was then my view, and it has always remained my view. But instead of doing that, a few months thereafter the administration actually joined with Russia in the partitioning of Korea along the thirty-eighth parallel, giving as its excuse or explanation the argument that it was doing it for military convenience. When we did that we joined with Russia in the partition of the freedom of Korea. History will so record. From the time the administration did that, it proceeded with a whole chain of mistakes in Korea. It knew about them when it was making them. That is the sad part of it.

I have always been at a loss to understand why so many people, in discussing the question of foreign policy in recent years, have not recognized the nature of the Russian pattern. Russia has never varied it. She has applied it uniformly and consistently with respect to every satellite country which has been taken over. She applied it in Korea. We knew, or should have known, that that is exactly what Russia would do. What did she do? The moment the United States joined with Russia in the partition of Korea, Russia dropped her iron curtain along the thirty-eighth parallel. Russia always does that. The iron curtain is basic to her pattern. It is the warp and woof of her pattern. That is why it has always been so difficult for me to understand the gullibility, the shortsightedness, of so many people who have discussed the Russian problem since VJ-day in terms of the oft-repeated suggestion that we should try to understand the Russians. We were told, "They really do not mean what you think they mean by their iron-curtain policy. They do not mean it as an unfriendly gesture."

Nonsense, Mr. President—nonsense and gullibility. Ever since the Russians dropped the iron curtain along their own borders, to say nothing of dropping it along the borders of satellite countries in which we had an interest, at least, as a free nation in the world to see to it that the principle of self-determination was not trampled under military foot by aggressive nations—we had that much of an interest in the satellite countries—her action can be interpreted as nothing but unfriendly and a manifestation of a clear intention to follow a warlike policy against the freedom-loving peoples of the world.

So, Mr. President, I repeat today what my colleagues have heard me say on this floor during the past several years, that, so far as I am concerned, I shall have to continue to assume that Russia's intentions are not intentions of peace so long as she makes the warp and woof of her foreign policy the iron curtain.

Peoples who have the intentions of friendship, peoples who believe in good neighborliness, peoples who want to cooperate and be friendly, do not put signs in their front yards saying "Stay out or suffer the consequences." That is what Russia has done. One of the sad things about this whole picture is that so many Americans fail to appreciate the fact that during World War II Russia never really functioned as an ally. She never cooperated as an ally. She conducted herself simply as a nation that had a common enemy. She would not even permit American military missions behind her iron curtain during the war. Her record during the war, as well as immediately after the war, in the occupational zones of Europe, was a record of noncooperation, obstruction, and of act after act that made it perfectly clear that she was not friendly. Certainly she took advantage of all the matériel we made available to her to help her fight the common enemy. But, Mr. President, the record is so overwhelming, and we knew it before Korea, that her conduct indicated an attitude of unfriendliness and an intention to violate the peace whenever it served her selfish purposes to violate it, that we should have given greater heed to that pattern of behavior on the part of Russia before we joined with her in the partition of Korea's freedom along the thirty-eighth parallel. We certainly should have given greater heed to it when we observed what she did once she dropped the iron curtain along the thirty-eighth parallel.

What did she do? There has been much said about our military intelligence, and about the fact that we did not know what was going on north of the thirty-eighth parallel. Such a charge needs qualification. Certainly we did not know all we should like to have known, but we knew a great deal. Do not sell American military intelligence short in analyzing this problem. It was not because we did not know what was going on north of the thirty-eighth parallel; it was because at the time, for some inexplicable reason which I shall never be able to understand, a short-sightedness continued in America. I think it existed in the State Department as well as in the Military Establishment also. It was a shortsighted belief that the Korean problem would work itself out. It was said, "They are bluffing. We will wait. Russia is bluffing." If so, they have been bluffing for a long time, with consequences which have been very gainful to them and detrimental to us.

What did the Russians do? They proceeded to train a Communist army in North Korea. They did not train the army with Russians in any great numbers. They trained them with Koreans who had been brought down in large numbers from the army in Manchuria, which was a Russian-trained army. It was a well trained army, too. They separated those Koreans from the Manchurian army—officers and foot soldiers alike—infiltrated them among the forces of North Korea, and proceeded to train a Communist army in North Korea.

What did we do? We trained a police force in South Korea. We told the world we were going to train a police force. We told the world we were going to train a force which would be capable of taking care of internal disturbances and police actions, and which would be strong enough to handle border raids along the thirty-eighth parallel. We were very careful to announce to Russia and the world at large that we were not going to train an army. We did not train an army. We did a pretty good constabulary job, but certainly we did not train an army. The record which the South Koreans have made in the Korean War is an exceptionally good record, particularly when there is taken into consideration what we did in South Korea so far as giving military training is concerned and what the Russians did north of the thirty-eighth parallel in North Korea through their Communist Koreans who had been brought down from Manchuria for the purpose of training a Communist army in North Korea.

Mr. President, that was not the only mistake we made. After Russia got her Communist Army trained in North Korea by the use of Russian-trained Koreans taken from the Manchurian Army, she started to bombard the airwaves of the world, particularly of Asia, with her vicious lying propaganda that she was ready and willing and, in fact intended, to proceed to withdraw Russian occupation forces from North Korea, but that militaristic America, imperialistic America, exploiting America was keeping the South Koreans under the militaristic heel of the American Army. That is the rot which she fed to the people of Asia. She repeated over and over again the technique of the big lie. The sad thing about that technique is that unless it is combated, many people believe it.

What did we do? Let the record of the Congress of the United States speak for itself. We cut the appropriation for the Voice of America. We cut the appropriation when what we should have done was to greatly enlarge it. Not only should we have enlarged the appropriation for the Voice of America program, but we should have enlarged the appropriation for every other type of service that would have been helpful in meeting the vicious lying propaganda of the Russian Communists. At that time we should have enlarged the appropriations for the point 4 program in Asia, because that was the time to win the good will of millions of Asians whose good will we will sorely need in the great contest for freedom which will mark the coming decades.

Did we stop with that mistake? No. In quotation marks, Mr. President, we cooperated with Russia. We yielded to her propaganda. We pulled out of South Korea. We took out our forces, and with our forces we took out most of our equipment. We did all that at the very time when we knew that there was great military activity north of the thirty-eighth parallel and at the very time when there were periodic raids across the border on the part of segments of the North Korean army. I shall never forget the testimony before the Committee on Armed Services by the American general who was in command of the American forces in Korea. He testified that he was on board ship in the Pacific on his way back to the United States when he heard over the radio that an invasion of South Korea had begun. I cannot quote verbatim what the General said, but I am sure I am quoting him quite accurately when I say that he testified before our committee to the effect that he did not think it was anything serious. At first he assumed it was merely another one of those border raids which had been going on for months and that it would spend itself in a few days. He thought it was a raid for the purpose of getting control of quantities of rice, because the area in which the raid occurred was an area of heavy rice production. We knew those raids were going on. We knew they had been going on for some weeks preceding our withdrawal from Korea. I say it was a great mistake to withdraw at that time.

The next mistake was that in South Korea, as in China before, we repeated the China mistake of not seeing to it that economic reform was linked to military aid. I do not want to spend a great deal of time elaborating the point tonight. However, I wish to assert, and I am satisfied that the record will sustain me, that by and large we did a very poor job in South Korea in bringing to the South Koreans as individuals benefits of economic reform which should have characterized our program in South Korea but did not. Here again the Russian propaganda machine took advantage of every little disturbance within South Korea, of every conflict between the Government and the people of the lower classes, and of every protest about lack of economic aid to the people themselves. For this, too, I think the State Department must assume its full share of responsibility.

I think that after all, under our Constitution and the powers with respect to foreign policy which rest in the President and are executed through the State Department, we had the right to look to the State Department for recommendations and proposals, and for requests for advice and consultation in connection with the implementation of our program in South Korea. I hold to the view that if the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate had been fully apprised of some of the things we now know occurred in South Korea during those months we would have avoided some of the serious mistakes which I am outlining here this evening.

Of the many other mistakes, I wish to mention one more—perhaps the major one of all—a mistake which I think was very disturbing to the thinking of the people not only in Korea, but elsewhere in Asia, and particularly in India. It was a mistake which I have a feeling—I have nothing on which I can substantiate it except my interpretation of his conduct and some of the language he has used since—has caused some shift of attitude on the part of the leaders of India, particularly Nehru. I believe that we Americans must keep our eyes on India. I think we must give great heed to Nehru and to the point of view of his followers. We must be realistic about it, because in my judgment, so far as the free part of Asia is concerned, as India goes so, most likely, will the rest of Asia go. India is of vital importance to the defense of Asia for freedom. That is why I said earlier in my remarks this afternoon that I would that we had paid more attention in the years gone by to getting our surplus food into empty stomachs in Asia than keeping it in Government bins where much of it was bound to spoil. I believe that such a course of action would have been one of the most effective manifestations in the whole field of foreign policy of putting Christian principles of democracy to work.

I have the feeling that the last mistake in Korea which I wish to mention had a tremendous effect in India, in Indochina, in Indonesia, and, for that matter, in all of the free sections of Asia. I refer to the announcement last January by the State Department that our line of defense in the Pacific primarily was to be a line from the Aleutians through Japan, Okinawa, and the Philippines. I think that announcement had a tremendous psychological effect in Asia. I do not believe that the effect was very good for America.

Again referring to the testimony of General Roberts, who was in charge of our occupational forces in Korea, and who testified before the Senate Armed Services Committee, I recall that he did not like to answer these questions. I recall that some of us on the Armed Services Committee asked him for his opinion as to the effect of the American announcement that our line of defense was to be the line I have just mentioned. He preferred not to answer the question, but I remember that a couple of us insisted that he give us the benefit of his personal opinion. Of course, his answer was exactly the answer anyone should have known. It was to the effect that the announcement helped to speed up Communist activity in Korea. I think it helped to speed up Communist activity throughout Asia. It was a terrible mistake, Mr. President.

That, it seems to me, is a perfect example of where the administration and the State Department should have put into practice the true meaning of a bipartisan foreign policy, as I understand its meaning—a consultation with the leaders of both parties in the Congress in advance of any public enunciation of policy, because I dare say that if the Secretary of State had advised us in the Senate, for example, that such was his thinking, careful consideration would have been given to it by the leaders of Congress, and probably the decision would never have been made public. Certainly some Members of the Senate would have been able to perceive the dangers of any such policy as that, dangers which were bound to come to pass, and did come to pass. I think that from that time on there was a tremendous speed-up of Communist activity in Asia. The Communists took it for granted—and I believe they had the right to take it for granted—that we were not going to defend Korea, in fact, that we were not going to engage in military activity beyond the announced line of defense.

I know that there are those who in good faith, and with motives just as sincere as mine, feel that such an interpretation of the State Department's announced policy is taking out of context the true intent of the State Department. But the best they can say for themselves, on the basis of their own assumption, is that even if that be true—which I question—the choice of their language was most unfortunate, because the language which they chose went around the world as notice to people everywhere, Communists and non-Communists alike, totalitarian and freedom-loving people equally, that we were withdrawing from Asia.

As I stated earlier, I do not think it was a mistake to go back into Asia because we had no other choice unless we then wanted to surrender all of Asia to Russia.

Had we not taken a stand for freedom in Korea, I am satisfied in my own mind that our failure to do so would have been a signal for the advance of Communist forces all over Asia. It is an historical shame that we were not in a position of defense and military power so that we could have given to our heroes who have sacrified their lives in Korea the support to which they were entitled.

Mr. President, I have made these comments on Asia because they set forth my views on the subject and give the background as to why I believe the ex-President was right last night when he pointed out that now we cannot stay in Korea. In my opinion, he is right. Now I think we have to withdraw to lines of defenses in the Pacific we can hold, and, as I said earlier in my remarks, stretch a blockade in the Pacific which will make perfectly clear that we recognize Communist China as an aggressor against freedom, and that we recognize Russia as the power behind the aggressor.

I now want to comment on another paragraph of the speech of ex-President Hoover last night.

> We may explore the American situation still further. The 150,000,000 American people are already economically strained by Government expenditures. It must not be forgotten that we are carrying huge burdens from previous wars, including obligations to veterans and $260,000,000,000 of bond and currency issues from those wars. In the fiscal year 1952, Federal and local expenditures are likely to exceed $90,000,000,000. That is more than our total savings. We must finance huge deficits by further Government issues. Inflation is already moving but we might, with stern measures, avoid the economic disintegration of such a load for a very few years. If we continue long on this road the one center of resistance in the world will collapse in economic disaster.

I think he is dead right, Mr. President, in his economic analysis of the fiscal problems which confront us. I have tried to point out for years that the greatest defense weapon America has is not the atomic bomb at all, but our economy. We have got to make great sacrifices now to preserve it. One of the paradoxes is that in preserving our economy some individuals and companies and economic forces in this country, yes, all of us, are going to have to suspend—I should like to put it in terms of suspending rather than sacrificing—some of our economic freedoms for a little while. There is no other way. I know it is a paradox.

It was well stated to us by Jim Forrestal, at some time in 1947, when he testified before the Armed Services Committee. I shall never forget what he said for it was utterly sound. We were talking then about a proposed armed services budget of some $21,000,000,000 out of a then proposed total national budget of $40,000,000,000. The then Secretary of Defense thought it was too high. He thought at least it ought to be very carefully screened and scrutinized to see what savings could be made. The usual argument was made as it was made in those days: "But, Mr. Secretary, you know if we get into a war to preserve freedom it is going to cost us many times $21,000,000,000." And Jim Forrestal very quickly replied, "Yes; I know that is true, but I also know that if we get into that war one of the paradoxes of it will be that we will go to war to save freedom, to protect and preserve our freedom, but in a large measure, for the duration of the war and for some time after the war, we will lose much of our freedom at home."

That is true, Mr. President. It is a very difficult concept for the American people fully to grasp as to its implications, but I think they have got to be told. It is important that those of us who have the responsibility of casting votes in the Congress of the United States on various proposals for economic mobilization as well as military mobilization should have the courage and the frankness to tell the American people that during this crisis some of their freedoms are going to be curtailed; that in time of great national crisis all our freedoms as individuals are relative, subordinate to the great goal of preserving the Government itself. And now as we enter into a course of action that must be adopted in order to meet this crisis, we in the Congress of the United States should tell the American people that a great many of their freedoms will have to be curtailed. We cannot have the kind of economic stabilization and mobilization which I think is clearly implied in the language of the great ex-President in his speech last night, as he discussed the fiscal problems of our country, without a great deal of economic regimentation and a great deal of economic direction on the part of the Government over all American industry and labor and every other segment of our economy.

To my labor friends let me say here and now that they have to face the fact that all of us in America are going to suffer a lowering of the standards of our living during this crisis. I believe we are guilty of the most inexcusable type of political hypocrisy if we, as Members of the Congress, lead labor, or farmers, or businessmen, or consumers generally, to believe that in this crisis we can mobilize for the preservation of freedom in our country and in the world and at the same time maintain the present high standards of living in America. That cannot be done. It is not going to be done. I believe that a great deal of conflict and misunderstanding can be avoided if we frankly inform the American people that it cannot be done, that this is a crisis more serious in its import than any crisis we have ever faced heretofore, and that the word "sacrifice" is no platitude, but is a meaningful outline of a course of sacrifice which we all have to proceed to follow at once.

In my opinion American labor is not going to be able to set itself off to one side and separate wage control from price control. They are inseparable. They must be combined, in my judgment, under the jurisdiction of one board or tribunal.

Labor has to face the fact that so-called escalator clauses, highly desirable in a peacetime economy, cannot stand up in a wartime economy, because they are a part of the vicious circle of inflation, and it is necessary to break into that vicious circle of inflation. So all of us, including labor, will have to make sacrifices.

Knowing labor as I do, I have no doubt what its patriotic response will be. Once the facts about the crisis are made clear to labor, it will join in whatever sacrifices are necessary. It rightly will take the position that on the economic front the Congress and the administration must do everything within their power to see to it that the sacrifices are equalized, and that unfair discriminations, favorable to one group as against another, are eliminated. However, that labor will willingly sacrifice, along with farmers and businessmen and consumers generally, I have no question, once the facts are made clear.

Mr. President, to avoid the economic dangers which the ex-President so well stated in his speech of last night, let us have no more talk about voluntary controls and piecemeal stabilization. We are now in a fight to the finish, and it calls for the greatest of speed, consistent with the maximum of efficiency possible during an emergency, with all-out economic and military mobilization.

The next paragraph of the ex-President's speech on which I wish to comment is as follows:

Whether or not the United Nations is to have a moral defeat and suffer the collapse of its whole moral stature now depends on whether it has the courage to—

(A) Declare Communist China an aggressor.

I agree.

(B) Refuse admission of this aggressor to its membership.

I agree.

(C) Demand that each member of the United Nations cease to furnish or transport supplies of any kind to Communist China that can aid in their military operations. Such a course honestly carried out by the non-Communist nations is not economic sanctions nor does it require military actions. But it would constitute a great pressure for rectitude.

I agree. In fact, Mr. President, I have already covered my views on this point earlier in my remarks, in my argument for the imposition of a blockade of China.

I read further:

(D) For once, pass a resolution condemning the infamous lies about the United States.

Any course short of this is appeasement.

I agree.

A little later in his speech the ex-President said:

It is clear continental Europe has not in the 3 years of our aid developed that unity of purpose and that will power necessary for its own defense. It is clear that our British friends are flirting with appeasement of Communist China. It is clear that the United Nations is in a fog of debate and indecision on whether to appease or not to appease.

Mr. President, I think that statement in the ex-President's speech is somewhat unfortunate. It does not seem to me to be wholly accurate or fair, so far as concerns describing the conduct of our allies in Europe in connection with the ECA program or in connection with the North Atlantic Pact and the military implementation of it.

I agree with the ex-President, as I said earlier in my remarks, that our British friends certainly are going to have to be more realistic about the situation in Communist China, and will have to recognize that as they aid Communist China, they do injury to freedom and to their freedom-loving Allies; as they bring economic aid to Communist China, they do damage to the defenses of the United States. I think that we, as copartners with them in this great struggle to preserve freedom in the world, have the right to have them join with us in seeing to it that economic aid to Communist China comes to a halt.

A little later in his speech the ex-President said:

We can, without any measure of doubt, with our own air and naval forces, hold the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans with one frontier on Britain (if he wishes to cooperate); the other, on Japan, Formosa, and the Philippines. We can hold open the sea lanes for our supplies.

I devoutly hope that a maximum of cooperation can be established between the British Commonwealth and ourselves.

Mr. President, I have already commented on that paragraph of the speech.

Again I summarize my position simply by saying that I think the ex-President overstates the case. I think there is pregnant in those remarks a great deal of hopeful thinking and wishful thinking that cannot be squared with the realities of the situation in which we find ourselves.

Mr. Hoover also said:

We should give Japan her independence and aid her in arms to defend herself.

I am in agreement, and I think we should proceed to execute a peace treaty with Japan, regardless of Russia.

Mr. Hoover then also said:

We should stiffen the defenses of our Pacific frontier in Formosa and the Philippines. We can protect this island chain by our sea and air power and without land power.

Mr. President, I certainly believe we should strengthen our defenses in the Philippines. So far as Formosa is concerned, I think we are going to have to face the fact that we are involved in some international commitments which never should have been made and which, in my judgment, amount to a circumvention of the treaty-making clauses of the Constitution of the United States. In my opinion, that is exactly what the international agreements in respect to Formosa constitute. Nevertheless, they were entered into; and we are going to have to face that reality as one of the problems of international law which must be solved by adjudication. I think there we should rely heavily upon the procedures of the United Nations for a negotiation and an adjudication of the Formosan issue.

Next, Mr. Hoover said:

Fourth. We could, after initial outlays for more air and navy equipment, greatly reduce our expenditures, balance our budget, and free ourselves from the dangers of inflation and economic degeneration.

I most certainly agree with that point.

Mr. President, I do not agree with the great ex-President of the United States in regard to the assumption, which I think is implicit in his speech taken in its entirety, that we should not proceed at this time with the military-manpower program that is contemplated for America. I think that program is essential to our safety. That is why I am one of the most ardent supporters in the Senate of a universal service law, and that is why I think we must go ahead with military mobilization, including the mobilization of ground troops, for the time being, as a clear notice to Russia that we intend to do all within our power to defend our frontiers of defense at home and abroad. We must make clear to Russia that we intend to do what we can to help our allies in Europe, with their complete cooperation—and with the ex-President's comment on that point, I am in agreement, in defending the Ruhr, so that the Ruhr will not fall to Russia.

A little later in the speech, Mr. Hoover said:

Sixth. We should have none of appeasement. Morally there is no appeasement of communism. Appeasement contains more dangers than Dunkerques. We want no more Tehrans and Yaltas. We can retrieve a battle, but we cannot retrieve an appeasement. We are grateful that President Truman has denounced such a course.

Mr. President, I agree with the premises laid down in that paragraph; but I would most respectfully suggest to ex-President Hoover that if we withdraw unto ourselves, into continental United States, that act itself will be looked upon around the world as a form of appeasement. It will be looked upon as walking out on what I think are great obligations on our part to defend freedom in Europe in order to preserve freedom in the United States.

Then, in his speech, Mr. Hoover said:

Seventh. We are not blind to the need to preserve western civilization on the continent of Europe or to our cultural and religious ties to it. But the prime obligation of defense of western continental Europe rests upon the nations of Europe. The test is whether they have the spiritual force, the will and acceptance of unity among them by their own volition. America cannot create their spiritual forces; we cannot buy them with money.

You can search all the history of mankind and there is no parallel to the effort and sacrifice we have made to elevate their spirit and to achieve their unity. To this date it has failed. Their minds are confused with fears and disunities. They exclude Spain, although she has the will and means to fight. They higgle with Germany, although she is their frontier. They vacillate in the belief that they are in little danger and they hope to avoid again being a theater of war. And Karl Marx has added to their confusions. They still suffer from battle shock. Their highly organized Communist Parties are a menace we must not ignore.

Mr. President, although there is a considerable amount of truth in what the ex-President said in that passage, again I think his emphasis was unfortunate, because in that passage he sells short the North Atlantic Pact. He sells short the great significance of the military program which is being worked out under the North Atlantic Pact; and he sells short the great job which the great Eisenhower is going to Europe to perform.

I would be the first to agree with the ex-President that the people of Europe have shown serious shortcomings, but their problems have been different from ours. We have not lived quite so close to the shadows of Russian guns. We have not lived quite so close to the shadows of the wings of Russian planes. Although I shall continue to insist, as a member of the Armed Services Committee, that we receive a greater amount of cooperation and a fuller performance of promises on the part of our allied friends in Europe, nevertheless I do not share the emphasis which I think the ex-President put on that particular passage of his speech.

He goes on to say:

In both World War I and World War II (including West Germany) they placed more than 250 trained and equipped combat divisions in the field within 60 days with strong aid and naval forces.

Of course they did, Mr. President, but we have got to face the fact that since then they have been tremendously reduced in war potential. We have a very definite responsibility of cooperation with them in the reestablishment of that potential. Let America not forget that, after all, that war was our war as well as theirs. As history has shown, it was our war from the first day, not merely from the day that we got into it.

Without in any way excusing or justifying any failure on their part to give us all-out cooperation since VJ-day, I believe the situation also calls for a charitable attitude, and an understanding on our part of their war psychology and of their great fear of what is likely to happen to them if the North Atlantic Pact is not successful in stopping the overrunning of Europe by the Russian horde. That is what the challenge is all about, as I see it. It seems to me that on the very eve of trying to put into effect a joint Allied common-defense program in Europe under General Eisenhower, neither our allies nor our own security are strengthened by placing just the emphasis which the ex-President placed in his speech by way of criticism of our European allies.

In concluding his speech, Mr. Hoover said:

We can hope that sometime the evils of communism and the disintegration of their racial controls will bring their own disintegration. It is a remote consolation, but twice before in world history Asiatic hordes have swept over a large part of the world and their racial dissensions dissolved their empires.

That is true. But, Mr. President, it would also be very fallacious to outline America's future defense program on the basis of the assumption that the particular pattern of history referred to by the ex-President will repeat itself. The great danger is that, even should it repeat itself, before the repetition takes place the United States may have ceased to exist as a free Nation. I think the time element was too much overlooked by the ex-President as he indulged in that kind of assumption in his speech last night, because I know of no set of facts which justifies the assumption that the Communist segment of the world will collapse before it has its death struggle with the free areas of the world. Unless we keep ourselves in a position of strong defense cooperation with our allied friends in Europe, I fear for the survival of America. So that assumption of the ex-President I would consider with a great many reservations attached to it.

Mr. President, in closing my speech let me tell my colleagues in the Senate that I am sorry to have taken this amount of time, but I felt obligated to do it, in order to keep my own record straight, in order to clear up certain misunderstandings which exist here in the Senate and elsewhere in the country in regard to my position on foreign policy; and in order to place in the RECORD at least a point of view which qualifies somewhat and sets forth reservations, in specific respects, to the speech which was made last night by the great ex-President of the United States. Taken as a whole, I think it was a great speech by a great man. I have tried to make clear that I agree with a great many portions of it, but I thought it important that those of us who disagree with the basic implication of the speech, namely, that it would be safe for America to treat the Pacific and the Atlantic as adequate defenses provided we armed to the teeth so far as our Army and our Air Force are concerned, should express reservations to the argument of the ex-President, because I think his argument rests on a very unsound and false assumption.

Mr. President, I close with laying down again the major premise of my remarks, namely, that I think the American people must face the fact that our principal line of defense does not happen to be the eastern shore of the United States, but it happens to be the eastern line of the territory of our allied friends in Europe. Unless we prevent Soviet Russia from taking over the industrial war-making power of Europe, particularly the Ruhr, I seriously question that we can survive in the decades ahead of us in an all-out struggle against a world in which we should find ourselves an island of freedom surrounded by the turbulent, stormy waters of communism.

Mr. President, as separate and distinct from my comments on the Hoover speech, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a statement on foreign policy which I think is deserving of the serious attention of every Member of the Senate, and which appeared recently in the New York Times. It takes the form of a letter to the President of the United States issued by the Citizens Committee on Foreign Policy. There are attached to it the names of some great American leaders. I particularly want to stress the planks in this proposed foreign policy in connection with the Asiatic problem, with special emphasis on the recommendation of the committee for a blockade of Communist China.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CITIZENS COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN POLICY,
New York, December 12, 1950.

THE PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The leaders of the Communist world have clearly shown their intent to attack the free world by military means as well as by subversion and propaganda. It is therefore of first importance to realize that both the United States and the United Nations are under planned attack, and to formulate out of the welter of confusion a specific program of action by the United States against the greatest danger which it has ever faced. We, therefore, urge that:

1. The President and Congress proclaim a state of national emergency.

2. The Government undertake immediate full-scale mobilization of the Armed Forces and the industrial economy.

3. We reaffirm our unalterable determination to support the decision of the United Nations to defend Korea against aggression whether or not military necessity calls for the temporary withdrawal of United Nations forces.

4. The United Nations enforce economic and other necessary sanctions against Communist China unless its forces are withdrawn from Korea.

5. We refuse to recognize the Chinese Communist Government, and we oppose recognition by the United Nations.

6. We provide economic aid and military supplies to the Chinese Nationalist Government on Formosa and maintain the United States fleet there.

7. We provide economic aid and military supplies to the anti-Communist forces on the Chinese mainland, French Indochina, and Malaya.

8. We encourage India and Pakistan to strengthen themselves against any contingency, and we provide them with economic and military supplies.

9. We accelerate the negotiation of peace treaties with Japan and Germany, providing for their rearmament under agreed controls.

10. We use all means to bring about the fullest measure of common defense by every member of the Atlantic Pact, giving our utmost support to those nations which fully cooperate in mobilizing their strength, recognizing that the defense of the North Atlantic area is our major strategic interest and responsibility.

11. The Government create a nonpartisan advisory council, representing all segments of the population, including management, labor, agriculture, etc.

12. The executive departments regularly consult with the leaders of both parties in the Senate and the House of Representatives in formulating national policy in the current emergency.

13. We intern all Communists and subversives classified as dangerous by the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

14. We assist, within the limitation of essential military priorities, all governments and individuals willing to fight Communist aggression.

Yours truly,

Gen. Donald B. Adams, Dr. William S. Bernard, George V. Denny, Jr., Charles Edison, Maj. George Fielding Eliot, John Ellis, Christopher T. Emmet, George B. Ford, Rev. William J. Gibbons, S. J., Arthur J. Goldsmith, Robert R. Guthrie, Dr. Alvin S. Johnson, H. V. Kaltenborn, Frederick C. McKee, Hugh Moore, Mrs. Natalie Paine, Dr. Daniel A. Poling, Victor F. Ridder, Herbert Bayard Swope, Westmore Willcox, Jr.

COMMITTEE SERVICE

During the delivery of Mr. MORSE's speech,

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I send to the desk an order and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma in the chair). The clerk will read the order.

The legislative clerk read the order, as follows:

Ordered, That the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PASTORE] be assigned to membership on the Committee on the District of Columbia, the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, and the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the order submitted by the Senator from Illinois.

The order was agreed to.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I should like to make this one statement so that the Senator from Rhode Island will understand that this is only a temporary appointment, and that when the new Congress comes in and new committees are appointed, any assignment which he desires at that time will be considered. I say that because I do not want the Senator to be under any apprehension that he is permanently assigned to the committees referred to in the order.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Will the distinguished majority leader state how late he intends to keep the Senate in session today?

Mr. LUCAS. I cannot advise the Senator as to that at this time. I understand that a long speech is to be made by the Senator from Florida.

FEDERAL CIVIL DEFENSE PROGRAM

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, if it has not already been printed in the RECORD, I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 4268 be printed in the body of the RECORD preceding my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 4268

During the period of such emergency, neither the Federal Government nor, except in cases of willful misconduct, gross negligence, or bad faith, any officer or employee thereof while complying with or attempting to comply with any provision of this act or of any rule, regulation, or order issued pursuant to this act shall be liable to any person, whether or not such person is engaged in civil defense, for death, injury, or property damage resulting therefrom. Nothing contained in this section shall affect the right of any person to receive any benefit or compensation to which he might otherwise be entitled under the Federal Employees' Compensation Act, as amended (5 U. S. C. 751), or any other act of Congress providing for any pension or retirement.

WAIVER OF ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEDURE ACT

SEC. 305. During the period of such emergency, the functions and duties exercised under this act shall be excluded from the operation of the Administrative Procedure Act (60 Stat. 237), except as to the requirements of section 3 thereof.

TITLE IV—GENERAL PROVISIONS

ADMINISTRATIVE AUTHORITY

SEC. 401. For the purpose of carrying out his powers and duties under this act, the Administrator is authorized to—

(a) employ civilian personnel for duty in the United States, including the District of Columbia, or elsewhere, subject to the civil-service laws, and to fix the compensation of such personnel in accordance with the Classification Act of 1949, as amended; and subject to the standards and procedures of that act, to place not more than 22 positions in grades 16, 17, and 18 of the general schedule established by that act, and any such positions shall be additional to the number authorized by section 505 of that act; and, notwithstanding the provisions of any other law, including those imposing restrictions upon dual compensation or dual employment, employ in a civilian capacity, with the approval of the President, not to exceed 25 retired personnel of the armed services on a full- or part-time basis without loss or reduction of or prejudice to the retired status and compensation of such personnel;

(b) employ not to exceed 100 experts and consultants or organizations thereof, as authorized by section 55 (a), title 5, of the United States Code, and not to exceed 25 aliens. Individuals so employed may be compensated at rates not in excess of $50 per diem and, while away from their homes or regular places of business, they may be paid actual travel expense and not to exceed $15 per diem in lieu of subsistence and other expenses while so employed;

(c) utilize the services of Federal agencies and, with the consent of any State or local government, accept and utilize the services of State and local civil agencies; establish and utilize such regional and other offices as may be necessary; utilize such voluntary and uncompensated services by individuals or organizations as may from time to time be needed; and authorize the States to establish and organize such individuals and organizations into units to be known collectively as the United States Civil Defense Corps: Provided, That the members of such corps shall not be deemed by reason of such membership to be appointees or employees of the United States;

(d) employ persons of outstanding experience and ability without compensation to the extent deemed necessary and appropriate to carry out the provisions of this act and such persons may be allowed transportation and not to exceed $15 per diem in lieu of subsistence while away from their homes or regular places of business pursuant to such employment;

(e) notwithstanding any other provisions of law, accept gifts of funds, supplies, equipment, and facilities; and utilize or distribute same for civil defense purposes in accordance with the provisions of this act;

(f) reimburse any Federal agency for any of its expenditures or for compensation of its personnel and utilization or consumption of its materials and facilities under this act to the extent funds are available;

(g) purchase such printing, binding, and blank-book work from public, commercial, or private printing establishments or binderies as he may deem necessary upon orders placed by the Public Printer or upon waivers issued in accordance with section 12 of the Printing Act approved January 2, 1895, as amended; and

(h) prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper to carry out any of the provisions of this act, and, without being relieved of his responsibility therefor, perform any of the powers and duties vested in him through or with the aid of such officials of the Administration as he may designate.

EXEMPTION FROM CERTAIN PROHIBITIONS

SEC. 402. The authority granted in subsections 401 (b), (c), and (d) shall be exercised in accordance with regulations of the President who may also provide by regulation for the exemption of persons employed or whose services are utilized under the authority of said subsections from the operation of sections 281, 283, 284, 434, and 1914 of title 18 of the United States Code and section 190 of the Revised Statutes (5 U. S. C. 99).

SECURITY REGULATIONS

SEC. 403. (a) The Administrator shall establish such security requirements and safeguards, including restrictions with respect to access to information and property as he deems necessary. No employee of the Administration shall be permitted to have access to information or property with respect to which access restrictions have been established under this section, until it shall have been determined that no information is contained in the files of the Federal Bureau of Investigation or any other investigative agency of the Government indicating that such employee is of questionable loyalty or reliability for security purposes, or if any such information is so disclosed, until the Federal Bureau of Investigation shall have conducted a full field investigation concerning such person and a report thereon shall have been evaluated by the Administrator. No such employee shall occupy any position determined by the Administrator to be of critical importance from the standpoint of national security until a full field investigation concerning such employee shall have been conducted by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and a report thereon shall have been evaluated by the Administrator.

(b) Each Federal employee of the Administration shall execute the loyalty oath or appointment affidavits prescribed by the Civil Service Commission. Each person other than a Federal employee who is appointed to serve in a State or local organization for civil defense shall, before entering upon his duties, take an oath in writing before a person authorized to administer oaths, which oath shall be substantially as follows:

"I, ———, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties upon which I am about to enter.

"And I do further swear (or affirm) that I do not advocate, nor am I a member or an affiliate of any organization, group, or combination of persons that advocates the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force or violence; and that during such time as I am a member of the (name of civil defense organization), I will not advocate nor become a member or an affiliate of any organization, group, or combination of persons that advocates the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force or violence."

Any person who shall be found guilty of having falsely taken such oath shall be punished as provided in 18 United States Code 1621. The requirements of this subsection shall not be applicable to aliens appointed pursuant to subsection 401 (b) of this act.

TRANSFERS TO ADMINISTRATION

UTILIZATION OF EXISTING FACILITIES

SEC. 405. In performing his duties, the Administrator shall (1) cooperate with the various departments and agencies of the Government; (2) utilize to the maximum extent the existing facilities and resources of the Federal Government, and, with their consent, the facilities and resources of the States and local political subdivisions thereof, and of other organizations and agencies; and (3) refrain from engaging in any form of activity which would duplicate or parallel activity of any other Federal department or agency unless the Administrator, with the written approval of the President, shall determine that such duplication is necessary to accomplish the purposes of this act.

APPLICABILITY OF ACT

SEC. 406. The provisions of this act shall be applicable to the United States, its Territories, possessions, and the District of Columbia, and their political subdivisons.

APPROPRIATIONS AND TRANSFERS OF FUNDS

Funds made available for the purposes of this act may be allocated or transferred for any of the purposes of this act, with the approval of the Bureau of the Budget, to any agency or Government corporation designated to assist in carrying out this act: Provided, That each such allocation or transfer shall be reported in full detail to the Committees on Appropriations of the Senate and House of Representatives within 30 days after such allocation or transfer.

RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

SEC. 408. To aid in carrying out the purposes of this act, the Administrator is authorized to certify to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation as to the necessity under its civil defense program of purchasing securities or making a loan or loans (including participations therein and guaranties thereof) for the purpose of aiding in financing projects for civil defense purposes, and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is hereby authorized to purchase such securities or to make such loan or loans (including participations therein and guaranties thereof) with maturities not to exceed 50 years and on such terms and conditions as the Corporation may determine except that any such purchases of securities or loans may be made only to the extent that financing is not otherwise available on reasonable terms. The total amount of loans, purchases, participations, and guaranties, made pursuant to this section shall not exceed $250,000,000 outstanding at any one time.

ATOMIC ENERGY ACT OF 1946

SEC. 409. Nothing in this Act shall be construed to amend or modify the provisions of the Atomic Energy Act of 1946, as amended.

FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION

SEC. 410. Nothing in this Act shall be construed to authorize investigations of espionage, sabotage, or subversive acts by any persons other than personnel of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

SEPARABILITY

SEC. 411. If any provision of this Act or the application of such provision to any person or circumstances shall be held invalid, the remainder of the Act, and the application of such provisions to persons or circumstances other than those as to which it is held invalid, shall not be affected thereby.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a short section-by-section analysis of the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the analysis was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

Section 1 sets up the table of contents.

Section 2 contains the declaration of policy.

Section 3 is the definition section.

Section 101 establishes a Federal Civil Defense Administration headed by an Administrator appointed from civilian life by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and a Deputy Administrator appointed under the same circumstances. The Administration is placed directly under the supervision of the President.

Section 102 creates a Civil Defense Advisory Council, consisting of representatives of the Federal, State, and local governments, as well as from the citizens at large. It has a membership of 12 and the representatives of State or local agencies shall be selected from panels recommended by specified public agencies. The Council shall meet not less than once a year to advise the Administrator in his duties.

Section 201 specifies the functions of the Administration in detail.

Section 201 (a) directs the Administrator to prepare plans making full use of plans previously prepared by the National Security Resources Board if they are feasible.

Section 201 (b): In order to coordinate at one point all information as to the civil defense activities of the Federal Government, the Administrator is authorized to review all of such activities of the several departments and agencies of the Federal Government. This would include the coordination of civil defense activities carried on by the Atomic Energy Commission and the Department of Defense. In order to prevent the ignoring, duplication, or undue delay of different civil defense items or projects, the Administrator is authorized to bring the activities of such agencies with respect to civil defense into an accord or common action with each other and with the civil defense activities of the States and neighboring countries.

Section 201 (c): The Administrator is authorized to establish such communication systems as are required. It is contemplated that he must make full use of existing communication systems, including the various governmental installations and existing commercial systems. It is not intended that he establish duplicating or overlapping facilities unless absolutely essential.

Section 201 (d): The Administrator is authorized to insure the carrying on of research to afford adequate protection of life and property by developing the best methods of treating the effects of attacks by atomic, radiological, chemical, bacteriological, biological, or other weapons or processes. The Administrator must utilize the agencies best qualified to conduct such research and avoid duplication. In addition, the Administrator would develop adequate civilian shelter designs and also materials for protective covering.

It is not contemplated that the Administrator will acquire or construct research laboratories, but will utilize existing facilities. A large Federal research staff is not authorized and virtually all research will be accomplished by assignment or contract.

Section 201 (e): The Administrator will train only the top civil defense officials and training supervisors designated by the States or the political subdivisions thereof. Such schools might be operated under contract or organized and operated by the Administrator. It may be necessary to provide subsistence and quarters for the trainees and instructors on a reimbursable basis. Each class at the staff college will average about 50 students and will extend over about 5 weeks. The college staff will comprise about seven instructors. Each training school will handle about 125 students in each class and each course will extend over about 3 weeks. Shorter courses will also be given at these schools. The expenditure over a period of 3 years is estimated at about $10,000,000.

The Federal training program will include civil defense instruction in the curricula of schools and colleges; the provision of audio-visual aids and other training materials; on-the-spot institutes to assist State and local planners and administrators in the development of their civil defense program; development of tests to achieve standardization; and assistance in development of exercises to test civil defense planning, organization, and operations at the local, State, and regional levels. It is not planned that the Federal Government will underwrite the cost of travel, subsistence, or pay of students, other than Federal employees, while receiving civil defense training.

Section 201 (f): Civil defense information will be made available to every citizen through all appropriate means of communication. "Appropriate means" refers to maximum use of existing Government and private media, including the press, public libraries, magazines, special publications, manuals, handbooks, radio, television, motion-picture films, film strips, film slides, posters, exhibits, and such other means as may be available.

Section 201 (g): The Administrator is authorized to encourage the negotiation of civil defense compacts between States and review the terms thereof in order to obtain a reasonable degree of similarity or uniformity in the terms and conditions of such compacts which are consistent with the national civil defense plans and programs. The Administrator will also assist and coordinate the activities under such compacts.

This subsection grants the consent of Congress to such compacts by the filing thereof with the Congress. Lack of negative action by concurrent resolution of the Congress within 60 days will constitute approval.

Section 201 (h): In order to acquire stockpiles and also to acquire facilities necessary for civil defense, the Administrator is authorized to deal in materials and facilities as defined in the bill which are needed to prepare for or meet enemy attacks. Real property needed by the Administrator might be acquired by negotiation or condemnation and immediate possession can be obtained with the right to make improvements prior to the clearance of title by the Attorney General. Facilities may be constructed or renovated and may be leased as well as procured. The powers also relate to real property and are in broad terms since the exact situation confronting the Administrator at the time of exercising such powers is not known. Quarterly reports must be delivered to the Armed Services Committees under this subsection covering all property acquired thereunder.

Section 201 (i): The Administrator may make financial contributions to the States for civil defense purposes. Such contributions may include the financing of the procurement, construction, leasing, or renovating of materials and facilities considered necessary to prepare for or meet enemy attacks. No contributions may be made for State or local personnel and administrative expenses, or for items of personal equipment for State or local workers, or for the procurement of land. Contributions for organizational equipment shall be equally matched by the States. Such equipment would be peculiar to civil defense and of a type that must be in place at time of disaster, that is, fire-fighting equipment, portable pipe and fitting, service trucks, vehicle fitments for litters. Contributions for shelters are to be apportioned among the States—"in the ratio which the urban population of the critical target areas (as determined by the Administrator) in each State, at the time of the determination bears to the total urban population of the critical target areas of all the States."

This formula follows to some extent previous legislative enactments governing contributions to the States. The advice of the Department of Defense must be considered in establishing critical target areas. The apportionment on the basis of the critical target areas is designed to render aid to the States where the need is considered greatest. If a State fails to match the funds apportioned, such funds may be reallocated. The section further excludes from the contributions of the States the value of any land. Further, it contains sanctions in the event there is reasonable evidence of the misuse of funds contributed by the Administrator.

Section 201 (j): Materials acquired by the Administrator under title II can be disposed of only when found to be unnecessary or unsuitable for civil defense purposes. In such cases the materials shall be treated as excess property and handled in accordance with the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949. Amounts received for such materials shall be covered into the miscellaneous receipts of the Treasury.

Section 202: Under title II of the Defense Production Act of 1950 the President can requisition materials and facilities for national defense or defense. This section extends the authority to include "civil defense" within the term "national defense" or "defense."

Section 301: It is intended that the emergency authorities of this title be invoked only when the President declares a state of civil defense emergency. It can only be proclaimed during a period of war or national emergency. It is not intended that such a state of civil defense emergency exists solely because of a declaration of war or national emergency. A second positive step must be taken by the President, and it is intended that the Congress have full power to terminate these authorities whether or not the President agrees with such action. Because of the broad nature of these powers the committee is of the opinion that their invocation be exercised only under the gravest circumstances.

Section 302: This section is designed to make available the resources of the Federal Government for civil defense purposes during the period of the emergency. The decision to use these resources and the extent to which they shall be used is to be decided by the President. The President is directed to take into consideration the military requirements of the Department of Defense in directing the use of the resources, for it is not intended that anything be done which might impair the military in carrying out its primary mission. Resources include personnel, materials, and facilities. It is intended that these authorities shall exist for as short a time as practicable and then only while the requirements of section 301 are met.

Section 303 (a): The emergency authority herein contained can be exercised without regard to the limitations of existing laws. The laws cited relate to facilities and materials and briefly are as follows:

610 U. S. C. 278a: Lease of buildings to Government—maximum rental shall not exceed 15 percent of fair market value, etc.

41 U. S. C. 5: All purchases and contracts for supplies and purchases or services must be advertised.

40 U. S. C. 259: No money shall be paid for a site for a public building in excess of amount appropriated.

40 U. S. C. 267: Restrictions on buildings; approval of sketch plans, limit of cost.

The Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 contains the general authority and limitations relating to the procurement of personal property.

The foregoing limitations may be varied to expedite and aid in the procurement of materials and facilities.

Section 303 (b): This subsection confers broad authority on the Administrator during an emergency in connection with the transactions for the disposal of materials. Primarily such authority will be used to make available materials which have been stockpiled in the regional areas. Depending on the severity of the attack, the Administrator may sell at cost or perhaps market value. With widespread and continued attacks the Administrator might deliver the materials without compensation. In the event sales are made under these conditions, funds received are available to the Administrator and need not be covered into miscellaneous receipts of the Treasury.

Section 303 (c): Authorizes the direction of relief activities as established by section 302.

Section 303 (d): Provides, during an emergency, for the reimbursement of any State of expenses incurred in performing civil defense functions outside the State, including the payment of fair and reasonable compensation of materials used and expenses and salaries of employees utilized.

Section 303 (e): Authorizes the providing of financial assistance for the relief of aid of persons injured or who may be homeless or in want as a result of damage caused by an attack.

Section 303 (f): Authorizes employment of temporary personnel without regard to the civil service laws and the obligating of the United States for civil defense purposes as authorized by the act.

Any of the authorities of section 303 which are exercised must be reported quarterly to the Congress starting within 90 days of the invocation of the first authority.

Section 304: No employees of the Federal Government or the States or their political subdivisions shall be held liable for damage incurred in performing civil defense functions during an emergency. In effect this section sets aside the Federal Torts Act as it applies to these employees. It is not intended that they be protected from acts caused as a result of gross negligence, willful misconduct, or bad faith.

Section 305: Waives all the requirements of the administrative procedures without excepting the one requiring publication of regulations in the Federal Register.

Section 401: This section authorizes the employment of civilian personnel in accordance with the requirements of the civil-service laws and the Classification Act. The bill provides 22 positions in the so-called superclassification grade and authority for the Administrator to employ, with the approval of the President, not to exceed 25 retired military personnel. This would be without regard to the dual compensation laws to permit the drawing of both civil and retired pay.

As originally introduced, the section also authorized the employment of experts and consultants without. Such personnel could be employed at $50 per day. The committee limited the number of such persons to 100 and authorized in addition the appointment of 25 aliens to assist in the development of the program. These aliens are to be experts in the field of civil defense from the United Kingdom and Canada. It is intended that they be screened thoroughly for security purposes in accordance with the normal provisions that may be in existence to insure no alien being employed whose employment would be a threat to the security of the United States.

This section also authorizes the utilization of the services of Federal agencies, and with their consent the utilization of the services of State and local governments. It also authorizes the States to organize their civil defense workers in a corps to be known as the United States Civil Defense Corps, but membership in such corps does not per se establish such individuals as appointees or employees of the United States.

The section also authorizes the employment of persons of outstanding experience and ability without compensation to assist in carrying out the provisions of the act as well as the acceptance of gifts and their distribution for civil-defense purposes. Reimbursement to any Federal agency for expenditures made in connection with the purposes of this act is authorized out of funds available to the Administrator. It provides the normal provisions concerning printing and binding and permits the Administrator, without being relieved of his responsibilities, to delegate certain of his powers and duties to other officials of the Administration.

Section 402 permits the President to issue regulations exempting certain persons employed by the Administration from the operation of certain sections of the Criminal Code barring dual service of Federal employees. This authority is similar to that granted under the Defense Production Act of 1950 and it is the intent that the authorities of this section be exercised under regulations uniform with those prescribed under the Defense Production Act of 1950.

Section 403: This section provides that the Administrator establish stringent security regulations governing the activities of the agency. As originally introduced it would have required all employees to be the subject of a full field investigation by the Federal Bureau of Investigation. As amended the section provides that all employees shall be checked against the files of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and other investigative agencies of the Federal Government. In event any derogatory information is developed, such employees shall be the subject of full field investigations by the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

The Administrator shall also designate positions of critical importance and the occupants of those positions shall be investigated thoroughly by the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Also, since the provisions of the Atomic Energy Act of 1946, as amended, apply to persons employed under the authority of this act, all employees having access to classified atomic energy data must be investigated fully by the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

The section also requires the Federal employees to execute the normal loyalty oath for such employees. Persons serving in State or local organizations are required to take an oath of allegiance to the Constitution of the United States. The only exception from this requirement will be the 25 aliens authorized in section 401 (b).

Section 404 transfers the functions, personnel, and property of the Federal Civil Defense Administration in the Office of Emergency Management at the present time to the Administration established by this bill.

Section 405 requires the Administrator to utilize to the maximum extent possible existing facilities and resources of the Federal Government. The committee amended the bill to make it clear that it does not intend that the Administrator establish duplicate Federal functions unless the President specifically approves such duplication in writing.

Section 406: This section provides that the bill shall apply to the United States, its Territories, and the District of Columbia, and their political subdivisions.

Section 407 is the normal authorization for appropriations along with authority to transfer funds appropriated to the Administrator to any agency or Government corporation designated to assist in carrying out the provisions of this bill. Such transfer requires the approval of the Bureau of the Budget and full reports to the Committees on Appropriations of the House of Representatives and Senate.

Section 408: This section is aimed at encouraging the development of self-liquidating projects to provide civil-defense facilities, including shelters, utilities, hospitals, and so forth. It merely modifies existing law to permit the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to grant loans for such purposes with a maturity period of 50 years instead of the 40 years as contained in present law. The Administrator of Civil Defense must certify to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation as to the necessity to the civil-defense program of such projects. The amount that can be outstanding at any time for this purpose is $250,000,000, and it is the intent that this be an increase in the lending authority of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Section 409: This section makes it clear that nothing in this bill shall affect in the slightest degree the provisions of the Atomic Energy Act of 1946, as amended.

Section 410 makes it clear that nothing in this bill authorizes investigations of espionage, sabotage, or subversive activities by other than the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Section 411 establishes the usual provisions for separability to insure that in the event any section is deemed invalid the other sections shall apply.

The hearings that were held on the subject have been printed and made available to each Senator.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, we are today considering Senate bill 4268, a bill to round out the national defense of the United States by establishing a program for civil defense. This bill has been reported unanimously by the Senate Armed Services Committee. A companion bill passed the House of Representatives yesterday with only one dissenting vote. For almost a year a subcommittee of the Armed Services Committee, consisting of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHAPMAN], the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN,] and myself, has been studying this problem and simulanteously studies were made by the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy.

In that connection, Mr. President, I wish to pay tribute to the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy and to its Chairman, the distinguished senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCMAHON] for the intense study they have made of the problem and for the report on the subject which they have published. I feel that their studies and the hearings which have been held have contributed much to the information of the public and the Congress on the question of civilian defense.

Undoubtedly the activity of the joint committee in this field has done much to encourage and to hasten the submission of plans for civilian defense by the executive departments. While we are considering the bill at a late date, it probably would have been later had it not been for the excellent activity of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy and of its chairman.

The staffs of the two committees have worked in concert on this proposal, and we are grateful for the assistance which they have given us.

I also desire to say, Mr. President, that the staff of the Armed Services Committee of the Senate during the past 9 or 10 months have given a great deal of consideration to the problem of civilian defense, particularly Colonel Chambers, who has been assigned to this particular work. His assistance has been very substantial and very intelligently rendered.

The Committee on Armed Services, in addition to hearing a report of which has been printed, also conducted very extensive executive hearings over a period of many days. The executive hearings are necessarily classified and are not for general use in printed form for the Members of the Senate.

The Senate Armed Services Committee and the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy are agreed that there is no more pressing problem facing the country today than is the prompt enactment of legislation in this field.

Over and beyond any other consideration as to the need for prompt action on this bill is the fact that it is designed to provide only a small Federal agency to guide and coordinate an extensive Federal and State structure which will be largely manned by volunteer forces. Such a plan will require the enactment of a great deal of legislation by the various State legislatures, a majority of which will convene in January.

In that connection, Mr. President, the Governors Conference urged very strenuously that this proposed legislation be passed and that the conference report be agreed upon as early as possible, in order that before the State legislatures meet in January the Administrator may have time to work out plans and programs so the activities of the States and the Federal Government can be coordinated. Forty-four of the State legislatures will meet in January. It is urgent that the bill be passed and the conference report agreed upon tomorrow, if possible. Every State in the Union has established some kind of civilian defense organization. Most of them have been established by executive orders of the various governors, but they are very anxious to have it in legislative form when the 44 State legislatures meet in January.

We are unanimous in believing that it is mandatory that the Federal civil defense law be enacted in advance of the meetings of the various State legislatures in order to provide a proper base for State laws.

I do not propose at this time to attempt to analyze in detail the provisions of this bill. I intend to explain it in general terms and answer such questions as will be raised to the best of my ability. If it appears that the bill is too controversial to be voted on today, I am more than willing to delay the voting until tomorrow so that it can be considered overnight by those Members of the Senate who retain some reservations. I would like to point out, however, that the hearings on this bill were printed and distributed to the offices of all the Senators, so that many of your inquiries have perhaps already been answered by the testimony taken before the committee.

In approaching the problem of establishing a civil defense plan, the committee has unanimously concurred in the proposition that it must be solved at the local level. Nor can it be confined to a few critical areas throughout the country. In this day of potential extensive damage which can be caused by atomic weapons or others perhaps more devastating, it is essential that not only the critical target areas be defended and plans prepared for their protection, but that the various small communities be prepared to provide support for the defense of the so-called critical target cities.

Mr. President, after listening to the excellent address of the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] as to the necessity of mobilization, military and civil, I know that the public generally will understand this necessity. It is useless to plan a civil defense plan for Detroit, for instance, unless we gear into it the many small cities and hamlets of Michigan, Canada, and perhaps other States which must receive evacuees, furnish emergency housing, medical care, food and clothing, and help rehabilitate those persons who might be the helpless victims of such an attack. Furthermore, if the productive capacity of Detroit, which I use only as an example in this case, is to be maintained, we must have on a State and Nationwide basis plans which will permit the rapid reestablishment of those sections of Detroit which can be quickly rehabilitated and put back into production. I know that many persons have argued that we need only to provide a civil-defense plan to include the critical target areas. Mr. President, nothing could be more shortsighted or potentially as dangerous as thinking of this type. Just as the requirements of a military campaign demand careful organization in the rear areas to support the front lines, so does our civil-defense plan require a fully organized country to support the critical cities.

When legislation on this subject was first introduced, the committee felt it proposed entirely too broad a grant of power to the Administrator. In substance, there was no normal grant of power under which the Administrator would have functioned. He always would have had available to him the so-called emergency powers, which did not seem desirable to those of us who studied the proposal. Accordingly the bill was rewritten and divided into four titles. Three of these titles establish the normal peacetime functioning of the Civil Defense Administration, which would permit the development in an orderly fashion of a well-rounded civil-defense program. Into title III were placed all the so-called emergency powers as they were by the House of Representatives. The idea was originally brought forward by Representative VINSON, the chairman of the House Committee on Armed Services. The House, in the bill it passed, also made a division of the bill into titles. These powers are extremely broad and should be carefully controlled. Basically, these powers can only be invoked when the President declares a civil-defense emergency.

This civil defense emergency can only be declared after he has first declared a national emergency, or a declaration of war has been made by the Congress. There is one exception to these conditions. The committee, after hearing the testimony, was convinced that there may come a time when the President might need to place into operation some of the emergency powers without alarming the citizens of our country or placing our actions on notice to hostile foreign countries. This could well come about through the receipt by our military and the President of certain intelligence which would indicate a pressing need to expedite our civil defense program. In the event the President thought this intelligence was of such a nature as to indicate a threat to the national safety, he is authorized, after first consulting with the chairman of the respective Armed Services Committees of the Congress, to direct the Administrator of Civil Defense to invoke any or all of the emergency powers. The committee was not very happy about this alternative procedure but inserted it after careful and considered discussion of the point involved. In all cases we reserved the right to terminate the use of such powers by concurrent resolution of the Congress.

Another point which received considerable attention by the committee was the cost of this program, and how it would be financed. The committee was well aware of the fact that this project is a serious and an extensive one and could well run into heavy expenditures. It is estimated that this bill will cost over a period of 3 years between $3,000,000,000 and $3,200,000,000. Of this amount approximately 54 percent will be furnished by the Federal Government and 46 percent by the State and local communities. In any event it is a drain on the taxpayer. Various amendments were suggested which would have cost the Federal Government a greater proportionate share of the total expense. The committee has consistently rejected all of these proposed amendments. Furthermore, it has endeavored to reduce the total cost of the program by eliminating any expenditures for so-called self-liquidating projects. These might be underground garages, hospitals, and items of that nature. These could be financed under normal lending procedures by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, but there are no direct appropriations to assist in the construction of such projects.

The largest single item of expenditure over a period of 3 years is $2,250,000,000 for shelters, of which the Federal Government would put up 50 percent of the money. The other expensive items include stockpiles of medical supplies and equipment of various kinds which will cost in the vicinity of $300,000,000, all to be paid from Federal money. Organizational type equipment will cost about $200,000,000 equally divided between the Federal Government and the States, and communication equipment which will be paid for by the Federal Government and which will cost roughly $32,000,000.

We have heard a great many questions concerning the cost of the shelter program. It is interesting to note that all the government and municipal people have been greatly interested in the shelter program because they believe that it is one of the most urgent requirements of the total program. In that the committee concurs. According to the testimony given to the committee there is no intention on the part of the administration and certainly it is not the intention of the committee to start a promiscuous construction program of large, underground mass shelters. Rather this program contemplates a strengthening of existing basements where the basic construction permits, and the development of a certain number of relatively small bomb shelters in properly located districts to provide protection for the persons working in those areas. It does not contemplate shelters in individual back yards nor does it envision the building of shelters in communities which are not in the so-called critical target areas. Mr. President, we are spending billions of dollars on our national military machine. That machine can only function if it has the proper equipment and the tools with which to work. The ability to get those tools and equipment rests squarely on the productive effort of our country, and that in turn can only be insured by an implementation of the civil-defense program, including the shelter program.

I know that there are those who argue that this program involves too much money, but we can no longer stand idle in this business of getting ready to meet the threat of atomic war. I know that many are tired of hearing us say on the floor of the Senate that we are at war. But, Mr. President, there is an old doctrine of the law which we all know well and that is that the facts speak for themselves. We are already virtually at war and we have already waited too long in this business of civil defense. I certainly hope that no one today will oppose this bill solely because of some vague fear that it is going to cost too much money, or that the powers granted are too broad.

I repeat that the Senate Armed Services Committee unanimously approved this bill after considerable discussion. I believe the general principles of the bill have been agreed upon by the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy. Just as we are now in a position of placing confidence and trust in our military leaders, we must create an organization and place confidence in the leaders who will handle the problem of civil defense. The Military Establishment does not want to handle this problem and has specifically recommended that it not be assigned to them. Yet they say that it is a problem which must be solved immediately because only through a program such as this can we be assured that our vital productive capacity and civilian morale in this country can be maintained. The Armed Services Committee believes that such legislation is necessary. It believes that we have already waited too long for the creation of such a plan. It believes that the bill that we have before us has been screened and modified to the point where it gives a reasonable protection against an unwarranted use of authorities by the Executive Department.

Mr. President, I could go on at great length arguing for the consideration and passage of this bill. I prefer, however, to take no more of the Senate's time, but I am prepared to answer such questions as may be directed to me. Probably it will not be possible to act on the bill today, but tomorrow I hope we can get early consideration of it and that it may be possible to agree on the conference report tomorrow, or at least at the very earliest time possible.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY IN THE FAR EAST

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I do not intend to delay the Senate. However, I have some material which I desire to have placed in the RECORD. On the 27th of April of this year during the hearings before the Committee on Foreign Relations, Mr. Earl Browder, the former secretary of the Communist Party in America, testified relative to some prior criticisms he had made of our policy, as he then understood it, of supporting the Republic of China and of being critical of the Communist regime in China. As I recall his testimony, he said he was called to the State Department by the then Under Secretary of State, Mr. Welles, and was given a memorandum, which in turn he transmitted to Mme. Sun Yat-sen, who I understand now occupies a position as one of the vice chairmen of the Communist regime in China.

Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent that there appear at this point in my remarks the statement I made immediately upon coming to the floor of the Senate from the hearing of the Committee on Foreign Relations. My statement on that day is found on page 5897 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Eighty-first Congress, second session.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. KNOWLAND. Apropos the question raised by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] on the testimony today, to most of which I listened, as did the Senator from South Dakota, I was rather startled at the testimony of Mr. Browder to the effect that he had transmitted through some channels to the Government of the United States messages he had received from Mao Tse-tung, the Communist leader in China, which influenced this Government in changing its policy. As I understood the testimony this morning, that policy was changed on or about October 1942, and from that time to 1945 it was so satisfactory to the Communist Party of the United States that they did not feel it was necessary to carry on their agitation. While he said that he felt it would not be proper to claim sole credit for doing it, it did so happen that the policy which we pursued after October 1942 was certainly reasonably satisfactory to the Communist Party in this country.

I have not had a chance to completely reanalyze the American white paper which was issued on August 5, 1949, relative to our dealings with China, except in a somewhat cursory manner. I have checked through it, and I cannot find any such document in the American white paper on or about the date of October 1942. I have had my office contact the State Department to ask them to furnish me with a copy of this document which Mr. Browder says Sumner Welles gave him with the understanding that he would transmit it to Mme. Sun Yat-sen, who was one of the leading figures in the Communist Party in China, and who, I believe, is now one of the vice chairmen of the Communist regime in China. I have also asked that they supply me with the documents leading up to the issuance of that paper, which apparently was turned over to Mr. Browder for transmittal to Mme. Sun Yat-sen.

Reserving my judgment until the State Department clearly can indicate whether or not this memorandum appears in the white paper, I should say that it would seem to me to be rather unusual for a document of such importance, which marks the turning point of American policy in China, should have been excluded from the white paper. I am saying now that it has been excluded. I cannot find it. Certainly I feel that there should be a full explanation to the Senate and to the country as to why these documents, which now appear to be of considerable historic interest in this whole problem, were not amply outlined in the white paper with reference to China.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I desire also to have printed in the body of the RECORD at this point in my remarks a memorandum which I received from my administrative assistant, Mr. George Wilson, relative to telephone conversations which he had had at my direction with Mr. Sprouse, of the State Department, asking the State Department for a copy of the memorandum regarding which Mr. Browder testified. In this memorandum to me, which speaks for itself, which was made on April 29, 1950, Mr. Wilson informs me that he in turn had been informed by the State Department that they had made a diligent search of the records, and had not been able to find a copy to furnish me. I might say, Mr. President, that so far as I can find in the files of my office, no subsequent communication was received from the State Department in regard to that matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from California?

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Thursday evening at about 6 o'clock I called Mr. Sprouse of the State Department (extension 5662) and told him that you would appreciate very much being furnished with a copy of a message or statement which was sent by Sumner Welles to Madam Sun-Yet-sen via Mr. Earl Browder. I informed him that the message was sent approximately in October of 1942. I also informed him that you had been unable to find the message in the white paper although you had not made a detailed search for the statement.

On Friday about a quarter to 12 I again called Mr. Sprouse to inquire if he was able to locate the statement which I had discussed with him the previous evening. He advised me that they were checking their files but had not, as yet, found the message. I, therefore, advised him if they would check the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Thursday, April 27, and I gave him the specific page number, it might shed a little more light on the document that they were looking for. He thanked me and assured me that they were still looking for Mr. Welles' statement.

At about 4:15 Friday, April 28, I again called Mr. Sprouse and on being advised that he was attending a session of the Institute of Foreign Relations, asked that he call me back when he returned. At about 5:30 or 6 o'clock he returned my call and advised me that his people had been unable, as of the moment, to find the Welles statement but would continue to look for it. I thanked him and advised him that in addition to the Welles statement, you would like a copy of a message which Mr. Browder claimed he had received from Mao Tse-tung in 1942, regarding the military situation in China, which he, in turn, claimed to have given to President Roosevelt. I stated that I assumed copies of the message were made available by the White House to the State Department and was sure the message would be in the State Department files. I further advised him that Mr. Browder stated that the information he had received from Mao was later confirmed by our own military sources.

At the time of our last conversation, I informed Mr. Sprouse that you were quite anxious to receive copies of the two messages as soon as possible.

In talking about the Welles statement, I also asked for any supporting papers which would be available.

GEORGE WILSON.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I desire to have printed at this point in my remarks a copy of the memorandum given to Mr. Earl Browder by the Under Secretary of State, Mr. Sumner Welles, at his office in the State Department on October 12, 1942. I shall not take the time of the Senate to read the entire memorandum because it will speak for itself, but I do desire to read this much of an extract from it:

With regard to the specific charge that "these officials continue the old policy of 'war against the Communists' in China" this Government has had no such policy, either "old" or "new." This Government has in fact viewed with skepticism many alarmist accounts of the "serious menace" of "Communism" in China.

I ask that the entire memorandum be printed as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM GIVEN TO EARL BROWDER BY UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE SUMNER WELLES, AT HIS OFFICE IN THE STATE DEPARTMENT, OCTOBER 12, 1942

With regard to the specific charge that it is on the advice of reactionary officials in the State Department that Chiang Kai-shek is keeping his best armies out of the war, the simple fact is that the nearest approach to advice given by any officials in the Department of State in this context has been an expression of an opinion that civil strife in China, at all times unfortunate, would be especially unfortunate at a time when China is engaged in a desperate struggle of self-defense against an armed invader. The implication of this expression of opinion was that the Chinese Government should try to maintain peace by processes of conciliation between and among all groups and factions in China. And the course which Chiang Kai-shek has been pursuing is not keeping his best armies out of the war. Both the armies of the National Government and the Communist armies are fighting the Japanese. No Chinese armies are actively engaged in large-scale offensive operations against the Japanese—for the reason, principally, that there is lacking to all Chinese armies types and amounts of equipment which are essential to such operations, but this situation is one which both the Chinese Government and the American Government are endeavoring to remedy as equipment becomes available.

With regard to the specific charge that the State Department in Washington has informed Chungking's representatives that our Government would be displeased if complete unity was established in China between the Kuomintang and the Communists, what this statement alleges is the exact opposite of the fact. The State Department in Washington has at all times taken the position, both in diplomatic contexts and publicly, that the United States favors complete unity among the Chinese people and all groups or organizations thereof.

With regard to the specific charge that these officials continue the old policy of war against the Communists in China, this Government has had no such policy, either "old" or "new." This Government has in fact viewed with skepticism many alarmist accounts of the serious menace of communism in China. We have, for instance, as is publicly and well known, declined to be moved by the Japanese contentions that presence and maintenance of Japanese armed forces in China were and would be desirable for the purpose of combating communism.

With regard to the specific charge that officials of this Government tell Chungking it must continue to fight the Communists if it wishes United States friendship, the simple fact is that no officials of this Government ever have told Chungking either that it must fight or that it must continue to fight the Communists, this Government holds no such brief, this Government desires Chinese unity and deprecates civil strife in China; this Government treats the Government of China as an equal; it does not dictate to the Government of China, it does not make United States friendship contingent; it regards unity within China, unity within the United States, unity within each of the countries of the United Nations group, and unity among the United Nations as utterly desirable towards effectively carrying on war against the Axis powers and toward creation and maintenance of conditions of just peace when the United Nations shall have gained the victory which is to be theirs.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I also ask to have printed as a part of my remarks, for the information of the Senate, an article which I have since dug up from the Congressional Library, from the files of the New York Daily Worker, which was published Friday, October 16, 1942, in which there is an article under the heading "Welles states United States policy on China." Then it gives an interview with Mr. Browder, and following this there appeared the text of the memorandum which I have checked with the memorandum which I have just put into the RECORD, and they seem to coincide.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from California?

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WELLES STATES UNITED STATES POLICY ON CHINA—AFTER INTERVIEW WITH UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE, BROWDER RETRACTS CHARGES AGAINST STATE DEPARTMENT OFFICIALS

Earl Browder, general secretary of the Communist Party, at his office at 35 East Twelfth Street, New York City, made the following statement to the press yesterday:

"In the Worker of October 4, I made charges that persons whom I designated as reactionary officials in the State Department were encouraging the maintenance of a situation in China harmful to the war effort of our country and its allies. I spoke of strained relations between Kuomintang and Communists, resulting in the immobilization of large numbers of the best troops of that country.

"Upon the invitation of Mr. Sumner Welles, the Under Secretary of State, I visited him in his office on October 12, in company with Mr. Robert Minor, and heard from him, and from Mr Lauchlin Currie, administrative assistant to the President, a detailed refutation of my charges in this respect. The information received from Mr. Welles and Mr. Currie convinced me that my charges had been made on the basis of incomplete information. I believe it is established that no responsible official of the State Department is contributing to disunity in China, and that the policy of the United States Government is being exerted in the opposite direction.

"I am therefore more than happy to retract those charges without reservation. What I had thought of as a heavy door that needed pushing open proved to be but a curtain of lack of information. Since many persons in the United States and in China also are without that information which I lacked before visiting Mr. Welles, I believe our war effort will be benefited if I make public that portion of Mr. Welles' remarks which was given to me in written form."

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I merely wish to say that one of the great difficulties the Senate of the United States has in meeting its problems is getting information. It is very difficult sometimes for a United States Senator to get information he needs in the discharge of his duties. I was here during a portion of the remarks of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], in which he quite properly, I believe, said that had the Senate been consulted on certain policies which were followed in the Far East and elsewhere, he believes that perhaps a different policy might have ensued.

I wish to say to the Senator from Oregon that I agree with him in his statement, if I correctly understood him. But I also wish to point out to him that it is very difficult for the Senate to discharge its constitutional obligations when from time to time, and rather consistently, there is lowered an iron curtain between the activities of the executive departments and Senators in their quest for information which they need in the discharge of their duties. I call his attention again to the fact that for a period of 2 years, I might say the most crucial 2 years, from 1947 to 1949, the Wedemeyer report on China was suppressed, despite the fact that it was officially requested by Members of the Senate and by Senate committees.

I might say for the record that I think the Wedemeyer report on Korea, which the junior Senator from California has read—and I believe he is one of the few Senators who have had opportunity and occasion to read it—very clearly pointed out some of the very dangers which the Senator from Oregon was discussing today. If that report had been made available to the Senate of the United States and its committees, I believe that both the Armed Services Committee and the Foreign Relations Committee, as well as individual Senators, might have been able to make their influence felt.

The Senator from California did not see that report until just a month or so ago, long after the June 25 invasion of South Korea by the North Korean Communists. So it is very difficult for the legislative branch of the Government to conduct its share of the responsibilities of the Government—and we have some very heavy responsibilities—when we do not have cooperation from the executive branch in supplying us with information.

I might say to the Senator from Oregon that the Wedemeyer report on Korea was unanimously and officially requested of the State Department by the Committee on Appropriations, which was dealing with appropriations having to do with the Korean situation. I sat in a meeting of that committee, and I raised the question again with the Secretary of State, Mr. Acheson. Mr. Acheson at that time said that he had not had an opportunity to take the matter up with the President of the United States, that he expected to do so in a few days. However, it was only fair, he said, for him to tell the committee that his recommendation was to be that the committee not get the information. I thought that ought to be a matter of record for the United States Senate.

Mr. President, I desire to have printed at this point in my remarks an item which appeared on the news ticker in the anteroom of the regular Senate Chamber, saying that "The United States was reported today to be ready to send about 30 B–26 bombers to Indochina to bolster French forces fighting Communist-led rebels." I shall not read the whole article. I merely make the observation that while not objecting to this program, it seems to me to be a very strange policy which has denied for a period of more than a year much-needed planes for the defense of the island of Formosa, and yet with such alacrity the officials can find the planes and actually ship them to Indochina.

I believe the policies we have followed in the past have been the major reason for the criticism of the Department of State. I must differ with my good friend, the Senator from Oregon, because I believe it is not a matter of personalities, but is a matter of policies, and the policy involved in the news item I have just quoted is one of the policies we are apparently continuing to follow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from California?

There being no objection, the item from the news ticker was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON.—The United States was reported today to be ready to send about 30 B–26 bombers to Indochina to bolster French forces fighting Communist-led rebels.

The ships will be flown to Indochina by American crews and turned over to the French.

Officials who told reporters of the plans said there would be two squadrons of the bombers. A squadron has 15 planes.

The officials said delivery of the planes reflects American determination to rush as much military equipment as possible to the French and loyal Indochinese forces, in an effort to thwart Communist bid for power in that strategic area.

Secretary of Defense George Marshall has personally promised French Defense Minister Jules Moch that the B–26 bombers would be sent. Moch pleaded for air reenforcements when he was here in October for conferences with top officials.

The French aircraft carrier Dixmude several weeks ago arrived at an Indochina port with a cargo of some 48 American Hellcat and Helldiver fighters.

The United States also has supplied enough ground equipment and ammunition to enable the French to establish 12 battalions of loyal Indochinese nationals to help in the fight against Ho Chi Minh's guerrilla forces.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, as a part of my remarks I also desire to have printed at this point in the RECORD a letter which I addressed today to Mr. Sprouse, of the State Department, enclosing for the files of the State Department the memorandum which they gave to Mr. Browder, and which they have not been able to find.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DECEMBER 21, 1950.

Mr. PHILIP D. SPROUSE,
Office of Chinese Affairs,
Department of State, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPROUSE: You will recall during the testimony before the Foreign Relations subcommittee Mr. Earl Browder testified that he had been furnished a statement in October 1942 by Mr. Sumner Wells, then Under Secretary of State, which statement Mr. Browder apparently transmitted to Madame Sun Yat-sen.

On Thursday, April 28, Mr. George Wilson, my administrative assistant, contacted you and requested a copy of the Wells statement together with certain other documents which had been mentioned in Mr Browder's testimony. You informed Mr. Wilson that a search had been made of the State Department's records and you had been unable to locate copies of the several statements mentioned.

Today, I received what purports to be a copy of the memorandum given by Mr. Sumner Wells to Mr. Earl Browder. This may help you locate at least one of the documents that you heretofore had been unable to find.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I also ask to have printed as a part of my remarks extracts from the speech of the distinguished educator and philosopher, Dr. Hu Shih, former Ambassador to the United States which he made at the Commonwealth Club in San Francisco on December 1 of this year.

There being no objection, the extracts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHINESE PEOPLE AND GOVERNMENT NOT FREE; MAO A KREMLIN GAULEITER—BUT, DR. HU SAYS, "FREE CHINA"—MILLIONS UNDER RED BONDAGE—ON OUR SIDE

(From address by Dr. Hu Shih, famed Chinese scholar and ex-Ambassador to United States)

Before the end of 1949, nearly the whole of continental China, except for the guerrilla areas, came under the conquest of world communism.

In September 1949, the Chinese Communist Party put up a great show in Peiping. A new people's political consultative conference attended by 635 delegates designated by the Communist Party passed three documents: (1) The common program of the PPCC hailed as the constitution of the Communist regime; (2) the organization law of the central government; and (3) the organization law of the PPCC itself.

DICTATORSHIP BY PARTY

The first article of the common program gives this definition: "The People's Republic of China is a state of the new democracy, that is, a state of the people's democracy. It carries out the people's democratic dictatorship, which is led by the working class."

Translated into plain language, it means that the People's Republic of China is a dictatorship of the Chinese Communist Party in the name of the people.

It is called a state of the new democracy, because in 1940 Mao Tse-tung published a pamphlet, the New Democracy, which was an attempt to present the Chinese Communist Party under the disguise of liberalism.

The new democracy—high sounding name for the united front—was to be the combined dictatorship of several revolutionary classes.

PREVICTORY SLOGANS FORGOTTEN

My former student Mao Tse-tung, being an orthodox Communist, could conceive of all states and governments only as class dictatorships. Therefore he tells us in his pamphlet that in the whole world there are only three forms of state: (1) Republic of bourgeois dictatorship, which prevails in all old democratic countries; (2) republic of proletarian dictatorship, which is the form of state of the Soviet Union; (3) republic of joint dictatorship of several classes, which Mao calls the new democracy.

Mao Tse-tung actually talked about "an election based on a real popular and equal suffrage irrespective of differences, of sex, belief, property, and education."

But of course no Communist Party could ever tolerate sharing political power with non-Communist groups or parties. So today all previctory slogans and promises are conveniently forgotten, and the people's government is indisputably a dictatorship of the one and only party, with a number of non-Communist democratic personages holding nominal and honorary posts.

MAO ADMITS DICTATORSHIP

On July 1, 1949, the official Communist news agency broadcast a lengthy article by Mao Tse-tung which has become required reading for all teachers and students. A few sentences:

"'You are dictatorial.' Yes, dear gentlemen, you are right and we are dictatorial. * * * The reactionaries must be deprived of the right to voice their opinion, and only the people are allowed to have the right to voice their opinion.

"Who are the people? At the present stage in China, they are the working class, the peasants, the petty bourgeoisie, and the national bourgeoisie. Under the leadership of the working class and the Communist Party, these classes unite together to form their own state and elect their own government to carry out dictatorship over the running dogs of the imperialism—the landlords, the bureaucratic class, the Kuomintang reactionaries and their henchmen—these classes shall oppress them and only allow them to behave properly, and not allow them to talk and act wildly. If they talk and act wildly, they shall be curbed and punished immediately. * * *"

INSTRUMENTS OF OPPRESSION

"These two aspects, namely, democracy among the people, and dictatorship over the reactionaries, combine to form the people's democratic dictatorship.

"'Do you not want to do away with the state authority?' Yes, but not at the present. Why? Because imperialism still exists, the internal reactionaries still exist, and classes in the country still exist. * * *

"The army, the police, the court—these machineries of the state are instruments for classes to oppress classes. To the hostile classes, the state apparatus is an instrument of oppression. It is violent and not benevolent."

These arrogant and insolent words of Mao Tse-tung give a vivid picture of the dictatorial and oppressive rule under which about 400,000,000 Chinese are now suffering.

Article 5 of the common program stipulates that the people of the Chinese People's Republic shall have 11 kinds of freedom. But article 7 says:

"With regard to all reactionaries, feudalistic landlords, bureaucratic capitalists, after they are disarmed and their special influences are liquidated, they must be deprived of their political rights, but at the same time given some means of livelihood and forced to reconstruct themselves to become 'new men' by means of hard labor. * * *" Here we find forced slave labor already dignified into a constitutional provision.

NO FREEDOM OF SILENCE

Under such a regime, there is no freedom for the nonconformist. There is no freedom of speaking out, and no freedom of silence. At any moment, a man may be called upon to make positive statements of his own belief and disbelief.

A year ago last May the chancelor of the Catholic University in Peiping was made to publish an open letter in which my old friend and fellow academician said emphatically that there was no real freedom anywhere except in the areas liberated by the Communists. Did he really say that? Did he have the freedom not to say that?

A few weeks ago, all newspapers in Communist China published what purported to be a written confession of my younger son, in which he denounced me as "an enemy of the people" and also his own enemy. Did my son actually say that? Was he free not to say that? I cite this to show how oppressive the Communist regime is.

But it is not the Chinese people alone who are not free. The Chinese Communist regime itself is not free.

CHINA'S GOVERNMENT IN BONDAGE

Mao Tse-tung, the Chinese Communist Party, and the entire Chinese Communist Government are not free: They are all under the bondage which the U. S. S. R. imposes on her satellite countries.

They have always taken orders from the Kremlin, and they must continue to take such orders because Communist China is dependent on the military and industrial power of the Soviet Union.

It was Stalin who conceived and ordered creation of the Chinese Red Army. It was Stalin who throughout two decades nurtured this Red Army to full strength. It was Stalin who wrested from President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill the secret Yalta agreement which made it possible for Stalin to convert both Manchuria and North Korea into contiguous bases for the U. S. S. R. to aid effectively the Chinese and Korean Communist armies in their military conquest of China.

All this indebtedness to the U. S. S. R. has been openly acknowledged by the leaders of Chinese communism.

Mao has declared that Communist-led China must "lean to one side," must "ally with the Soviet Union, with the new people's democracies, and with the proletariat and masses of the people (that is, the communists) in other countries, to form an international united front."

ALLEGIANCE TO STALIN

This allegiance has been formally stipulated into the constitution of the Communist state in China. Article 11 says:

"The People's Republic of China allies itself with all those states and peoples who love peace and freedom. First of all, it allies itself with the Soviet Union. * * *"

The Moscow treaty made Communist China and Soviet Russia partners in a defensive and offensive alliance.

What has been happening in Tibet, what is now happening in Korea, are best evidences that Communist China has no choice but to march wherever it is ordered to move.

What could be more foolish than for the Chinese Communists to invade Tibet, thereby alienating the undoubted sympathy and support of India? The only possible explanation is that Communist China was under orders to do so.

AT WAR WITH CAPTIVE CHINA

And what could be more insane than for the new state of Communist China to embark on war with one of the two greatest powers in the world? The only possible explanation is that the great prestige of world communism is at stake and that therefore Communist China has been ordered to come to the rescue of North Korea regardless of all possible consequences.

It becomes self-evident now that all the trouble in Korea and in the Far East today stems from the fact that China is no longer free, has become a captive nation of world communism. The free world is at war with captive China.

It would have been absolutely impossible even to imagine a free China fighting the United States.

Captive China is attacking you, but free China is still your friend, ever ready to help you and fight shoulder to shoulder with you.

By "free China," I do not mean merely the 600,000 well-trained soldiers and the 7,000,000 population in the island bastion of Formosa. Nor do I mean merely the vast numbers of Chinese guerrilla units now fighting on the Chinese mainland against the Communists.

By "free China" I mean the vast majority of the Chinese people who are mentally and emotionally anti-Communist even though they are physically living and suffering under the iron yoke.

ALWAYS BE FREE CHINA

Free China exists as a reality because, of all the peoples conquered by world communism, my people are the most civilized and have lived under a civilization noted for its individualism and its century-long fights for intellectual, religious, and political freedom.

If history and civilization mean anything at all, there shall always be a free China.

And this free China is prodemocracy, pro-America and pro-West. The 100 years of China's contact with modern western ideas and institutions has not been in vain; the over 100 years of Christian missionary work in China has not been in vain; the 75 years of intensive education and training of thousands of Chinese youths in the American universities and colleges has not been and cannot be in vain.

KNOW WHAT COMMUNISM IS

The sad experience of living and suffering under Communist rule has enabled my people to understand clearly what communism and Communist rule is.

Let the free world make it clear to the people of China that it is fighting the Communist dictatorship in China and not the vast majority of the people of China; that any movement on the part of the people of China to sabotage the Communist conquerors or to rid themselves of their Stalinist puppet dictators will have the moral support and, whenever possible, the material support of democratic and peace-loving peoples of the world.

When the free world gives the word, free China will surely respond.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I also desire to have printed at this point in my remarks an article which appeared in the Fortnight Magazine for December 11, 1950, by Mr. Clement Reicher, under the title "How Vulnerable Is the Mao Regime?"

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOW VULNERABLE IS THE MAO REGIME?

(By Clement Reicher)

It appears that the Government has drawn the following conclusions from the all-out attack by the Chinese Communists: that it has brought total war near enough to make a further substantial speed-up of mobilization necessary, but not near enough to call for an immediate transfer of our troops to other potential theaters of war. It is still assumed that we have time enough to build up strength in all the most exposed positions before we have to meet a showdown with Russia. Let us hope that we have that time and that we will not have to pay a staggering price for all those years of neglecting our defense. Meanwhile, we are in for a protracted war with the Chinese Communists, unless the latter give in and withdraw their troops from Korea.

On the opposite page are indicated the lines of policy which we of Fortnight believe should be adopted. I shall here only add certain considerations which flow from my experience of living among the Chinese for 13 years with open eyes and an open mind.

For years the American public has been feasted on writings giving a vivid description of the Chinese scene, pleasantly dramatized, mostly correct in detail, but fundamentally false. From these writings the public has got the impression that Mao Tse-tung is at the head of an incomparably strong government wholeheartedly supported by all the Chinese people. Now we have to fight it. It looks a formidable, terrifying task.

Fortunately, Mao's regime is highly vulnerable. Though it has a strong army and will certainly prove to be no pushover, it rests on a shaky political basis which coming events are bound to subject to enormous pressure.

According to the popular picture, the Chinese Communists owe their phenomenal rise to power essentially to their discovery of an explosive "charge" lying hidden in the Chinese village communities. The peasants, having been "inertly miserable" for thousands of years under the crushing burdens imposed on them by usurers and the owners of the land they tilled, became "alertly miserable" after our ideals of democracy and the rights of man had reached them. This was the explosive charge. Along came the Communists and provided the "fuse" by showing the peasants how to revolt and get ownership of their farms. Liberation of the energies contained in the "charge" has swept the Communists into power.

So far, all this is true. The "charge" is certainly there; but if we know how to play our cards we can make it explode right into the faces of the Communists themselves.

What a tragedy that America, of all nations, should now have to bend her energies toward destroying what little order and peace there is in China. But since the new rulers have wantonly dragged their country into the great conspiracy against the civilized world, what else could we do? We may thank God that the National Government of China has survived American foreign policy and is still there to help us and to remind us, always, that it is not the Chinese Nation but a conspiratorial regime which is our enemy.

THE CHINESE ARE WAKING UP

Look at the holes in the glowing picture painted in the books:

The Chinese peasant now owns the land he tills. The long-coveted title deed is his and so is the joy of possessing it. It gives him all the rice he needs, and security. Piffle. It does not. Under any government with limited powers it would; but it does not under a regime with unlimited rights of taxation. It all goes up in smoke. The title deed given him by the Communists was a hoax; he has been betrayed. He can't help noticing it.

He never knew that the money extracted from him in rentals flowed, ultimately, into capital investments which kept the national economy going. He never thought that a government that relieved him from paying rentals would have to increase his taxes to make up for the loss in national savings. He did not know that Communist governments deliberately sacrifice the living generation for alleged benefits to future generations, that they do it by outrageously accelerating the process of capital formation—in other words, by taxing him as he had never been taxed before, in order to pay for rapid industrialization. He did not know it, and he does not know it now. But he is not pleased to pay, as he does now, more in taxes than he formerly paid in rentals and interest rates. On the contrary, he is as eagerly inclined to revolt against the new masters as he was against the old.

After having become the stronger party in the civil war, the Communists were in a position to offer peace. Weary of perpetual warfare, the Chinese people flocked to them by the millions. Now the angels of peace are leading the people into an even more frightful war. Won't they notice that, also?

The students, adolescent spearhead of Chinese public opinion, revolted against the little thought control there was under the old regime, only to creep into the straitjacket thought control of the new. Many of them are becoming aware of it, and resent it.

The industrial workers are now idle, or working for less pay.

The patriots turned their fury against the ghost of western imperialism and delivered their country into the grip of Russia. They are beginning to question what they have done.

WHAT KIND OF WAR?

We will not fight this war as the Japanese did, who sent their armies into the vast interior where they got bogged down. We could not even try to match American manpower against Chinese manpower, nor do we need Chinese raw materials or anything else out of China.

We should fight with planes and ships, and make up for our manpower shortage by raising Asian armies under the United Nations flag. No time should be lost in rearming Japan. Above all, we should allow the entirely reorganized and modernized army of the Chinese Nationalists on Formosa to take part in the war, giving it all the equipment and air cover it needs to become effective on the mainland. The masses of anti-Communist guerrillas, who are active in many parts of China, could be easily increased. The Communists taught the peasantry guerrilla tactics and the art of self-defense. Now this knowledge can be used against the Communist authorities and their tax collectors.

In this war, there will be a destructive task for us, and a constructive one. On the one hand, we have to undermine the Communist regime, on the other, to demonstrate to the Chinese people that there is an alternative. The Japanese failed because they could not offer that choice; a revitalized National government would provide it. It is enormously difficult to modernize a country like China. Yet, the younger men who have risen to leadership in Formosa have all it takes to succeed if we support and help them. By contrast, we shall find that subversion of the Communist regime is a much easier task, since it does not involve problems of readjustment between East and West. It can be accomplished by methods which are as old as China herself; and here is where Chiang Kai-shek comes back into the picture. He is past master in playing the old game of Chinese politics. Furthermore, only his name is known to every Chinese peasant and coolie and can become the symbol of an alternative to Communist rule.

While we were doing nothing, there was little hope for a split in Communist ranks. The war may produce it.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Finally, Mr. President, I ask to have printed at this point in my remarks an editorial which appeared in the same issue of the same magazine over the signature of Mr. Keep, the publisher, entitled "Let Us Do Our Stern Duty."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LET US DO OUR STERN DUTY

The raw intervention of Red China in the Korean War is the final proof that the Communist regimes of Russia and China are twins in evil and barbarism. Hard-minded people have never doubted it, but wishful thinkers among our socialistic do-gooders, scholars, and diplomats have clung desperately to the illusion that somehow the Chinese Reds were different and somehow might be appeased.

The British Socialists and Pandit Nehru, of India, have been as unrealistic as has Mr. Acheson. Now it is time for Mr. Acheson, Professor Jessup, John Carter Vincent, Dean Rusk, and other soft thinkers to resign from our State Department. This coterie of bad guessers has completely lost the confidence of the people.

Surely President Truman must know this. No considerations of pride, politics, or personal friendship can possibly justify his continuing to entrust the future of mankind to these discredited men. The President, like everyone else, must now do his stern duty. He will have Americans of both parties with him when he does.

There are only two things, it seems to us, that can prevent world war III and, if it comes, save Asia and the entire world from communism: (1) American willingness to fight as we were willing to fight after Pearl Harbor; (2) our realistic readiness to use every available ally, whether we like him or not, including, immediately, Chiang Kai-shek and his reformed and powerful Formosan Army and the hordes of disaffected Chinese guerrillas on the mainland.

We may very well be able to upset the Chinese Communist government without a general war, if we play our cards boldly and coldly before effective internal opposition is smothered. We have no intention of invading China, of course.

But Chiang must be released, as Senator WILLIAM KNOWLAND so wisely states, from his commitment not to raid the mainland of China, and we must immediately authorize our airmen to bomb the Manchurian airfields and centers from which the Chinese Reds are dispatched and supplied.

England 10 short years ago saved civilization from Hitlerism until help arrived. With infinitely greater resources the United States can save itself and the world from communism. There are enormous factors in our favor.

The Communist regimes are founded on fear, fanaticism, hate, and incredible cruelty. These regimes by now are as abhorrent to millions of Russians and Chinese as they are to us. There are already powerful undergrounds in both Russia and China, not to mention the shaky satellite nations. Millions of Communist troops are "undependable" and vast will be the sabotage and quick surrenders once the issue is fully joined.

We are fighting for our lives and for all freedom-loving people. We cannot afford to be too squeamish as to the means or the allies we employ against an absolutely ruthless enemy. This is the test of western civilization; can it again master a bold and savage tyranny?

Fortnight believes that in the interest of possible peace and—failing that—ultimate victory:

1. We must ask the UN bluntly to accuse Red China of outright aggression and deny her UN recognition.

2. We must maintain and strengthen our armies in Korea and keep this beachhead in Asia at all costs.

3. We must aid Chiang's Formosan army and his mainland guerrillas and saboteurs in every possible hard-boiled way.

4. We must first threaten to bomb Manchurian military objectives unless the Chinese Reds withdraw promptly from Korea, following through if they defy us.

5. We must, as Senator KNOWLAND says, arm the western Germans, the Japanese, and the Spaniards against the Russian threat.

6. We must put the Harry Bridges and the Hugh Brysons out of action, for their efforts to create unrest are intolerable at a time like this.

7. We must purge our Government of all suspected traitors whether proof sufficient for actual prosecution can be adduced or not. It is no part of anyone's civil rights to work for the United States Government.

8. We must draft more young men, after giving the hardier of them a chance to volunteer for hand-picked combat units which we now so sadly lack. We must call up more reserves and additional National Guard outfits. We must, unfortunately, get back to a war footing as rapidly as possible.

And we must keep our heads, embark on no witch hunts, persecute no groups. We must accustom ourselves to doing the hard thing rather than the soft and we must believe in Almighty God and the justice of our cause. Then, deserving leadership, we will surely find the entire civilized and semi-civilized world following our lead. In due time the top-heavy structure of world communism will fall in ruins as the result of our pressure against it and its own evil weakness.

O. D. KEEP,
Publisher.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1950

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou blessed and eternal God, we thank Thee for the high and holy privilege of coming unto Thee through the old and familiar way of prayer.

Grant that in these perilous times we may not rely only upon the might and power of material resources, but may we seek to develop strength of spirit and faith with which we shall be prepared and able to cope with anything that the future may hold for us of suffering and sacrifice.

We are confident that no enemy from the outside can ever conquer us and that if defeat should overtake us it would be because of our inner failures and the spiritual weakness of our hearts.

Inspire us to cultivate the habit of daily prayer for we have the testimony of experience that if we pray in ordinary days we shall know how to pray with conquering power when we are beset by trials and tribulations, by moods of cowardice and fear, and by despondency and despair.

In Christ's name we bring our petitions. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

When the time came for them to retire they were given very substantial retirement pay. Although the Government owes them a debt, they, in turn, owe the Government a much greater debt. If these men are needed in the service today during this or any future emergency, there is the very simple expedient of recalling them to active duty and letting them revert back to active duty pay being assigned where their ability can be best used. That takes care of the situation entirely. Of course it will be said that the bill provides a ceiling of $5,000.

But at the same time the President, in a national emergency is given the power to suspend that ceiling. If that is done there is no limit on what this dual remuneration might be.

May I point out further, Mr. Speaker, there was no such legislation or provision such as this during all of World War II. Certainly the present emergency is not as serious as World War II.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I object to the present consideration of this bill.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute for the purpose of asking the majority leader if he can clarify the program for the next day or two, or up to January 1.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow will be confined to any conference reports that may be ready; also any bills that can be taken up by unanimous consent. That is always implied if it is not expressed.

I am unable to state whether the conference report will be ready on the tax bill. If so, we would like to get through with that tomorrow. If not, it will be taken up on January 1.

The union shop bill will be taken up on January 1, as well as the War Powers Act.

Any conference reports not acted upon tomorrow will be taken up on January 1. I do not know of any other legislation, but by this statement I do not want to exclude any other legislation being considered on January 1 if that may develop. What I have stated is the only legislation I can specifically refer to that will be taken up after we meet on January 1.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. What about the appropriation bill?

Mr. TABER. The appropriation bill is going to conference tonight, we expect.

Mr. McCORMACK. We are hopeful that that will be agreed upon and acted upon tomorrow. If that is agreed upon, it will be acted upon tomorrow. Also the conference report on the tax bill, if that has been agreed upon in conference.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I have been assigned the rule on the War Powers Act on the minority side. I understood the gentleman to say the railroad labor bill and the War Powers Act would be called up on January 1. Can the gentleman tell us which bill will be called up first under that schedule?

Mr. McCORMACK. I am unable to state that, but it is my understanding that, if the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BECKWORTH] seeks recognition, he probably will have to be recognized.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. BECKWORTH. The gentleman knows, doubtless, that the gentleman from Texas would seek recognition on that bill when he is told by the leadership it is the proper time. That is substantially what we have tried to do as a committee thus far.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am telling the gentleman that that matter will be taken up on January 1.

Mr. BECKWORTH. January 1 was set without consulting the gentleman from Texas or any member of his committee that I know of.

Mr. McCORMACK. Is that intended as an implied rebuke to anybody?

Mr. BECKWORTH. No; no rebuke is implied. However, I feel the situation should be clear.

Mr. McCORMACK. If so, let me advise the gentleman——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the gentleman's recognition is entirely within the discretion of the Chair. If the Chair thinks other matters have priority, they will be taken up first.

Mr. BECKWORTH. The gentleman just wants it understood.

Mr. McCORMACK. But the gentleman from Massachusetts wants the gentleman from Texas to understand that there are situations where members of a committee cannot be consulted at times.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. The gentleman from Ohio simply asked that question because he had been assigned the rule on the War Powers Act on the minority side, and he just wanted to know what time he should be here.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman from Massachusetts is sorry the gentleman from Ohio has not had an opportunity to make the speech he has in mind.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I am sure the House has lost a great deal of wisdom.

Mr. McCORMACK. Whether we agree on that or not, we all agree that we respect the gentleman and his views.

CHRISTMAS GREETINGS AND OUR GRATITUDE TO THE BOYS IN KOREA

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, it would be ironical to wish the men fighting for us in Korea a merry Christmas, but we can unite in sending them our prayers, our love, and our deep gratitude for what they are doing for us.

The Prince of Peace was born years ago on Christmas Day. The Prince of Peace gave his life for us. These men in Korea are giving their lives for us. We can pledge ourselves today never for one instant to cease to care for them and to see that their sacrifices are not in vain. We can pray that their sacrifices will bring a just and lasting peace.

THE LATE HON. HATTIE W. CARAWAY

Mr. NORRELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. NORRELL. Mr. Speaker, it becomes my unpleasant responsibility as chairman of the House delegation from Arkansas to announce the untimely passing this morning of ex-Senator Hattie W. Caraway of Arkansas. You will remember her as the first woman to be elected to the United States Senate in her own right. She served in that body for about 15 years, succeeding her great and illustrious husband, Hon. T. H. Caraway. After the death of her husband she was on November 13, 1931, appointed to succeed him and to serve until the next general election. Then at the following general election in 1932 was elected to a full term. She was reelected in 1938, and she retired at the expiration of her term on January 3, 1945. Many of the people of Arkansas will remember Mrs. Caraway as a charming and pleasant young woman in her early days; they will remember her as a beautiful and charming, hospitable and pleasing wife and widow of the great Senator, T. H. Caraway. Their residence in Arkansas was at Jonesboro. All of Arkansas will remember her as one of the outstanding members of the United States Senate for a period of about 15 years. After she retired from the United States Senate she was appointed to the United States Employees Commission and then in 1946 she was appointed to the United States Employees Compensation Appeals Board. She always rendered very able and conscientious public service.

I wish to say on behalf of the people of Arkansas that we bow our heads today in grief and sorrow at the untimely passing and answering of the last roll call of that great, good, and gracious woman, Mrs. Hattie W. Caraway of Arkansas. We extend our deepest sympathy to her surviving children, Messrs. Forrest and Paul Caraway.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORRELL. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleague and the other members of the Arkansas delegation, and I am sure all Members of the Congress, in expressing my deep regret and sorrow at the passing of former Senator Caraway.

I knew Mrs. Caraway very well, as did the gentleman and the other members of our delegation. We had known her for a long, long time. We knew her husband before her, a very able Senator in the United States Senate representing our State.

I learned that Mrs. Caraway passed away only a little while ago. My heart was sad, regardless of the fact I had known about her condition during the past several weeks. We had known her as not only a very fine woman but one of the outstanding Senators who served the Government of the United States, her country, and the Senate of the United States. I know her two boys, both of whom graduated from West Point Military Academy and now are serving their country in the Armed Forces.

The people of our State are bereaved in the loss of this outstanding woman who has made such a remarkable record during her lifetime. She was a person of sweet disposition, lovable character, firm in her conviction, loyal to her friends, and a very able servant. Our State and Nation have lost a most loyal officer in the important post she has held for several years as a member of the Federal Employees Compensation Commission.

She has now gone to rest with the Great Maker and Master of all, our God, as she was a devoted Christian mother. May our Lord keep her in peace and have blessing on her soul.

I join with the gentleman and others in extending to the family, to which she was so devoted and loved so much, our heartfelt sympathy in their bereavement.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORRELL. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I join with the distinguished gentleman from Arkansas and the Members of the Arkansas delegation in the deserving and splendid tribute they have paid to the life and memory of Mrs. Caraway.

Mrs. Caraway was not only a sweet lady but an outstanding legislator, a fine and noble character with a philosophical mind, one who attracted and made friends because of the respect they had for her.

Her late husband was also one of the outstanding Members of the United States Senate, a most unusual situation in our history for a husband and wife both to have served in the Senate of the United States. That very fact of itself shows the respect and the confidence the people of Arkansas had in both of them as individuals and in both of them as a couple. That is the finest evidence of respect that any couple could receive, any husband and wife could receive, from the people of any State of the Union or of any congressional district of the Union, if they had served in this body.

I was honored by knowing her late husband and also in knowing Mrs. Caraway. When we speak about one we speak about both of them, Mrs. Caraway and her late husband, because if ever a husband and wife signified the very highest and finest of unity in marriage it was the late Senator Caraway and Mrs. Caraway.

I join with the Members of the Arkansas delegation in expressing a feeling of keen regret that I know is in the mind of each and every Member of this House in her death, and also in extending to her two sons my profound sympathy in their bereavement.

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] who has an intimate knowledge of the great public service rendered by Senator Caraway. The congressional service of Mrs. Caraway and her husband, Thaddeus Caraway, also a Senator from Arkansas, covered a span of 32 years and they left a lasting influence upon our State and national life. The citizens of our State experience a deep sorrow in the passing of Mrs. Caraway and they will always cherish the memory of this good and faithful servant of her people.

Mr. NORRELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the passing of Mrs. Caraway.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. NORRELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS].

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I would like to pay my tribute to Senator Hattie Caraway. I knew her for a great many years. I always admired her; admired her for her ability, her courage, her moral and physical courage, her courage to do what she thought was right, to vote as she thought she ought to vote. I saw her once when she was injured. It was a very painful and very trying injury. I remember her physical courage at that time. I remember her brilliant mind and I know of no one who had a quicker or more delightful wit than Hattie Caraway. I remember during World War I, the friendliness and the generosity of the Arkansas people when they gave wheat for the war. We shall miss Hattie Caraway, Mr. Speaker, and I join in mourning her loss.

Mr. NORRELL. I thank the gentlewoman from Massachusetts very kindly.

BERNARD F. ELMERS

Mr. BYRNE of New York. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 4803) for the relief of Bernard F. Elmers, and ask unanimous consent that the statement of the managers on the part of the House be read in lieu of the report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (H. REPT. NO. 3211)

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4803) for the relief of Bernard F. Elmers, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate and agree to the same with amendments as follows:

Page 1, line 3, strike out "That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the funds appropriated for the International Refugee Organization"; Senate amendment numbered 1, in lieu of the sum inserted by the Senate amendment insert "$12,500"; amendment numbered 2, restore the language "personal injuries and".

And the Senate agree to the same.

WILLIAM T. BYRNE,
WINFIELD K. DENTON,
KENNETH B. KEATING,
Managers on the Part of the House.

HARLEY M. KILGORE,
WARREN G. MAGNUSON,
ALEXANDER WILEY,
Managers on the Part of the Senate.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4803) for the relief of Bernard F. Elmers submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

This bill as passed the House appropriated the sum of $12,500 to Bernard F. Elmers for personal injuries and property damage sustained by him on July 8, 1947, when he was assaulted and robbed while employed as a civilian employee of the Army Exchange Service, serving with the Army in Germany. Mr. Elmers could not be regarded as having been an employee of the United States for the purpose of entitlement to the benefits of the United States Employees' Compensation Act of September 7, 1916 (39 Stat. 742; 5 U. S. C. 751), as amended. The officers' mess and the enlisted men's club, whose accounts he had been auditing during the evening he was injured, are not operated by or connected with the Army Exchange Service. His injuries received while he was returning home after auditing the accounts of those agencies cannot, therefore, be considered as having been sustained during the course of his employment with the Army Exchange Service. Consequently, he is not entitled to any benefits under the employees' compensation insurance provided from private sources for the protection of Army Exchange Service employees.

Inasmuch as the evidence in this case shows that Mr. Elmers was assaulted while returning to his quarters late at night after having worked on an audit of the accounts of the officers' mess and the enlisted men's club at the direction of his commanding officer, and as there is no method by which he may be compensated for damages sustained by him except through the enactment of special legislation by the Congress, such as that proposed in H. R. 4803, the Secretary of the Army states in his report dated February 2, 1950:

"Considering the nature and extent of the injuries sustained by Mr. Elmers, which have resulted in a large degree of permanent disability, the earnings lost by him on account of his injury, and the value of the personal property lost, the proposed award of $12,500 provided in H. R. 4803 appears to be fair and reasonable."

On the Senate floor on August 23, 1950, when this bill passed the Senate, Senator SCHOEPPEL asked the question, "May we have an explanation of the bill, please?"

Senator MCCARRAN, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, stated:

"Bernard F. Elmers was a civilian employee of the Army in Germany in 1947, when he was seriously injured by two Polish displaced persons who attacked him, inflicting serious injuries upon him, fracturing his skull and severing certain nerves which caused permanent paralysis and disfigurement of his face, and causing him to lose mental capacity and impair his hearing and vision. He is being paid the sum of $2,500, which is the value of certain bonds that were taken from him by the criminal investigation division of the Army and not returned to him. Apparently the bonds were lost while in the possession of the Army in connection with said investigation."

Senator SCHOEPPEL then stated:

"I should like to ask the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee a question. This measure is a House bill, and it will, of course, go to conference. There is some question about the compensation having been reduced from a larger amount to the amount stated in the bill. In the judgment of the chairman of the committee, is this amount adequate compensation for this man, considering the type of his injury?"

Senator MCCARRAN then stated:

"I am not ready to say that, but I thought it was the best we could get under the circumstances. I do not think it is adequate compensation."

It would appear that Members of the Senate realize that the sum of $2,500 is not adequate and that the amount would be worked out in conference. Therefore, after a full discussion, it was the opinion of the conferees that, in view of the fact that large sums of money have been appropriated to the International Refugee Organization, this appropriation should be made from that fund, and the following amendment was agreed upon:

Page 1, line 3, strike out "That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the funds appropriated for the International Refugee Organization"; Senate amendment No. 1, in lieu of the sum inserted by the Senate amendment insert "$12,500"; amendment No. 2, restore the language "personal injuries and".

WILLIAM T. BYRNE,
WINFIELD K. DENTON,
KENNETH B. KEATING,
Managers on the Part of the House.

Mr. BYRNE of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERSONAL ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CORBETT] and myself were delayed by the late arrival of the plane. Had we been able to get here in time we would have voted "aye" on the civil defense measure.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FURCOLO] is recognized for 60 minutes.

BLUEPRINT FOR SECURITY

Mr. FURCOLO. Mr. Speaker, may it please the House: Like all of you, I have been searching for some way out of the disastrous situation in which America finds itself. In analyzing that situation, it seems to me that out of all the tangled events of the recent past, two conclusions can be drawn: First, this Nation has had no definite long-range policy upon which a predetermined course of action could be taken; second, communism has had such a policy.

The time has long since come for this Nation to guide itself by planned action rather than by intuitive guesswork. We must accept the facts as they are, evaluate them to the best of our present ability, and then act. We can no longer wait for the "right" course—the certain, easy, and safe one. There will be no such choice in our generation.

Let me preface my remarks by acknowledging that I speak only as a layman who has no more information than is equally available to anyone who can read or hear. I do not want anyone to be misled into thinking that I speak from knowledge of any facts that are not already accessible to the public. I do not want anyone to be persuaded to my beliefs or suggestions in the thought that we in Congress are "in the know." The simple fact is that we are not—and I do not believe anyone else in the Government is, either.

CONGRESSMEN HAVE A DUTY

Being in Congress has only one bearing here: it gives me the duty of reporting the situation as I see it. The qualifications I have do not warrant this talk but the position I hold demands it.

Probably time will prove my analysis is inaccurate, my fears unfounded, and my recommendations ill-advised. Be that as it may, and in the full realization of my own lack of qualifications to either analyze or advise, I cannot conscientiously remain silent. I can merely express my thoughts and then those of greater knowledge and wisdom may accept or reject them.

CHANGING WORLD

We in America must awaken to the fact that the world has changed in the past 20 years. We are aware of that in a vague sort of way, but the full realization of its meaning has not yet struck us with any forcible impact. Consequently, we do not know what we are up against.

The world has the same geography in terms of land and water but the countries of the world have changed and are changing daily. I do not refer merely to boundary lines but rather to changes of values. In many cases the strong have become weak and the weak strong. Agricultural people have become industrial, backward nations progressive, peaceful civilizations warlike, and vice versa. Giant nations have toppled, slumbering peoples are stirring, revolutions, both peaceful and bloody, have been changing the course of history. New philosophies, new sets of values, new ways of living have appeared. The once slow march of science has become a flight too rapid for our vision or intellect. We are dimly aware of it but its true significance has escaped us.

THE OLD ORDER CHANGETH

We are not living in the same world or at the same time as many other nations, in one sense. Measured by time as we know it, America and many nations of comparable culture have progressed 50 years in the last decade—but still other nations have progressed a thousand years in the same period. Where our own experience has perhaps been an orderly transition from horse to auto to airplane to atomic energy, others have gone almost directly from horse to atomic energy. The whole world is catching up with us. The old order changeth so that today very few, if any, nations tremble at the voice of America. There are many giants today.

THE TRUTH MAY HURT

We in America justly take pride in the military prowess of our youth, but we must recognize that other peoples have warriors, too. They are not going to run because we announce that we are sending fighting men. They will not drop dead of fright simply because American troops land. Perhaps once upon a time a hundred Americans were the match for a thousand from any other nation—but that is no longer true.

It may hurt our pride and vanity to acknowledge that, but failure to, may destroy our Nation. The cold, unalterable fact is that bad men who believe in bad principles can kill good men who believe in good principles. Bullets and bombs cannot tell the difference.

NO SUPERMEN

We all know that, of course, but our failure to act upon its truth has been tragic. Where China is concerned, for example, most Americans had conjured up a mental picture of a few GI's with machine guns ordering several thousand Chinese to lay down their sticks and stones and go back to the rice paddies. Ten years ago it was having some American battleship take an afternoon off to sink the Jap Navy. Think back to Pearl Harbor and you will recall that no one could comprehend that tiny Japan dared stand up to mighty America.

Was it only the people in Government who did not understand that? No, it was the people of America.

We thought we could win by calling the Japs "monkey men" who lived on a pound of rice a month and were crazy enough to believe their Emperor was divine. Then we learned that monkey men fired bullets that killed as effectively as those fired by fine young Americans. We found out that the pound of rice a month we had sneered at kept the Jap as healthy as a month's GI rations. And crazy Japs who died for an Emperor they believed to be divine also took young Americans to death with them.

We had been blissfully unaware of the fact that the world had been changing. We had thought Japan was Gilbert and Sullivan—but when the curtain went up, there was Tojo.

THE ATOM BOMB

Today we are beginning to recognize that many nations have military strength equal to or greater than ours—"but we have the atom bomb." We will not open our eyes to the facts of life and realize that neither the atom bomb nor anything else is a quick, easy, and safe way out of the situation in which we and the world find ourselves.

The days of monkey men and Maginot lines are gone forever. The world is moving and will continue to move too rapidly. There is no "atom bomb line" any more than there was ever really a "Maginot line." Neither will there be a "chemical line" or a "bacteriological warfare line" or anything else. We are trapped, hoist by the petard of our own civilization.

NOT THE ANSWER

We must banish all self-delusions or we shall perish in the darkness of ignorance. We cannot find the path through the forest unless we first see the trees.

The facts are that we cannot destroy Russia or China or communism by the atom bomb without destroying the world. We may bomb the cities of Russia, but what will we then do about the rest of Europe when Russian soldiers move into France, Germany, Poland, Italy, and other nations? Can the Russian soldiers in Europe be destroyed by the atom bomb without destroying all the people of Europe? Are we also to assume that Russia has no retaliatory weapons of her own?

The atom bomb alone is not the answer. Other nations may have it or something equally effective. Or, if they do not, we cannot use it without destroying our friends as well as our enemies.

Let me point out that I do not intend at this time to discuss the moral issues involved in either using the atom bomb or engaging in preventive war. I am merely trying to analyze the facts without getting into moral questions that might well affect any decision to be made by this country.

WHERE WE STAND

Aside from the atom bomb, where do we stand militarily? Taking the most optimistic view, those we consider our enemies have more men under arms than we do, have equally good weapons and equipment, and have certain geographic advantages.

On long-range policy, where do we stand? Our enemies seem to know where they are going, what they will try to do, and when they will seek to accomplish it. They know the what, where, when, how, and why of their endeavors. Do we?

The easy answer is to say that all we want is peace, but how do we achieve it? What do we do? When? Where? How? O, there are so many questions but so few answers.

THE TERRIBLE TRUTH

There can be no peacetime economy for America in a world of nations living under wartime economies. There will be no peace in our lifetime—none, that is, as we have always thought of peace. There may be for future generations, but only if we have the fortitude to measure up to the task before us in this generation.

Of course, we in this generation must always keep our eyes raised to the hope of true and lasting peace in our lifetime, but we must also keep our eyes on the road to that sort of peace. The road is going to be long and difficult, and it will not be traveled in 5, 10, or perhaps even 20 years. The way will be precarious, fraught with danger and hardship, and calling for personal sacrifices on the part of everyone in the Nation.

It will involve gearing our Nation to a wartime economy for many years—a wartime economy even if our men are not actively engaged in combat any place in the world. That is a very difficult thing for peace-loving Americans to undertake, but there is no escape from it because we cannot escape the world in which we live.

How will realization of that terrible truth be of help to America? First of all, it should enable the powers that be to decide on a long-range policy to achieve peace. Instead of drifting, hoping against hope that a favorable wind will come, we will steer a definite course toward a definite objective. We have not been able to do that because we have never really known the various stations on the way to our ultimate destination.

PRECIPICE TO PRECIPICE

We have had an essentially negative policy of waiting for an emergency, then rushing to patch up the situation, then sitting back and hoping that no future emergencies would arise. We have breathlessly rushed from crisis to crisis like a mountain goat hopping from precipice to precipice, always hoping that we might somehow escape falling into the abyss.

When war clouds gathered, we have drafted a few men, threatened industry and labor, disrupted homes, thrown business and the stock market into a tail spin, and scared the daylights out of the Nation. Two weeks later we resumed normal living. Another crisis, more jitters, then normalcy again. There has been no certainty, no permanence, no settling down to anything—neither to war nor to peace. We hover between the two, being afraid to accept either.

REMEDIES?

There is a panacea for each of us, depending upon who we are. The Republicans can blame the Democrats who are in power, the Democrats can accuse the Republicans of sabotaging efforts of the administration, the people can blame both parties. Praise Johnson for economy, then condemn him for stupidity. Impeach the President, throw Acheson out, fire MacArthur. A head can roll for every new disaster—but will it stop Stalin or Mao?

We have weakened ourselves and our chances for ultimate peace because we still insist on thinking of every new development as being a new crisis. The truth is that we are in for one crisis after the other and we had better adjust to "situation crisis" as being "situation normal." We must settle down before we can help the world to settle down.

THE PEOPLE'S FIGHT

That calls for positive diplomacy on the part of our leaders—hard, definite, calculated diplomacy that the world will understand. But the tragic truth is that no such action is even possible until the people of this Nation are first conditioned for and ready to accept such leadership with all the sacrifices it will entail.

There is absolutely no way of accomplishing the task without the complete and wholehearted support of all the people of the Nation. It is really the fight of the people, not simply that of the President or the State Department or the members of the Armed Forces.

All the people must appreciate what this country is up against. They must try to understand the difficulties that confront our Nation when dealing with some of the other nations of the world. We have a horror of war because of the havoc, suffering, and death it brings—but there are many peoples today who look on war as being normal. It is the only way of life many of the Chinese Communists have ever known. They do not think of death and destruction in the same terms that America does because both those tragedies have little meaning for people who have spent their lives in the midst of death and destruction.

ONCE UPON A TIME

We have been adjusted to dealing with European nations. Our relationships, our diplomacy, and our wars have been with peoples of Europe who have our own general background and civilization. We understood them and they understood us because, basically and fundamentally, we were of the same human cloth. Our philosophies, our minds, our ways of life were very much alike. We spoke their language in mind if not in tongue. Is that true of the peoples with whom we must deal from now on? Do we know what appeals to or impresses the Oriental mind? Or the Communist mind? The Hindus? The Moslems? Once whatever made sense to us also made sense to the other powerful nations of the world because we all lived by substantially the same standards, beliefs, morals, religions, and philosophies. Our way of dealing with the world was based on that criterion. It is difficult if not impossible for us to realize that that is no longer true in the world today.

The world of 20 years ago is no longer with us. Instead we have a completely new world and perhaps—not inevitably but merely perhaps—there must be new ways of dealing with this new world.

THE TASK BEFORE US

We must set out to accomplish many seemingly inconsistent ends. We must prepare for both war and peace, make sacrifices without undermining our own standard of living, adjust our way of life to the realities of the world, and yet still keep our democratic institutions. How can we do it? How can we save both America and the American way of life?

A 25-YEAR PLAN

First of all, we must become strong militarily. We must adopt a plan that will enable us to keep adequate military strength for 25 years without bankrupting the Nation. Let us at least plan for 25 years—we can always abandon the plan if events prove we have been overly pessimisitic.

At least three objections are immediately presented: First, the manpower shortage; second, the expense; third, the disruption of individual and family life. Those same objections are not so forceful if we are planning for only a year or two but a long range policy covering 25 years is another story.

MANPOWER—MONEY—MORES

Is there any plan that may resolve the three difficulties outlined above? The only suggestions being considered are either universal military training or a draft similar to that used in World Wars I and II or a combination of the two. I do not believe either plan, or a combination of the two, is the answer. Either or both may be all right for a short period of time, but I do not think either is suitable for any long-range program, assuming that we do not want to bankrupt the Nation or seriously undermine the American way of life.

INTERNAL COLLAPSE

It is impossible for us to consider any draft or military training program without also taking into account the Nation's financial status. We must figure the tremendous drain of finances and the possibility of a complete collapse of our financial structure. We must remember that this country can be destroyed from within as well as from without. Internal collapse can give victory to our enemies just as quickly as defeat on the battlefield. We cannot simply order millions of men into uniform without first knowing what the financial effect upon the country will be. Obviously, we must have armed forces that can adequately protect the security of this Nation. But we must never lose sight of the fact that the security of the Nation can also be endangered by financial bankruptcy.

NATURAL PREJUDICE

It is probably not the primary responsibility of the military to be concerned about finances. Neither is it the primary responsibility of our financial experts to be concerned about the size of the military. The military man naturally feels that the best way to guarantee the security of the Nation is by giving the Armed Forces whatever is needed. The financier naturally thinks the best way to guarantee the security of the Nation is by avoiding bankruptcy. Each authority is a product of his own background and experience, and each has a natural bias or prejudice in favor of his particular viewpoint. We all represent our own beliefs, and our opinions are colored by our convictions gained in a lifetime. Each, in his own way, is right; but, in another sense, each is wrong in that he only sees a part of the entire picture.

The same is true when we begin to consider the effect of a manpower shortage on domestic industry. The industrialist believes that emphasis must be placed on keeping our productive output at highest efficiency. And there is a great deal to be said for his viewpoint that the way to win wars or to guarantee America's security is by keeping defense production moving at top speed.

All three—the financier, the military man, and the industrialist—recognize the need for strength in all three departments. But each believes most consideration should be given to his particular field.

FAMILY PROBLEM

To further complicate the picture, there is the individual or family problem. It seems that most families are for a strong America and fully appreciate the need for sound economy, full military strength, and maximum productive output. The only condition they place upon such endeavors is that the ends be accomplished without disrupting the family life of America—or, as they put it to most Congressmen: "Cannot they win the war without my husband?" They recognize that nothing will more seriously undermine the American way of life than disruption of our families. They know the consequences of that just as we do.

Now, if my talk were based on an assumption of a short war, the family problem would of course still be serious but would not be insurmountable. However, it is a different matter where any long-range policy is concerned. It of course is also directly connected with the military, financial, and productive problems.

Even with generous family allowances, the wives, children, and parents of servicemen suffer. Family allowances will increase with its resultant effect upon our financial condition. Industrial output is decreased as skilled workers are taken from industry. The same is true of agriculture and all other fields of endeavor, of course. Yet, in spite of everything, we must somehow afford to give this Nation adequate military protection. We dare not do otherwise. What is the best way of doing that?

Before we can answer, we must admit that any conclusion we reach is going to be merely a guess or a calculated risk. We cannot conclude anything until we have assumed a set of facts that we are willing to use for a springboard to our ultimate decision. Again, we must analyze the situation coldly and ascertain the known facts to the best of our ability. To the known facts must be added certain estimated or probable facts that will provide us with a basic assumption. Before we can adopt any long-range policy, we must start from a basis of some sort. We know we must become militarily strong. What is the best way to achieve that end?

THE EASIEST WAY

One easy answer is to decide that we must immediately put as many men under arms as our enemies have and at all times maintain a standing army as large as theirs. Unfortunately, we cannot match them man-for-man because their numbers are greater. But suppose we could? Suppose we immediately put ten or fifteen million men under arms. Would that be a solution?

It would answer the military phase, perhaps. But what about our financial structure? What about our production? What about the domestic upheaval? The cost of keeping 15,000,000 men under arms even for a short period is staggering. The cost for a 25-year period would be disastrous to our entire economy and to our American way of life.

If Russia wanted to see us destroyed, the easiest way for her to accomplish that end would be to lead us into the maintenance of a huge standing army for a long period of time. Our productive output would be seriously damaged, our financial structure would collapse, and our American way of life would be dangerously undermined or destroyed. The battle might be won without a single shot having been fired.

OUR STANDARDS ARE DIFFERENT

Why is it that other nations can support large standing armies? Because their standards are different than ours.

We have the best-paid, best-clothed, and best-fed servicemen in the world. There are times when that is not true, of course, but over any long period it is a fact. We do not have slave labor in industry or agriculture, we do not exploit any conquered nations, we do not have a low standard of living, and we do not have the same type of economy or culture that characterizes many other nations. That is why our military structure must always have a standing force numerically less than that of our enemies. I emphasize standing force, and, by that term, mean men actually in the service 24 hours a day. And, of course, I am not referring now to a shooting war.

UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING?

If putting all men under arms is not the answer, how about the alternative offered of a fairly large standing force coupled with universal military training whereby a substantial force of young men will also be trained and theoretically ready for active duty?

That may be adequate but I do not believe that is the answer, either. The expense, while less than the other, is still great. But, in addition to that, the system may still not always make available for active duty a large enough group in a short enough time, assuming complete mobilization as quickly as possible becomes necessary. It still leaves many millions of potential fighting men out of the defense picture. In the world today, we cannot leave anyone out of our defense set-up. Failure to adequately prepare every possible fighting man may be fatal to the security of this Nation.

There may not be any solution but I believe all of us have a duty to make suggestions in the hope that something constructive may possibly be offered. That is the reason for my talk.

THREEFOLD PROGRAM

The military preparedness program that I suggest, as one part of a long-range program, is threefold. First of all, I believe we should immediately establish an armed force that will have sufficient personnel to meet the needs of the present situation. Those men would be drafted under the Selective Service System. By sufficient I mean 1,000,000 more men than must be sent out of the country immediately.

Let me illustrate very roughly by assuming that we must immediately provide 2,000,000 men for service abroad, whether that service be as part of United Nations troops or as American troops. I use the figure 2,000,000 arbitrarily merely for purposes of illustration. The correct figure might be more or less than that. Under my plan, an additional 1,000,000 men would also be called to active duty to be held in readiness in camps here in this country. In brief, the first part of the program I suggest is merely a draft under the already established selective-service system.

My reason for the figure of 1,000,000 men held in camps is this: It is impossible to ship more than a million men out of America to probable battlefields in less than 6 months, even under the best conditions we could hope for, and using every means of transportation we have.

Our military leaders know that and every nation in the world knows it, too. The conclusion is reached simply by counting ships, determining the number of men each can carry, and figuring the length of time the voyage would take.

HOW LONG A TRAINING PERIOD?

Why is the figure "6 months" so important? Because the program I suggest is based on the belief that troops can be ready for combat duty after 6 months of training.

I am not an authority on military training; in fact, I know practically nothing about it. But I believe any civilian who ever served in the last war will corroborate my statement. Actually I believe only 3 months of training is necessary but I have doubled the figure to be on the safe side.

I believe most authorities in the military itself say that 10 months of training is necessary for combat duty. Experience in the last war does not substantiate their opinion, in my belief. However, as I shall attempt to point out, I believe even the military viewpoint can be reconciled with my estimate of 6 months.

This is why: The military's own estimate is based on training a completely raw recruit who has had no instruction of any kind and who knows absolutely nothing about military life. That, however, is not true under the second and third steps of my program which insure that the recruits our Armed Forces get will have had a high degree of preservice training. With such personnel, I believe even the military will agree that 6 months in the service is more than adequate preparation for combat duty.

STUDENTS

The second step of the program I suggest would be what I call a Student Military Training program of 3 months a year for every high-school or college student between the ages of 17 and 35. Those 3 months would be from June 15 to September 15, 8 hours a day. The only exemptions for this type of training would be for reasons determined by our present selective-service boards or similar judges—probably for physical cause or for unusual hardship. Whether any payment for such service could or could not be given to trainees would be decided after a careful study of the country's financial state. Even if not paid, I believe most students would prefer this type of training to the universal military-training system with pay.

The period from June 15 to September 15 is based on two reasons: First, it will not interfere with their education; second, 3 months at 8 hours a day is a fairly substantial period of training for youths of that age who will still receive at least an additional 6 months of further training after they have been called to active duty, assuming that eventuality arises. And, as I have pointed out, since it is virtually impossible for them to even be landed abroad before they have been on active duty for 6 months, they will have had approximately at least 9 months of military training before getting combat duty.

I assume that such a student military-training program would give the military a reserve of about one-half million partially trained young men between the ages of 17 and 22—a reserve that is available for active duty at any time, a reserve that cannot even be shipped abroad until the million men already under arms in military camps in this country have first been shipped overseas.

CIVILIAN SELECTEES

The third step in the program I suggest I have called a Civilian-Selectee System. It will operate somewhat like the present selective-service system, under which we draft men right into the Armed Forces, but it is not an actual draft for active military duty.

What I call the Civilian-Selectee System would operate in this way: a civilian-selectee board, very comparable to the Selective Service Draft Board, would be established as a counterpart to the draft board. Except for students who were receiving training under the student military training program outlined above, every male civilian between the ages of 17 and 35 would be available for training under the Civilian-Selectee System. The only other exceptions would be exemptions granted under provisions similar to those prevailing under our present draft laws.

TRAINING CENTERS

Training centers would be established for every community in the Nation. Heavily populated areas might have several training centers; rural areas might have a central place for many surrounding communities. As far as possible, existing facilities would be used but unquestionably many additional ones would also have to be provided.

A schedule of training hours, probably not to exceed 10 hours a week, would be established. Regular military men would be instructors. Insofar as possible, training materials would be the same as those used by recruits on active duty in the Armed Forces. The training period would be 1 year—about 520 hours of training on the basis of 10 hours a week.

Rules for attendance, standards for marks, and other such details would be established. The enforcement provisions would be extremely strict: eligible for immediate call in the actual draft for absenteeism or continued failure to maintain satisfactory grades. There would be provisions to protect civilian selectees from unfair treatment, discriminatory instructors, and other possible injustices.

Insofar as possible, the hours of training would be set so as to interfere as little as possible with the civilian selectee's daily work and home life. I would assume that most civilian selectees would put in 4 hours on Saturday and 3 hours a night on two weekday nights for a total of 10 hours a week. Men working the 3 to 11 shift in industry—assuming industry goes on 2 or 3 shifts a day—would probably have their training mornings—4 hours on Saturday morning and 3 hours a morning on 2 weekdays for a total of 10 hours.

I am giving a very rough sketch of what I have in mind to illustrate possible training schedules. To detail it at length would require considerable time and, in addition, would not serve much purpose because the actual hours would depend largely on the type of instruction to be given. It might well be that one 8-hour day a week with study periods at home would be preferable.

I believe 520 hours a year of such training would be the equivalent of 2 months of training as a recruit on active duty in the Armed Forces, with the exception of physical conditioning. I also believe that a person who had had such training would only need an additional 4 months of active duty to be prepared for combat assignment, if it became necessary to call him into the Armed Forces.

There probably would be at least 15,000,000 men eligible for civilian selectee service. That would give the military an additional reserve of 15,000,000 at least partially trained men to call on if needed by this Nation.

OVER-ALL MILITARY PICTURE

What would our over-all military picture be then? Assuming 2,000,000 men are already abroad, another million in this country on active duty in military camps and fully trained for combat duty, there would be another half million about half trained under the Student Military Training program, and another 15,000,000 at least partially trained under the Civilian-Selectee System. And, returning to my original point that it will take at least 6 months to transport those in camps to overseas duty, it also means that there is still more than ample time to fully train every single one in that vast reserve of manpower.

If they are needed, the military will still have an additional 6 months to give them full military training as active duty draftees because they cannot be shipped abroad for at least 6 months. They cannot because every available means of transportation will be being used to ship the million men already in camps on active duty.

Assuming my facts are true, it means that the military has at all times a constant supply of adequately trained men ready for combat just as fast as the military has means of transportation to get them overseas.

NET RESULT

The net result is this: The military has enough men, domestic production has enough men, families are not disrupted, and there is no great drain on the Nation's finances.

Certainly such a program protects home life because it leaves more men at home with their families. Certainly industry and agriculture are better off for the same reason: more men remain on their jobs. Certainly such a program means a tremendous financial saving because fewer men are receiving military pay, food, clothing, and so forth; and fewer family allotments are being paid out by the Government.

As under the student military training program, it could be decided whether or not the country is able to pay civilian selectees anything. Even if not paid, I believe most men would prefer civilian-selectee training without pay to the alternative of active military duty with pay.

Incidentally, the financial saving part is double-barreled; not only is the Government saving money on salaries and allowances but it is actually taking in more money in the form of income taxes from men who earn more because they remain on their civilian jobs than those men would pay from their earnings in the military services.

The threefold program I have outlined is the best method I can think of to militarily guarantee national security without hurting our productive output, bankrupting the Nation, or seriously undermining our American way of life. Of course it is based on the two major assumptions: First, we are not in world war III; second, we need a 25-year long-range policy.

WILL IT WORK

Will such a program work? I do not imagine you will find a military leader in the country who will say that it will. I will be surprised if even one agrees with me in the conclusions I have drawn. But there are certain facts on which I think many will agree.

The first one, and to me the basic one, is that they cannot ship over 1,000,000 men abroad in 6 months if they use every means of transportation we now have or expect to have for another 2 years.

The second one on which I think they will agree is that a man who has had absolutely no military training of any kind can be made ready for combat duty within 10 months from the time he first enters the service. If they do not agree to that, I believe the testimony of those who know best of all should be heard: the civilians who served in the last war. They may disagree with my estimate completely—I have no way of knowing their opinion, of course—but I believe they know more about it than anyone.

ASK ANY VETERAN

The third point on which I think many military leaders may agree is that there are at least a great many details of military training that can be given to men outside of regular military camps. Let me illustrate what I mean.

A good part of the training of any recruit in the Armed Forces involves such matters as drilling, understanding commands, practice in military courtesy, learning the mechanisms of weapons, firing practice, and such matters.

Men learn to drill when they are placed in a body and are given instructions by officers. It does not matter whether the ground on which they stand is a drill field in an Army camp or a football field or lot outside of camp. It does not matter if it is an Army base gymnasium or a YMCA, school gym, auditorium, town hall or basement outside of camp. All that is needed is enough room and an instructor giving the right commands. The same thing applies to learning the commands.

A recruit must also learn to know military organization, rates and ranks, who to salute and when, and things of that nature. That is mostly classroom training that can be done practically as well outside of a camp as in it.

What about first-aid training? Can an instructor teach that as well outside a camp as in it if he has textbooks and bandages?

Learning the mechanisms of weapons is a little different. As far as small arms are concerned—revolvers, rifles, and small weapons—there's no great problem. You need the weapon, an instructor, and maybe some printed diagrams. The student learns the parts of the revolver or rifle and he practices taking it apart, putting it together, and the cleaning and proper care of it. You do not need a camp for that. The same would apply to most machine guns, I believe.

Heavier artillery poses a different problem only because of its size, and it undoubtedly would be impractical to learn too much about it outside of a camp except for book knowledge—which, incidentally, is of great importance in learning the theory and parts of heavier weapons.

Other things a recruit may learn might include study to properly identify planes, ships, tanks, and so on to be able to distinguish friendly ones from those of the enemy. That is almost completely taught by books, movie slides, toy models, and so forth. Identification can be learned just as well in any adequate room as it can in a camp classroom.

Semaphore, Morse codes, ship's lights, signal identification and things of that nature—all classroom instruction with books or slides, and so forth.

Learning the layout of a ship, nautical terms, how to tie knots, points of the compass, and so on—about a hundred percent classroom training.

Revolver firing practice is exactly the same outside of a camp as in it, provided a safe location is chosen. Any community has at least dozens of safe places and most communities already have established facilities in rod and gun clubs, police stations, and so forth. The same probably cannot be said for rifle firing but certainly there would be no great problem about revolver firing. Target practice is still target practice whether it is on a firing range, in a camp, or a safe place outside of camp.

Anyone who has ever been in the service knows from his own experience that at least 75 percent of the instruction given him in his first 3 months in active duty could be given him just about as well outside of a camp if trained instructors and proper textbooks, literature, and equipment are provided.

He would not get the rigorous physical training, of course—nothing but active duty will give him that, in my opinion—but I do not think that is overly important when we remember that he will have at least 6 months in camp once he is called to active duty. In less than 2 months of active duty the average man of 17 to 35 will probably be in as good shape as he is ever going to be.

He also will not get the discipline or the regimentation that he would on active duty—but once he is called for active duty the military will take care of that in a good deal less than 6 months.

DOES YOUR OWN COMMUNITY HAVE FACILITIES?

There is no difficulty about obtaining instructors and educational material: the military already has both available. But there is a question about facilities in which to teach.

I think a survey will disclose that most communities already have existing facilities that are adequate. Schools, armories, gymnasiums, public halls, grange halls, civic and social clubrooms, arenas, YMCA's, Legion homes, police departments, athletic fields, town halls, community halls, church basements, rod and gun club grounds, parks, and other similar facilities exist in practically every community. Most industrial communities also have large gathering places in factories and other similar buildings. There are military bases in many areas of the country that also could be of great help.

So, to begin with, I think that many, many communities would be able to provide training space in local Federal, State, town, and public buildings, together with existing private facilities, at no expense to the Government.

Of course it would also be necessary to erect suitable structures in many, if not all, sections of the country. That would run to considerable expense but it would only be a fraction of the cost of continuing under the existing system.

IT SAVES A HUNDRED BILLION DOLLARS IN 5 YEARS

Suppose a thousand facilities had to be established all over the country in places where there were no facilities of any kind. I assume it would not cost over $200,000 at most per facility. The total cost would be about $200,000,000. Even that relatively small cost is further minimized in that the buildings erected would have considerable value to the Government. The buildings continue to have value even after long usage and are not in the same category as food, uniforms, wages, family allowances, and so forth, which, once used, are gone forever as far as any return value to the Government is concerned.

Contrast that with the existing system of holding draftees in readiness in military camps, where the cost of 4,000,000 men a month runs to over $1,000,000,000—or over $12,000,000,000 a year, not counting other costs of barracks, utilities, and training expenses that would run to almost another $10,000,000,000 or $12,000,000,000 a year.

Five years of that under the existing system would cost over $100,000,000,000 for 4,000,000 men in military camps in this Nation. Five years of the Civilian-Selectee System can be had for considerably less than $1,000,000,000 total, even if the erection of training facilities has cost $200,000,000.

I do not think providing facilities, if none be available, is any great obstacle in those circumstances.

COOPERATE OR BE DRAFTED

The next question is this: Will the civilian selectees seriously and conscientiously study, train, and cooperate? I think they will for several reasons.

First and foremost, of course, I believe they will as a patriotic duty.

Secondly, they will be impelled by recognizing the need for it if this country is to be saved.

Thirdly, the urge for civilian self-preservation and the desire to avoid active duty will be a strong factor. The system provides that failure to comply with regulations means induction into the Armed Forces.

As I pointed out before, there will be suitable safeguards to protect the individual from any abuse of this power by military instructors. Some of the safeguards are provisions that no civilian selectees can be inducted into the Armed Forces without first having the right to a probationary period to change his ways, an appeal from the final decision, and a full review by the Civilian Selectee Board, composed exclusively of civilians.

Fourthly, domestic influences would give the civilian selectee every incentive to cooperate. He would know that suitable work would make it possible not only for him to keep on his civilian job but would also let him remain with his family. And, of course, in that situation the average wife would be a pretty safe guaranty of good training conduct by the husband.

If cooperation by any trainee is to be left to the tender mercies of either a tough sergeant or a loving wife, I am inclined to think that under the circumstances the wife will inspire even more dread than the sergeant. You can imagine the fate of any man guilty of either absenteeism or poor marks when the home and children of his wife are at stake. The wife's rolling pin in any man's marriage carries more authority than the sergeant's guardhouse in any man's army.

Boiling it down, what it comes to is this: If the civilian selectee does good work, the military should be satisfied. If he does not do good work, the military gets him and can make him cooperate, which should satisfy the military. The result should be satisfactory to the military in either event.

The program I have suggested is not going to be completely acceptable to anyone, of course. It does not give the military everything it wants but, on the other hand, neither does it give the individual or the family or agriculture or industry or the financier everything they want.

I am proceeding from the basic assumption that it is impossible to achieve 100 percent results for all the endeavors we seek to accomplish. That is necessarily so because our goals are completely opposite. We must resolve our dilemma by seeking to give reasonably adequate and satisfactory treatment to each of the many factors that must be considered. It would be very easy to arrive at an absolutely perfect solution to any one of the demands if we completely ignored the others. Unfortunately we cannot do that.

THE WHOLE PICTURE

I readily understand the insistence of the military for all the manpower they need to carry out their program. I have the same feeling for those responsible for our productive output and for those who are primarily concerned about our financial condition. Unfortunately, neither one is required to consider the difficulties of the others. Probably it is not the business of either to do that. It may be that they merely see one part of the picture and their conclusions are not based on any over-all factors.

I believe we in Congress have the responsibility of looking at the entire picture.

I do not believe any solution is proper unless it takes into account at least all the factors I have discussed. There probably are more and undoubtedly there will be different and better solutions reached by those with better information and judgment. I hope this will at least offer some ideas.

PATRIOTISM FOR ALL

While on the subject of service to this Nation, let me parenthetically mention a matter that has always disturbed me. When we think about people making sacrifices to defend this country, our minds invariably seem to turn only to those who are between the ages of 17 and 35. Our attitude there is that if this country needs those men for the Armed Forces, they are drafted at certain pay rates and that is all there is to it. They and their families get along as best they can. It may mean less food, clothing, and shelter for the draftee's dependents but that is one of the unfortunate things about war.

But the same reasoning does not seem to hold good for others. If the Government needs a high-powered executive, for example, we have to offer some "inducement" in terms of a large salary—large only in the sense that it is more than a military draftee gets. There are actually cases of vacancies in positions that are essential to national defense and attempts are being made to fill those vacancies by financial inducements to get the proper personnel. Why?

Perhaps Americans over the age of 35 should not be drafted into military service because of their age, but what about other defense duties they are physically and mentally qualified to perform? If this country needs anyone for any sort of duty that is essential to defense, why must any more "inducement" be offered to that person than to anyone called for duty in the Armed Forces? How do we rationalize calling young men without regard to whether they want to serve or not but still feel the necessity of offering inducements to those above draft age?

NOT SOLELY THE PRIVILEGE OF YOUTH

There are hundreds of illustrations of what I mean, but let me cite just one. We have ruled that civilian defense is essential to our national security. There must be a civilian director. Do we simply select the proper man and say "you are it"? Oh, no. We have to offer a salary that is "attractive" as an inducement.

I have no objection to that except insofar as it discriminates against the men in the Armed Forces and their families. If they do not need any inducement when services and sacrifices are required of them, neither does anyone else. We should simply choose anyone who is wanted and draft him into the job.

Does that mean a $50,000-a-year man may suddenly find himself pulled out of the presidency of some corporation and put into a $5,000-a-year job whether he wants it or not? The same thing has happened on a smaller scale to almost every man in the Armed Forces.

Patriotism and sacrifices for this Nation are not solely the privilege of those of draft age. We cannot spare anyone needed, whether it be individuals under or over the age of 35. The same applies to property and profits. If the liberty and life of the lowliest GI can be taken, anything can be taken: this is everyone's fight.

COOPERATION BETWEEN CIVILIAN AND MILITARY ESSENTIAL

Now let me resume my main discussion about the need for more cooperation and joint efforts by the civilian and military forces by briefly discussing another measure I advanced back in 1942. There are many examples similar to the one I shall take up now for purposes of illustration, but I think this will explain the point I wish to make.

Both the military and civilian populations need medical attention. There simply will not be enough doctors to take care of the needs of both if we follow the same procedure we did in World War II. In that war we largely disregarded the needs of the civilian population in order to give the military all the medical men requested. Perhaps the military did not get all the doctors they needed or wanted, I do not know, but as between the civilian population and the Armed Forces there can be no doubt that the wishes of the Armed Forces were given greater consideration.

I believe it is going to be necessary to adopt a program that will completely satisfy neither the military nor the civilian population. I think the two are going to have to share the services of many doctors.

The military must, of course, be given the full time of enough doctors to take care of the service men and women who are in our Armed Forces. But there are many, many cases where doctors can continue with their private practice and still devote some of their time to taking care of the military. That is not true of physicians called to overseas duty, of course, but it will apply to many others.

WHY NOT?

During the last war I recommended that the number of doctors on duty in military camps be reduced provided civilian doctors in adjacent communities would spend a certain part of their day either on call on or duty at the camp.

For example, there was—and is—an air base in my district in western Massachusetts with probably 500 civilian doctors practicing within a radius of 10 miles—less than 20 minutes away by automobile. If that air base needed 10 doctors, for example, to take care of the military personnel 24 hours a day, why would all 10 have to be full time military doctors? Why could not the camp get along adequately with three full time military doctors in charge supplemented by the services of many civilian doctors working on a schedule that called for duty for them at certain hours of the day at the camp?

If 10 doctors are needed 24 hours a day, the system would provide for 10 doctors at all times—but only 3 of the 10 would be full time military doctors. The other seven would be civilian physicians rotating out of a medical pool of doctors in the area.

That system would give the military personnel adequate care and it would also enable the civilian physician to continue caring for the civilian population. Less than 4 hours a week would have been taken away from the civilian practice of each of several hundred civilian doctors—yet the total number of such hours would give the military the equivalent of full-time service by many military doctors.

What is wrong with that suggestion? Are not the bodies and illnesses of servicemen the same as those of civilians? Are not most military service exempt physicians as capable as those called for active duty?

Civilian doctors were willing to cooperate in such a system for many reasons, probably the first being patriotism. Another was the realization that such cooperation insured many doctors being available for civilian needs. A third was perhaps the hope that active duty for the physician himself might be avoided if military needs were taken care of under the system I had suggested.

We all remember the shortage of doctors for civilians in the last war. The need in the future may be even greater—probably will be because if there be a next war it will be fought largely against civilian populations.

Can the military get along with fewer doctors? Of course many doctors in the Armed Forces in World War II worked as hard or even harder than civilian doctors. But anyone who was in the service knows that there was often what seemed to be overmanning of physicians by the military. I am not referring now to cases where ships and combat units carried doctors who did very little but had to be on hand at all times in case of battle casualties. I am referring rather to doctors in camps in America.

There were often many days when many doctors did very little except put in their time. It was necessary to have the doctor on hand even if there were no business: there might be. And I want to emphasize that this is not intended as any criticism of the military medical fraternity—they had nothing to say about it. As a result, we had the anomalous situation of a scarcity of doctors at home even though many doctors in the Armed Forces were caring for patients only a few hours a day.

THE LUXURY OF WASTE

We can no longer afford any such waste of our medical manpower. The whole answer is not my suggestion but I believe it will at least ease the shortage a little bit. If we can give adequate medical service to military personnel in camps in America by a combined use of military and civilian doctors, why not do it? It will keep many doctors at home to care for their patients and will tend to keep our national health level up where it must be if America is to remain strong.

The same is perhaps true of dentists and probably there are many other similar cases in other fields. We have never felt the full brunt of the situation because we have never had it for any great length of time. If, however, we are to adopt a long-range policy runing over a great many years we will feel the impact of a shortage of physicians more than we now realize. We must prepare for it.

There are many other preparations that should be made in the light of present and probable future conditions. I pointed out earlier that we do not fully appreciate the changes that have taken place in the past 20 years that have so radically altered the world in which we live. We have not taken any positive steps to adapt ourselves to the new world. We must do so.

EDUCATION

Let me illustrate what I mean by referring to our educational system, for example. It naturally has been set up for a peacetime economy. The subjects of study have been chosen with that in mind. Emphasis on certain courses in philosophy, language, history, and so on has been the result of the world as we have known it. The changes in that world in the past 20 years have been largely disregarded by our educational authorities.

We know, for example, that there has been considerable change in the world position of Russia, India, China, France, Germany, and many other nations. New spheres of influence have replaced old ones, new peoples have emerged, and new forces on world history have been created.

Has there been any corresponding change in any of the subjects taught in our schools? Are we adequately equipping our youth for the world in which they will live? Have we forgotten that that world differs from the one into which we were graduated from school?

Subjects that might have been extremely valuable 20 years ago may not mean so much today and tomorrow may mean even less. Our students may be still studying for a world in which France and Germany were major influences, where China and Russia were vast nonentities, where Europe was dominant and Asia merely a great void—but is that the situation today? The culture, mores, and civilizations of once unimportant nations may have been of little significance once—but what about the future?

THE NEW WORLD

We must learn to know more about the peoples of the world with whom we are going to be compelled to deal. We must know their history, their ways of living, their philosophy of life, their ethnic background, and what motivates them. We must understand them before we can properly deal with them.

Very often the history of a nation will tell a great deal about the people who are the product of that history. How many schools in America offer courses in the history of Russia, China, and India, for example? How many teach the language?

We hear a great deal about the oriental mind and we are confused by such matters as "face" and other mystifying concepts that are almost meaningless to us. We overlook the fact that many people in other parts of the world often guide their lives by such concepts. Nations take action that may affect us and the world and we do not comprehend why. Sometimes the reason is hidden in the history of that nation and such a situation should concern our educational authorities and the people of this Nation.

What the leaders of another nation may do is often subject to ascertainment by some knowledge of the philosophy of that nation. The stream of history often carries a people along into channels that can be predetermined and foretold once we have traced it from the source. Men often fall into a mold that has been cast by the ages. There is a pattern of life that reveals itself once some basis of understanding has been reached. Have we forgotten that?

ARE WE KEEPING UP WITH IT?

The world has been changing but there has been no corresponding change made by us in our preparation for it. I do not mean any drastic revolutionary upheaval in our educational system—I mean slight, gradual, progressive change that will keep us up to the times in which we live.

Is a change necessary? I do not know because I do not know enough about either the world or our educational system—but there are people in this country who do know and we can easily find out. I believe the matter should be thoroughly investigated in a way that I shall propose in a few minutes.

CHANCE FOR SURVIVAL

I also believe that our educational system has not met the responsibility of more adequately helping to prepare our youth for the status of military readiness that we may have to maintain for a great many years. Has there been any change in our educational system to meet the world situation that confronts us militarily?—a world situation incidentally in which our youngsters will have a better chance of survival if they are better prepared for what they must face.

I do not mean any drastic revisions of the educational curriculum but merely some slight changes that might be beneficial even in peacetime and would certainly be extremely helpful in wartime. For example, courses in first aid; Morse code; knowledge of military rates, ranks, and commands; ship and plane identification; protective measures against gas, atomic radiation, and bacteriological warfare; intercommunication systems and language; nomenclature for parts of guns, ships, tanks, and so forth.

There are many, many things that must be taught to a recruit before he is ready for combat duty. They take time to learn—all too precious time. They concern matters that we must live with today whether we want to or not. Knowledge of such matters may save lives.

Why do we not give our high school students that chance for self-protection and self-preservation by including such courses in our educational curriculum? Why do we not give our Nation that same chance for self-preservation? Most of the courses would be helpful even if we never have another world war. Under present world conditions, the value would be inestimable—it might even mean the life of the Nation.

NO UNTAPPED RESOURCES

I do not know if there have been any conferences between our military and educational leaders to determine whether or not one may be of help to the other without any sacrifice to itself. There certainly should be many such conferences because, from here on in, we cannot overlook any untapped resource of readiness.

There are so many illustrations but in my opinion, at least, they all point to one inescapable conclusion: the need to reexamine our whole educational system in the light of present and probable future world conditions.

I believe a congressional committee should immediately be named to call in leaders in military, educational, industrial, governmental, and productive fields for a united effort to determine whether we can give better preparation to the youth of America.

We must learn immediately what, if anything, our educational system may be able to contribute to the needs of the military. We must know where there may be better cooperation. We must know what changes there have been to conform to new world conditions.

RABBITS AND TIGERS

Russia now dominates over half the world and, from all indications, may continue to do so for many years. In that situation, it is incredible to me that every high school does not offer courses in Russian history, language, and civilization.

We are going to live under air raid warning signals that are established to tell us bombs, fire, death, and destruction are coming. In that situation, it is incredible to me that every high school does not have compulsory courses in first aid, the use of fire-fighting equipment, and other protective measures that may save lives.

We are preparing our children to hunt rabbits when tigers are stalking the jungle. It is not simply that history may call us to account. It is closer than that: our own children may call us to account. What is our answer to be to them?

I think it essential to have an over-all review of our educational system as quickly as possible so that, if any changes be desired, they may be put into effect as quickly as possible. Any nation gives its children a chance to die: let us give ours a chance to live.

A REAL SURVEY

Let me emphasize that the last thing in the world that I am recommending is that the military dictate to our educational authorities or be the final judge as to what subjects should be studied by our youth. I certainly would not subscribe to that.

Neither do I believe that industry should usurp that function. Nor should our diplomatic and governmental policy makers.

I am inclined to think that those who now determine our educational policies are fully qualified to make any changes once the need has been demonstrated. A real survey should be made and recommendations advanced by leaders in education, production, military affairs, and those who determine what our national and international policies are to be. I believe hearings should be held as soon as possible by a joint congressional committee appointed for that specific purpose.

STUDENT EXCHANGE

Speaking of education and high-school students brings to my mind another matter that I discussed some months ago that should be a feature of any long-range program, in my opinion. I am referring to a proposal I made that I termed the "truth through youth" movement.

ACADEMY OF SCIENCES

We also know that the future is going to see the need for more highly trained specialists to be available for governmental service in the sciences. There is going to be a shortage in all those fields of endeavor and we must prepare for it.

Perhaps a United States Scientific Academy along lines similar to the academies at West Point and Annapolis may be one answer. Let the Government select applicants to such a scientific academy with the understanding that they will be held by the Government for a service period after graduation—say 5 years, for example. That would insure this Nation of a constant source of supply of personnel to fill needs that not only now exist but will continue. It would, for example, help eliminate the shortage of doctors in rural areas; and it would also insure our scientific laboratories of adequate personnel for both peacetime and wartime efforts.

Our need for doctors, biologists, chemists, physicists, bacteriologists, engineers, and others skilled in scientific pursuits is going to increase as the complexities of our world civilization increase. Our existing system cannot keep up with the demand.

EDUCATION IS WEALTH

Not exactly the same but in keeping with the need for education is another proposal I made back in January of 1949 which I termed the Federal scholarship plan. It contemplates a program whereby qualified high-school students may go on to higher education even though they are unable to pay for it. The Government makes it possible for them to do so but at no cost to the Government.

I outlined the details of my suggestion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD last year—January 25, 1949—so I will not repeat them here. In my opinion, the Federal scholarship plan I suggested should also be incorporated in any long-range program.

OUR JUDICIAL SYSTEM

I believe any long-range program must also encompass an over-all review of our judicial system in the light of world conditions. Over a year ago I asked the President to appoint a committee of outstanding legal authorities to survey the problem and make recommendations for necessary changes.

It is possible that present laws pertaining to arrest and introduction of evidence may no longer be adequate for the security of this Nation. It may well be that our Constitution does not place the security of any one individual above the security of the entire Nation although our present laws are susceptible of interpretations demanding that result.

Individuals who have been accused of committing acts detrimental to the Nation's security have not even been brought to trial in many cases because of laws that have not been carefully examined for many decades. Statutes of limitations, doctrines on illegal arrest, granting of mistrials, and rules of evidence have often been used as vehicles for miscarriages of justice.

In other cases, our judicial system has invited directed verdicts because of perfectly permissible legal maneuvers that have thwarted justice—if by justice we mean acquitting the innocent and convicting the guilty.

That is not theory; that is fact established by records of our courts, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and the Department of Justice. Some of the cases have become public property in the newspapers; still others are buried in confidential files of our law-enforcement agencies.

LAW SHOULD BE STRENGTH

A legal system that was originally established to protect the Nation and all the individuals in our Nation is failing to fulfill its functions. The courts have often had to place the Nation in jeopardy in order to fully protect every single legal right given to individuals who sought to destroy the very Nation that was protecting them. It is truly an anomalous situation when the law and the Constitution are the tools of those who would destroy our law and Constitution.

Our rules of evidence have often placed the Department of Justice in a situation that has prevented it from even bringing to trial persons believed guilty of trying to destroy this Nation. I am not talking about convicting them, now—I am talking about even bringing them to trial.

Perhaps those people were not really guilty, regardless of the amount of evidence obtained against them by the Department of Justice—I would be the last to say the Department of Justice should decide—but certainly this Nation and the people of this Nation are at least entitled to have a decision made by the courts we have established to see that justice triumphs.

Under prevailing law, and under the world conditions that exist today, the Government of the people of the United States has often had to drop cases because of disclosures of confidential matters that could be forced by defendants—disclosures that would seriously impair the security of this Nation. That is not theory—it has happened and will happen again.

THE INDIVIDUAL OR THE NATION?

Perhaps there is no solution to the problem but we must at least attempt to arrive at one. Our only attempt thus far has been by a piecemeal, makeshift approach that finds the remedy at least as bad and possibly worse than the condition.

Our legal difficulties call for an exhaustive, penetrating analysis of our legal procedure by the most competent authorities we can obtain. Recommendations should be presented and then, in their turn, those recommendations should be sifted and thoroughly analyzed to be sure that the individual is given every possible protection that is consistent with the security of the Nation. That is not the situation today.

Right now we give the individual every possible protection even if it imperils the security of the Nation. We have placed the security of an individual who seeks to destroy this Nation above the security of the Nation itself. That may or may not be true in any theoretical or academic sense but it is gospel truth as a practical matter. The net result of many legal shibboleths and rationalizations is to give one individual greater rights than those guaranteed a hundred and fifty million people.

Neither I nor anyone else wants any change of any kind that will allow the conviction of an innocent defendant. If that ever comes to pass the America we love will have passed, too. Of course, no change in our laws that would result in that would be either necessary or worthy.

CRIMES AGAINST NATIONAL SECURITY

Let me point out, too, that the emphasis in any revision of existing legal procedure should be placed primarily on matters affecting national security. Perhaps it should even be limited solely to such matters.

Perhaps all we need is a separate code for such cases as espionage, treason, sabotage, and other related matters. Perhaps what is needed is a separate tribunal with rules of evidence solely for cases of that sort in that court. The great care that must be taken in trying to institute any reform is readily apparent when we see how dangerously close we may be getting to star-chamber proceedings.

I mention that only to indicate how carefully we must proceed and why hit-or-miss methods conceived in hysteria will not do. It must be a painstaking, detailed study by the best legal minds of the country. The results of their study must be followed by a review by the Nation's best nonlegal minds. Lastly, of course, the Congress itself must decide. The final legislative decision will be reviewed by the highest court of the land and, ultimately, by the people themselves.

I have suggestions I should like to present to a properly constituted committee and probably we all do. I hesitate to offer my ideas publicly before they have been considered by legal minds of much greater knowledge and wisdom than I possess. The right committee should be able to finish cooking a half-baked idea or throw out a lemon. My only qualification has been the very limited experience of a brief legal practice and I am the first to concede that that is not sufficient.

But there are suitable legal minds for the task and they can easily be found in our law schools, courts, and bar associations. Why not make use of their services to strengthen our internal security by strengthening our judicial system?

I wish to again renew my suggestion to the President of over a year ago that he immediately appoint a committee to begin such a study. Perhaps it will accomplish nothing—perhaps it may save this Nation—but certainly it cannot do any harm and it may do a great deal of good. Why not do it?

ECONOMY

A little earlier I mentioned that we are going to have to pull in our belts to keep this Nation solvent. It has been advisable to do it for some time but now it is imperative. It cannot be done without the cooperation of everyone in the Nation.

Taxes are going to increase, of course, regardless of every possible economy, because we must provide the financial sinews of war and defense. But the greater the economies practiced, the lesser the taxes needed. True economy does not mean simply cutting every expenditure because many expenditures provide strength for America and our people. Anything that weakens this Nation is poor economy. But there are many possible savings that can be made without hurting the Nation and they must be made.

Taxation alone will not suffice for any long-range policy. Our program must be double-barreled: taxes as low and as few as possible, economies as great and as many as possible. Only in that way can we maintain our military strength, our world position, our financial solvency, and our American way of life.

That means further cuts in some types of Government spending must be made. It probably also means depriving the general public of services and benefits to which our people have become accustomed. We had better steel ourselves because if we listen to domestic screams of anguish we will be deaf to moans on distant battlefields.

ANY CHANGE SINCE KOREA?

We should know as quickly as possible what every governmental department and agency has done to effect economy since the Korean war began. Maybe they believe no further savings are possible but, in the situation in which we find ourselves today, even "impossible" savings must be made. Let me cite just one example of what I mean—printing. I mentioned it last year. It covers merely very minor items, it is true, but pennies add up to dollars and we must begin some place.

BULLETS OR BULLETINS?

The Government prints and gives away many educational pamphlets that probably are very valuable and helpful to the public. I am not referring just to the familiar cook books, baby books, agricultural books, and so on, but also to the lesser-known books and pamphlets with the fantastic titles. Why Jellyfish Migrate, the Sex Life of the Clam, Flying Habits of the Cuckoo, How To Measure a Cupboard, and such might be illustrative of some of the subjects covered. Probably every single one may be helpful to someone but what do they contribute in any real sense to the strength of America? Can we afford them?

Every department or agency should be required to furnish a list of every book or pamphlet upon which a loss is taken. They must be ordered to stop printing every single one that is not clearly essential to our well-being, having in mind our precarious financial situation. Incidentally, I think we in Congress could probably set them a good example by cutting down items in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Ninety percent of them are so much trash and we all know it. Some small saving might be effected there.

DUPLICATION IS EXPENSIVE

Another item has to do with congressional hearings. The House and Senate each considers substantially the same bills. Each holds hearings and copies of the testimony together with majority and minority reports are printed. The waste of time of Senators, Representatives, departments, agencies, clerks, stenographers, and witnesses in attending two hearings on the same subject is probably a fairly substantial item. The duplication in printing amounts to something, too.

That is the way the Government operates for reasons beyond my comprehension unless it be jealousy of power and authority on the part of each body of Congress. The necessity of separate reports and bills is readily discernible because, of course, each body must select its own report and write its own bill, but that can easily be done even after a joint hearing.

Would not a joint hearing eliminate double attendance by witnesses, stenographers, and clerks? Would not a joint hearing eliminate the duplication in printing? There should be no insurmountable difficulty in establishing some such time- and money-saving procedure. After all, the details would be set up by Representatives and Senators who provided for unification of the Armed Forces—and I suppose generals and admirals are as touchy and jealous of authority as Congressmen and Senators.

Perhaps such items are too small to talk about but they are painless savings. Let us begin there and continue on into the not so painless economies. It may cause some inconvenience and grumbling but that is not the governing consideration—after all, the men being drafted into military service are not getting exactly what they want, either.

GRASS ROOTS ECONOMY

I believe the public should also make a start on the so-called "Grass Roots Economy Program" I suggested in a talk on governmental expenditures several months ago. I will not go into detail here, as I went into the subject fully in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD when I discussed it—June 29, 1950. In that talk I attempted to show that one branch of the Government had attempted to spend about $2,000,000,000 a year more than the House of Representatives thought was necessary. The total came to about $20,000,000,000 in the period from 1940 to 1950. I suggested a program that I felt might have stopped such practices and effected economies.

I believe the proposal I termed a "grass roots economy program" would be helpful in our efforts to keep this Nation solvent and should be included in any long-range policy.

ALL THE ELEMENTS

I have not tried to give any full or detailed exposition of all the elements I believe are necessary for a rounded-out program for America. I have merely tried to indicate that America cannot embark on any sort of policy that does not provide for some cooperative effort on the part of all the phases of our civilization that combine to make the American way of life.

I do not believe we can remain strong merely by providing a great military force without regard to its effect upon our production or our economy. On the other hand, I do not believe we can keep strong by balancing our budget at the expense of the military. Neither do I think we can save our civil rights by allowing our defense secrets to be sold to the enemy. Nor do we protect our children by completely disrupting the family life of America.

The way to strength, in my opinion, lies in an over-all, united effort by all the people of America. No vital part in our strength must be either overemphasized or underemphasized.

We must not be topheavy militarily or otherwise; we must not spend ourselves into destruction; we must not sell ourselves into bondage by throwing away our liberties; we must not deplete our productive effort; we must not destroy the American way of life. Disaster lies in all those directions.

Any single remedy that does not give consideration to at least all those factors is not the answer; it will fall of its own weight.

"BETTER TO LIGHT ONE CANDLE THAN TO CURSE THE DARKNESS"

I have proposed the solution that appeals most to my judgment. It probably is not a good solution but if even one line of it has the slightest merit, at least that is something. I believe all Congressmen should offer their own solutions, not because any of us think ours is the best, but rather in the spirit and hope that something in our suggestions may be constructive or point the way to the right answer.

I have no desire to risk the scoffings of those who will easily prove what I already admit—that I not only am not an expert on military, productive, educational, historical, legal, or financial matters—but actually I know but little of any of those things. My only excuse for this talk is what I stated in the beginning—that if I have any thoughts at all on the subject, the position demands that they be expressed for the consideration of those with greater experience, knowledge, and judgment.

I shall not mind being accused of not having spoken wisely or well so long as I know I have spoken from my conscience and to the best of my ability. That I have done and I am content.

Let me conclude by again pointing out that practically everything I have said has been based on the assumption that we are not yet in world war III. Let us hope that with the help and cooperation of all, and with the help and guidance of God, we may yet find the right policy and program that will lead to peace.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1950

(Legislative day of Monday, November 27, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Most gracious Father, we lift up our hearts as again o'er the earth's dark shadows the angels' song is heard, and over an earth grown old with its burden of care again the voice of the Christ Child rings out with its cheer, that mankind are the children of God.

May we see with new eyes, as Christmas comes to a world where ill will has wrought such horror, that that One whose coming breaks the ages in two is set for the falling and rising of nations; that He does not stay in the manger, He walks in our world of pretense and greed and self-seeking, and that where He goes the judgment of God goes with Him. Bending low through the gate of the child heart, may we find the simplicity, the freedom, and the truth that sword and tongue and pen can never give. Amen.

NONDEFENSE EXPENDITURE REDUCTIONS—LETTER FROM SENATOR BYRD TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a letter I have written to the President of the United States.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DECEMBER 22, 1950.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: You stated in your December 15 address to the Nation that the Director of the Budget had been "instructed to reduce nonmilitary expenditures to the minimum required to give the effective support to the defense effort."

Your statement encourages me to pledge to you my full support in this vital requirement.

When we started preparedness for World War I the Federal debt was little more than $1,000,000,000. When we started preparedness for World War II the debt was a little more than $40,000,000,000.

We are starting to prepare for this, the most perilous of all threats to our freedom, with a debt of more than a quarter of a trillion dollars.

Assuming conditions short of total war, expenditures in the current fiscal year, which began last July 1, will run to between $48,000,000,000 and $50,000,000,000. In peace and war we have been on a deficit financing basis in 19 out of 21 years, including the present.

The deficit this fiscal year will be relatively small, but we must not allow it to lull us into a sense of false security. New defense spending will not show up in its real proportion until next fiscal year, which begins July 1.

We have already imposed one tax increase of $4,500,000,000. The second increase, $3,500,000,000 in the form of an excess-profits levy, is being enacted now. Including these two increases, on a full year basis, maximum Federal revenue next year is estimated at little more than $50,000,000,000. This estimate by sources follows:

Direct taxes on individuals	$20,700,000,000
Direct taxes on corporations	19,400,000,000
Excise taxes	8,200,000,000
Customs and miscellaneous receipts	2,000,000,000
Net employment taxes	800,000,000
Total	51,100,000,000

Secretary Snyder testified before the Finance Committee that the level of governmental expenditures next year (fiscal year 1952, beginning July 1, 1951) may be half again as large as this year. This means the budget for the coming fiscal year would be approximately $75,000,000,000.

From these revenue and expenditure estimates its appears that within a year we would be operating at an annual deficit of $25,000,000,000, unless we reduce expenditures and raise taxes still further.

Security is our first obligation, and under existing conditions we must visualize tremendous military expenditures in a long-range perspective. It is frightening to contemplate continuation of $25,000,000,000-a-year deficits indefinitely. We do not control the duration. It may be 5 years, 10 years, or longer.

There has never been a similar situation. The free-enterprise system is our first line of defense. We cannot relax our military preparedness. Neither can be maintained at maximum efficiency in an atmosphere of fiscal weakness which is certain to accompany prolonged deficits of the indicated magnitude.

These threatened deficits must be precluded completely, or greatly reduced, by the combination of further tax increases and retrenchment in nonessential spending. I submit that we should start reducing nonmilitary expenditures at this time with reductions in excess of $7,000,000,000.

The urgency of your determination "to reduce nonmilitary expenditures to the minimum required to give effective support to the defense effort" is obvious. Under our system Federal budgets are the result of joint action by the Chief Executive and Congress. Therefore, your leadership is required. Without it drastic budget reductions may be difficult if not impossible.

Budget reductions to the level you have sanctioned will involve domestic-civilian spending programs which are tied to long-term statutory commitments. If we are to reach these items to the extent necessary, joint executive-legislative action on basic legislation to repeal, reduce, or suspend the commitments will be required, and legislative recommendations to this end should be included in the President's budget proposals.

As a member of the legislative branch who has studied Federal budgets closely for 18 years, I believe the present crisis requires cooperative action between the executive branch and Congress to eliminate immediately $7,000,000,000 to $8,000,000,000 in nonessential expenditures from the new budget as follows:

1. Expenditures in strictly domestic-civilian programs, including the postal deficit, should be reduced (along lines suggested in the appended details and tables) by at least	$3,600,000,000
2. The Armed Forces are notorious for extravagant use of civilian manpower. They are now employing approximately 1 civilian for each 2 men in uniform as compared with 1 civilian for each 5 men in uniform at the World War II peak. The military effort would be strengthened if, through greatly needed efficiency, the Military Establishment's projected civilian employment of more than 1,250,000 were reduced by at least 150,000 with a saving of	500,000,000
3. Foreign economic assistance for the current fiscal year was estimated at $4,000,000,000. This program is scheduled to expire only a year hence. Billions now being appropriated for foreign military assistance are overlapping the economic assistance programs at many points. Foreign economic assistance expenditures in the new budget should not exceed commitments already made, and therefore should be reduced under estimates for the current year by at least	3,500,000,000

These suggestions should be regarded as the point from which further reductions should be considered. Even when they are substantially exceeded a third tax increase will be in immediate prospect.

I have confidence in Frederick J. Lawton, Director of the Budget, whom you have designated to make preliminary recommendations on reductions to be made. No man is more thoroughly versed in the complex Federal budget. I hope he finds that even greater reductions can be made immediately to strengthen our fiscal position without impairing the defense effort or damaging irreparably other aspects of national welfare.

I take the liberty of submitting my views to you and him in this letter which is written in a sprit of cooperation and constructive suggestion. The suggestions are supplemented by appended detail and tables.

Sincerely,

HARRY F. BYRD,
United States Senate.

ADDENDUM

The suggested budget reductions in the attached letter are in terms of broad expenditure categories.

The purpose of this addendum is primarily to expand domestic-civilian reductions first in terms of major expenditure functions, and second in terms of more specific expenditure programs.

In addition, further comment will be made on suggested reductions in expenditures for Military Establishment civilian employment, on expenditures for foreign economic assistance, and on the budget in general.

DOMESTIC-CIVILIAN

Figures in the following tables relative to domestic-civilian expenditures are exclusive of all military and related expenditure objects such as atomic energy, merchant marine, stockpile, National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, Panama Canal, Coast Guard, Alaska construction and transportation, and cemeterial programs. They do not include any foreign military or economic aid expenditures. They do not include any veterans costs. They do not include any interest on the debt or refunds of erroneously collected taxes.

Expenditures for State-aid programs, now totaling nearly $3,000,000,000, account for about 25 percent of the domestic-civilian budget. They are to be found running through virtually all of the so-called major functions in this category—public assistance and health, housing, education and research, agriculture, resources development and recreation, transportation (including highways and civilian airports), business promotion, employment, and so forth.

In this critical period the question of merit under ordinary conditions is not the paramount consideration. The degree to which they support the defense effort must be the controlling factor. These items must be reached if we are to reduce nonmilitary expenditures to the minimum required to give effective support to the defense effort. Most of them are tied to long term statutory commitments, and most of them will require changes in State budgets. Wherever new basic legislation will be required to repeal, amend, or suspend these Federal commitments, legislative recommendations should be included in the President's budget proposals. The States are now better able than the Federal Government to finance the irreducible minimum of public assistance, public construction, resources development and public health within their borders. They must be given notice immediately in order that they may conform.

The tabulated domestic-civilian material which is to follow is set forth under functional headings which are numbered. It should be considered in the light of the preceding general observations and the following specific explanation:

1. With respect to the social welfare, health, and security function and programs: most of the reduction proposals would be in public assistance, and institutional construction grants to the States. The contributory social security system of course would not be affected. The original purpose of other public assistance grants was to fill gaps in the social-security program. Social-security insurance has been broadened this year. The war effort will require the labor of all who are able to work. Scarcity of materials automatically will curtail or halt nondefense construction. After the reductions suggested in this item it would still be a quarter of a billion dollars higher than it was in fiscal year 1946 when World War II ended.

2. With respect to housing and community facilities (including mortgage purchases): Adequate war effort precludes nonessential housing construction. This program already has been curtailed. It should be eliminated with the exception of essential defense housing. No new money would be provided, but returns from previous loans should meet the cost of housing for the war effort. Repayments in these programs during fiscal year 1946, when the war ended, exceeded expenditures.

3. With respect to education and general research: This item includes an increase for scientific research directed to the war effort which is not evident in the rounded figures. Other items remain virtually unchanged from the present except a reduction in funds for the census.

4. With respect to agriculture and agricultural resources (including Commodity Credit Corporation): Reductions in this item are principally in Commodity Credit Corporation price supports and nonessential rural electrification construction. Price support receipts this year are exceeding expenditures. If food subsidies have to be imposed, such as they were in World War II, price support receipts should meet the cost as they did at that time. The reduced figure contemplates expenditures for rural electrification construction essential to the war effort.

5. With respect to natural resources: Major reductions in this item would be in nonessential public works by the Army engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation. But funds remaining for these projects would be 25 percent more than was available in fiscal year 1946 when we had both war and postwar conditions.

6. With respect to transportation and communication (including the postal deficit): Decreases in this item would be in nonessential highway, airport, and Army engineers' construction, and the postal deficit. As in other categories of construction scarcity of materials automatically will halt or curtail all nonmilitary effort construction. The postal deficit should be wiped out under any circumstances. Those who use the mails should be willing to pay for the service. It disappeared during World War II. It should be eliminated now. Increases are provided for navigation aids and facilities for regulation of transportation and communication necessary for the war effort.

7. With respect to finance, commerce, and industry: Reductions are made in expenditures for ordinary activities under this item, but increases would be provided for export and domestic controls along with others provided for in the general Government function.

8. With respect to labor: The figures in this item contemplate the 1946 level of activity with an increase provided for labor training.

9. With respect to general government: Provision is made for increased immigration control costs. It is assumed that some of the civilian controls incident to current conditions will be reflected in the cost of general Government functions. The suggested reduction takes into account increased costs of Federal civilian retirement.

It may be worthy of note that in fiscal year 1946 we were descending from peak military requirements. In the coming fiscal year we shall be ascending in military requirements. Under suggested reductions total expenditures for domestic civilian programs in the coming year would be approximately 35 percent higher than they were in fiscal year 1946.

Reductions in strictly domestic-civilian expenditures by major functions are tabulated and compared as follows:

GENERAL NOTE.—Substantial reductions in numerous instances, in addition to most State-aid programs, would require statutory legislation to be recommended along with the President's budget proposals.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT—CIVILIAN EMPLOYMENT

In my long study of Federal fiscal affairs I have watched especially for excessive civilian employment as a key to extravagance and inefficiency. I have observed in this connection that the Military Establishment, which is now employing a million civilians, or about one civilian for each two men in uniform, is the worst offender in extravagant and inefficient use of civilian personnel. The current ratio of civilian manpower to uniformed personnel is despite the fact that navy yard employment is still at a low ebb. At the peak of World War II the Military Establishment was employing one civilian to each five men in uniform. Civilian employment in the Military Establishment has been increasing for some time at the rate of 1,000 a day and published estimates indicate that a minimum of a quarter of a million more civilians are to be employed. A civilian payroll of one and one-quarter million employees would account for approximately $4,500,000,000 of defense expenditures. Maximum utilization of civilian manpower in the Defense Establishment would reduce this employment projection by at least 150,000, at a saving of one-half billion dollars. This should be made a matter of immediate attention by the best experts available.

FOREIGN ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE

Since World War II we have authorized $37,500,000,000 for foreign economic assistance. At present we are building up another multi-billion dollar program for foreign military assistance. Foreign economic assistance expenditures in the past 5 years have equaled expenditures for strictly domestic-civilian activities at home. This year's budget contemplated foreign economic assistance expenditures totaling $4,000,000,000. Military assistance is overlapping economic assistance at many points. Economic assistance has been withdrawn from England. The economic assistance program is scheduled to expire a year hence. The new budget should provide for no new commitments. Expenditures should be confined to commitments already made. The reduction, by comparison with this year's estimate, should be $3,500,000,000.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS

In addition to the Military Establishment the Veterans' Administration, now employing nearly 200,000 is another excessive user of manpower. It has been my observation that its administrative costs could and should be reduced, and that could be accomplished without impairment of any services for veterans to whom the Government is obligated for bona fide war-connected sacrifices. Under terms of the recent single appropriation bill, the Director of the Budget has demonstrated the accuracy of this observation. More reductions in Veterans' Administration costs could and should be made.

The only major expenditure item in the Federal budget which is untouchable at this time is the interest on the debt and on erroneously collected taxes.

ONE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF OSCAR SOLOMON STRAUS

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, Saturday, December 23, will be the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of one of our country's most devoted and dutiful servants, Oscar Solomon Straus, of New York State.

During this week the Library of Congress has deemed it fitting to honor his memory with an exhibit of his writings. Here on the floor of the Senate it also seems fitting to recall and honor the memory of this American diplomat, Cabinet member, lawyer and author, one of New York's finest citizens. This was a man who, under six Presidents, faithfully served his country, and who worked unceasingly for better international relations and for the cause of world peace.

Oscar Solomon Straus was loved and respected by the men of his own day. The characterizations of him by his contemporaries are eloquent tribute. I quote a few of these phrases of acclaim by his fellow citizens: "Our most beloved companion—a wise and perfect spirited citizen—a Jew, many of whose most important services were for Christian causes—a man honored by both the North and the South—a Republican who served his country under four Republican and two Democratic Presidents—a patriot who never considered the call to participate in public affairs a sacrifice but always a privilege."

I hope that recalling the selfless career of this citizen of yesterday will make us today aspire to ever greater magnanimity and unity of spirit.

DEDUCTIONS FOR WELFARE CLAUSES IN MARITIME CONTRACTS—ANNOUNCEMENT AS TO HOUSE BILL 8349

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I want to make an announcement, because many persons are interested in it. There is a bill on the calendar, House bill 8349, to authorize deductions from the wages of seamen for payment into employee welfare funds. The bill passed the House unanimously. It also passed through the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee unanimously, but was objected to at the last call of the calendar. Since that time the objection has been withdrawn but, because of a gentlemen's agreement that we will not bring up any of the bills to which objection has been made, in view of the further fact that it is very important to the stabilization of the whole maritime industry on the Pacific coast, and also the fact that I have discussed with both the majority and minority leaders the possibility of bringing this bill up on January 2, when Congress reconvenes, and inasmuch as I am sure there will be no objection on either side of the aisle, I want to make the announcement that I hope those who are vitally interested in the maritime industry which is so important on the Pacific coast will not become too excited about the matter, because the majority leader and the minority leader have agreed to bring the bill up on January 2, and we hope for its speedy passage.

PERSONAL STATEMENT BY SENATOR SMITH OF NEW JERSEY

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, as a matter of personal privilege I ask unanimous consent to speak for about 2 or 3 minutes to correct the interpretation in some newspaper accounts of a statement made by me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. In the newspapers of this morning I was reported to have disputed my friend of many years, a man for whom I have the greatest respect and affection, in connection with his recent address on the subject of our foreign affairs. The newspaper announced that I had said that I had disagreed with Mr. Hoover in regard to the question of whether putting Armed Forces abroad required action by the Congress. What I did say, Mr. President was, that I did not think legislation by the Congress would be necessary to authorize such action. I do not have certain knowledge one way or the other. It simply seemed to me that the Commander in Chief of our Armed Forces would in the interest of security, have power, especially in view of the fact that we had not entered into peace treaties with Germany or Japan, to order our Armed Forces any place he might think the situation demanded.

Furthermore, I feel that since we have ratified the North Atlantic Pact, probably the President of the United States would have authority to collaborate with the other nations who are members of the pact, with regard to collective security in Europe. But I did emphasize that whatever legal questions were involved, and whether or not any action had to be taken by the Congress, I felt it vitally important that any program to commit substantial portions of our Armed Forces in Europe or elsewhere should be thoroughly explored by both Houses of the Congress in order that there should be a full understanding and a full agreement as to what we were doing, and in order that popular opinion in the country would be behind us.

I think that is all Mr. Hoover meant by his suggestions. I do not think he meant to imply that he felt legislation would be needed. But, because of the misunderstanding, I have prepared a brief statement which I should like to give to my colleagues respecting the whole situation, so that my position may be clear.

The world situation is gravely serious, but we must face it with a positive faith that the forces of freedom will prevail. I am not willing to move back from the faith that the forces of freedom are going to prevail.

What we have learned from Korea is that the threat to peace is worldwide. We must have a global strategy to meet it. We cannot have one policy in Western Europe and a conflicting policy—or no policy—in Asia.

A study of the speech which ex-President Hoover made two nights ago certainly brings out that any proposal to increase substantially our land forces abroad must be thoroughly explored by the Congress before any final commitments are made. I am entirely in accord with this construction of Mr. Hoover's speech. I think I am correct in making that construction.

Mr. Hoover is right in emphasizing the necessity of our maintaining sea and air supremacy. But certainly Mr. Hoover did not mean that we can withdraw from all responsibilities to the other freedom-loving nations of the world and seek only our own self-defense. That conception is not adequate for America which from the beginning has been the voice and spirit of freedom and which has always believed that in unity there is strength.

I cannot believe for 1 minute that, as some of the newspapers have implied, Mr. Hoover recommended that we withdraw from all these responsibilities.

There is no disgrace or defeat in strategic retreat and reorganization of our forces. I will say further it would be no disgrace or defeat, in my judgment, to withdraw our forces from Korea, if we find it necessary. But there is disgrace and defeat in any form of appeasement or compromise of principle. Under no conditions can we appease or compromise the flagrant aggression of the Moscow-directed Chinese Communists in Korea and their defiance of the United Nations. Their present government, the Peiping Government, Moscow directed, must never be recognized by the United States and must never be admitted to the United Nations. We must use the veto if necessary. I emphasize the statement that we must use the veto if necessary. We must strongly support the anti-Moscow forces in China in their effort to release the Chinese people from foreign bondage.

Our immediate responsibility is the exploration of the many proposals—and I have been exploring many of them with officials of the administration and with the leaders of our Armed Forces and others—for a new and dynamic strategy that can release and aid all the free people of the world to save themselves. We must all understand together the great truth that only united blood, sweat, and tears—yes, and prayers—can preserve the United Nations, save freedom, and establish peace on earth and good will to all men.

Mr. President, I want to emphasize again that in unity there is strength. We must have unity among all freedom-loving nations if we are to save freedom from destruction.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I should like to know if the Senator from New Jersey is familiar with the press dispatches of today which indicate that the official Peiping radio said the Communist regime in China has rejected the cease-fire proposal, and also the dispatches from Tokyo which indicate General MacArthur's headquarters feels that the Communists are at the present time building up for an attack upon Seoul, which is, of course, south of the thirty-eighth parallel?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I anticipated that that would be the case, because it seems to me the cease-fire proposal could only lead to appeasement or else the kind of result to which the Senator from California called attention. I think we now have to concentrate on where we go from here, because it is conceivable that a great aggregation of force also would push us further. That is a matter for the military leaders to deal with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from New Jersey be granted 1 minute in order to answer a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey to define a little more fully what he meant by the word "explore," when he said that Congress should "explore." He used that word several times. It seems to me that Congress must go further than that, particularly if it has in mind the appropriation of funds to raise armies.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. What I had in mind, I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts, is that it seems to me Congress has a responsibility, as well as has the administration, in exploring these matters that will call for appropriation of funds. Exploring is to find out what the facts are, and then we should develop and agree on policy after we thoroughly know the facts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. So that Congress, in the Senator's opinion, must act on these matters as well as simply to explore them, and not leave them entirely to the decision of the President alone?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I think it may come to that. As I said earlier, I have stated, in response to inquiries from newspaper representatives, that I do not think legislation is required to authorize the President to send troops abroad. I do not know. Maybe appropriation features do require legislation. I have also thought that since we have ratified the North Atlantic Treaty, there were certain implied commitments of joint action which might justify the administration, in cooperation with other countries, in sending troops abroad. But such exploration may and should be made by the President, in conjunction with Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to be recognized for a minute in order that I may ask the Senator from New Jersey a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the Senator's request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from New Jersey made the statement that, in his opinion, ex-President Hoover did not intend to withdraw our assistance or our participation in the defenses of the world other than in Korea. I wonder how the Senator explains the statement contained in ex-President Hoover's speech to the effect that he would urge that not a dollar of money or any manpower be sent to Europe until the European countries demonstrated their own ability to withstand the aggression that was threatened from the Soviet Republic and its satellites? It would seem to me that if we waited in sending any additional manpower to the threatened countries of western Europe we would so discourage them that we could not possibly hope that they would take the necessary action in advance.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I will say to the distinguished Senator from New York that I was abroad this fall. I conferred with our representatives in London and in Paris. The whole question was whether we should send our boys to be a bulwark there while the European countries were organizing extra divisions, or whether we should have enough evidence that at least some of these extra divisions are already organized so that if and when our boys were sent there they would not be simply the first rank to be shot down. That was a very important question, and that I assume came up at Brussels in the past few days.

As a member of the Foreign Relations Committee I am looking forward with interest to hearing Mr. Acheson on that point. I felt that Mr. Hoover meant that the European nations were dragging their feet, were not prepared to go ahead and do their part in their self-defense, and he did not want to send our men or money there until there was evidence that the European nations would do their part.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from New York has expired.

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR TYDINGS

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the Senate for 2 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Maryland may proceed.

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, I arise today to note officially the imminent retirement from this honorable body of a distinguished Senator who has made an enviable and an outstanding record, and whose departure will take from the Senate one who will be sorely missed.

The occasion is one that affords opportunity to pay deserved tribute to our colleague, and to indicate to him the esteem and the admiration in which he is held by the membership of this body.

The reference is to my distinguished colleague, the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. It has been my extreme good fortune to be associated with Senator TYDINGS in many endeavors over the past quarter century. I can say without any reservations that he is a gentleman of the highest order, a patriot who needs yield place to no one on his military or public service record, and an extraordinarily capable, earnest, and fearless leader and legislator whose worth to the people of his State and the Nation has been demonstrated uncounted times.

His record, during his 24 years in this honorable body, session by session, vote by vote, is imprinted upon the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD just as the forthright principles upon which he always has stood are recorded in the public annals, for time to demonstrate their worth and their soundness. Here, as in his previous years in the House of Representatives, as Speaker of the House of Delegates of Maryland, and as a member of the Maryland State Senate, he has been an indefatigable worker in the public service, devoted to the welfare of his constituency and his country, and possessed of wide experience. A forthright protagonist, his position on controversial matters has ever been in accord with deep-seated principles.

Senator TYDINGS has been a statesman in the highest Maryland tradition of independence and dependability.

High among his principles is an unwavering insistence upon individual initiative and private enterprise. His defense of these principles has brought him often into conflict with present trends toward a form of socialism and away from the basic ideals upon which this country was founded and has prospered. He has stoutly opposed socialization of industry, socialization of medicine, and compulsory health insurance. He has consistently and courageously thought for himself. Whatever he has supported, or opposed, was in accordance with his firm convictions of the rightness of his stand.

Mr. President, the tribute paid him here this week by his fellow members of the Armed Services Committee perhaps brings most sharply into focus one of the most valuable contributions he has made to the work of the United States Senate, namely, that as a member and, later, as chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee. The wording of the testimonial scroll, in which his record is reviewed and deserved honor is paid him for his long and distinguished service to his State and Nation, is no mere collection of words. Rather, it is a tribute from the heart, accorded by his colleagues of both parties who knew most intimately the worth of his leadership and his abilities because of their close and continuing association with him during the critical years which have preceded and those which are still with us.

It is with the most intense regret that we say adieu to Senator TYDINGS—a regret in which I am sure the other Members of the Senate join heartily. In wishing the distinguished Senator all possible good fortune and high success and satisfaction in the years ahead, I know, too, that my colleagues and his subscribe wholeheartedly as well. There is no greater consolation that this world affords than the sincere conviction of a job well done. This sincere conviction, Senator TYDINGS will always have and cherish. I know of no words that could more fittingly express the feelings that we here in the Senate and the great body of our Maryland citizens have for Senator TYDINGS than to quote the words of Scripture: "Well, done, thou good and faithful servant."

ANNOUNCEMENT REGARDING CONFERENCE REPORT ON EXCESS-PROFITS TAX BILL

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I desire to make an announcement of some importance with respect to the conference report on the excess-profits tax bill.

The distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] has advised me that the conferees will agree on a conference report sometime this afternoon, and that there are some questions of drafting which will take some little time before the conference report will be reported to the Senate. It is my understanding that the conferees on the part of the House have agreed that the Senator from Georgia, as chairman of the conferees and as chairman of the Finance Committee, may bring the papers to the Senate to be considered here in the first instance. It may take some time. If we pass the civil defense bill and finish any other business before the conference report comes to the Senate, we shall take a recess until such time as the conference report can be submitted. It might be 5 or 6 o'clock before the conference report comes to the Senate.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. I may say that there is every hope that the agreement will be reached in a few minutes; and the draftsman has said that he probably could get through within 2 hours or 2 hours and one-half. So probably it will not be necessary for us to stay quite so late as the Senator from Illinois has indicated. On the other hand, of course, it might be necessary to do so; something might come up.

Mr. LUCAS. I was stating only what was reported to me.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to say that if it is possible for the conference report to be acted upon before 4 or 5 o'clock, it certainly will be deemed a real privilege by some of the Members of the Senate who already have reservations to leave at 5:30 this afternoon. I wonder whether the majority leader can relay that information to the conferees, at least to those from this side of the aisle, because it means a great deal to Senators who already have reservations.

Mr. LUCAS. I respectfully suggest that the Senator from Nebraska get in touch with the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN] and advise him of the situation of which he now advises me.

Mr. WHERRY. I shall be glad to do that. In fact, I have already advised the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. LUCAS. I have given the information to the Senate.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LUCAS. I am sure the conference report will not be delayed any longer than is absolutely necessary.

SEÑORA RIVERA ET AL.—MOTION TO RECONSIDER

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, referring to the bill (H. R. 5051) for the relief of Mrs. Juan Antonio Rivera, and others, which, in response to a request, was returned to the Senate yesterday by the House of Representatives, I ask the attention of the leaders on the other side, particularly the attention of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HENDRICKSON]. I ask unanimous consent at this time to take up and dispose of a motion to reconsider made by the Senator from New Jersey, with reference to which he has entered into a discussion with me here this morning. I think the Senator is now satisfied that the motion might be dismissed.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. I ask that the motion be withdrawn. It is the bill (H. R. 5051) for the relief of Señora Rivera and others.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey withdraws the motion to reconsider.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, in order that the RECORD may be complete, I wish to say that we have corresponded with the proper authorities. We have a copy of a cablegram, which I think the Senator from New Jersey has seen, which tells the story, as follows:

Ministry Defense states no indemnity has been paid to five widows of Bolivian Air Force officers killed in crash USAF C–54 September 19, 1947, near San Juan Peru, pd. By Bolivian Army regulations each widow receives pension for life of same amount according to rank of husband at time of death, as if he retired at that date. Paid amounts per month are Señora Rivera, 7,000 Bolivianos; Señoras Raul Valle, Diaz Romero, Otto Beese, and Hugh Soria, 6,000 each. Paid parallel exchange rate 180 Bolivianos for $1.

That means that they are receiving about $537 a month. I ask that the motion to reconsider be disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey has the right to withdraw the motion, and he has done so.

Mr. McCARRAN. I ask that the letter from the Department of the Air Force, dated December 21, 1950, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE AIR FORCE,
Washington, December 21, 1950.

Mr. J. CARLISLE RUDDY,
Senate Judiciary Committee.

DEAR MR. RUDDY: I refer to your recent telephone request as to whether the Government of Bolivia has paid any indemnity to the widows of five Bolivian officers who were killed in the crash of an Air Force C-54 transport plane near San Juan, Peru, on September 19, 1947.

The following message has been received from the United States air attaché in La Paz, Bolivia:

"Ministry Defense states no indemnity has been paid to five widows Bolivian Air Force officers killed in crash USAF C-54, September 19, 1947, near San Juan, Peru. By Bolivian army regulations each widow receives pension for life of same amount according to rank of husband at time of death as if he retired at that date. Paid amounts per month are Señora Rivera, 7,000 bolivianos; Señoras Raul Valle, Diaz Romero, Otto Reese, and Hugo Soria, 6,000 each. Paid parallel exchange rate, 180 bolivianos for $1.

"BURNS."

Sincerely yours,
K. S. AXTATER,
Colonel, USAF, Deputy Director, Legislation and Liaison.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I desire to offer an observation in connection with this matter. I am not objecting to what is proposed, because the bill was passed with the understanding that a statement would be forthcoming explaining to the Senator from New Jersey whether the country from which these fliers came—Bolivia, I believe it was—had compensated them. It was my suggestion that the bill be passed, and that the time limit within which a motion to reconsider might be made be waived, in order that the explanation might be made. As I understand, the explanation has been made, it is satisfactory to the Senator from New Jersey, and he withdraws his motion. My reason for making this observation is that in order that it may be understood that we are not returning to the reconsideration of a bill. It was passed, and this takes it out of a class of bills that anyone might wish to reopen or to have reconsidered.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Hawks, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Snader, its assistant reading clerk, announced that the House had passed, without amendment, the bill (S. 1139) for the relief of Mrs. Robert P. Horrell.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 555) making temporary appropriations for the fiscal year 1951, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 9893. An act to authorize certain construction at military and naval installations, and for other purposes.

FEDERAL CIVIL-DEFENSE PROGRAM

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4268) to authorize a Federal civil-defense program, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is open to amendment.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, last night I made an explanation of the pending bill, which apears in the RECORD. The bill has been very thoroughly discussed. It has been gone over very carefully by the Armed Services Committee. Prior to that time, the entire problem had been studied very closely by the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, and a report submitted by that committee.

The bill which is now before the Senate, in general principle, I think, meets with the approval of the Committee on Atomic Energy. We have worked closely with the staff of that committee, and we have been in consultation from day to day with its distinguished chairman, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCMAHON].

There are three or four amendments pending. I desire to say that I have been advised by the Parliamentarian of the House of Representatives that, at about 2 o'clock, or at any rate early this afternoon, the House may recess until after the holidays. I should like to expedite this bill, in order that the conferees may be appointed in both Houses, in case it is necessary to send the bill to conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, on behalf of the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. FLANDERS] and myself, I send to the desk an amendment to the pending bill, S. 4268. This amendment was proposed by me yesterday, it has been printed, and it is now lying on the table. Before the clerk reads it, I should like to make a brief statement about it.

In brief this amendment would add to the pending bill in substance the provisions set forth in title II of the Defense Production Act of 1950, Public Law 774, of the Eighty-first Congress, having to do with the President's authority to requisition.

The major part of title II of the Defense Production Act was written into the bill by the Senate Banking and Currency Committee and was adopted in conference and subsequently was enacted into law.

I believe that a reading of the amendment at this time would be useful. The amendment is self-explanatory. After it has been read, I shall continue my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 22, between lines 22 and 23, it is proposed to insert the following new section, and renumber succeeding sections of the bill accordingly:

COMPENSATION FOR NONGOVERNMENTAL PROPERTY ACQUIRED

SEC. 402. (a) Except in the case of property acquired pursuant to section 201 (h) of this act through judicial proceedings for condemnation, the Administrator shall promptly determine the amount of the compensation to be paid for any property (other than that of the Federal Government or any department or agency thereof) or the use thereof acquired pursuant to this act, but each such determination shall be made as of the time it is acquired in accordance with the provisions for just compensation in the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. If the person entitled to receive the amount so determined by the Administrator as just compensation is unwilling to accept the same as full and complete compensation for such property or the use thereof, he shall be paid promptly 75 percent of such amount and shall be entitled to recover from the United States, in an action brought in the Court of Claims, or, without regard to whether the amount involved exceeds $10,000, in any district court of the United States, within 3 years after the date of the Administrator's award, such additional amount, if any, which, when added to the amount so paid to him, shall be just compensation.

(b) Whenever the Administrator determines that any real property acquired under this act and retained is no longer needed for the purposes of this act, he shall, if the original owner desires the return of the property and pays to the Administrator the fair value thereof, return such property to such owner. In the event the Administrator and the original owner do not agree as to the fair value of such property, the fair value shall be determined by three appraisers, one of whom shall be chosen by the Administrator, one by the original owner, and the third by the first two appraisers; the expenses of such determination shall be paid in equal shares by the Government and the original owner.

(c) Whenever the need for the purposes of this act of any personal property acquired under this act shall terminate, the Administrator may dispose of such property on such terms and conditions as he shall deem appropriate, but to the extent feasible and practicable he shall give to the former owner of any property so disposed of an opportunity to reacquire it (1) at its then fair value as determined by the Administrator, or (2) if it is to be disposed of (otherwise than at a public sale of which he shall give reasonable notice) at less than such value, at the highest price any other person is willing to pay therefor: Provided, That this opportunity to reacquire need not be given in the case of fungibles or items having a fair value of less than $1,000.

On page 2, in the table of contents, between the lines containing "Sec. 401." and "Sec. 402.", respectively, insert the following, and renumber succeeding section designations contained in such table of contents: "Sec. 402. Compensation for nongovernmental property acquired."

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, I am aware that Senate bill 4268 contains a section, section 202, relating to the Defense Production Act of 1950 to civil defense, which reads as follows:

SEC. 202. The terms "national defense" or "defense" as used in title II of the Defense Production Act of 1950 shall be construed to include "civil defense" as defined in this act.

It is my understanding that it is the intent of the Committee on Armed Services to carry over title II of the Defense Production Act into the pending civil-defense bill. However, I am not satisfied that section 202 does in fact accomplish what the committee intended.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. IVES. Please permit me to complete my statement, and then I shall be glad to yield.

If the Administrator exercised the authority to requisition granted in title II of the Defense Production Act, then the remedial language contained in the section for property owners would, of course, flow from the exercise of such authority.

However, if the Administrator acting under the emergency powers of this bill—section 303—were to exercise the authority contained in section 201 (h), I do not believe that in that case the provisions of title II of the Defense Production Act would attach. It is for that reason that I offer this amendment. If it is the intention of the Armed Services Committee by section 202 of Senate bill 4268 to incorporate by reference title II of the Defense Production Act of 1950 with reference to any requisition powers, I cannot see that it would be harmful to incorporate it as provided in my amendment. I might say in passing that the substance of this amendment, which was drafted by the office of the legislative counsel, was thoroughly discussed with them, and the legislative counsel's office is in agreement with my views as stated above. I do not believe that the Administrator of the civil-defense program should have greater powers than those granted to the President under the Defense Production Act with respect to the authority to requisition property. I trust the manager of the bill, the able Senator from Tennessee, can accept this amendment.

I now yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I think the Senator is quite correct in stating that it was the intention of the Armed Services Committee to incorporate title II of section 201 of the Defense Production Act, Public Law 774. Title II provides, as the distinguished Senator has said, that the President shall follow certain procedures with reference to compensating or reimbursing persons for property taken. The only difference in the amendment presented by the distinguished Senator from New York is that under the Defense Production Act, title II, the President grants compensation. I believe that is correct.

Mr. IVES. That is what I pointed out as I closed my remarks.

Mr. KEFAUVER. The Senator's amendment provides that it shall be done by the Administrator of the Civil Defense Act. It was, of course, intended that title II of the Defense Production Act be carried over and made a part of the law and that the procedures be incorporated in the Civil Defense Act.

I do not know of any particular harm in spelling it out fully, if it will clarify the matter in any way. But it was our intention to make the section which the Senator has offered as an amendment applicable by reference to section 202. If the Senator is insistent on having the matter clarified, I have no objection to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. IVES].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. IVES. I thank the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I have no desire to delay for a minute passage of the Federal Civil Defense Act of 1950. There is certainly not a Member of this body, nor indeed any responsible person, who does not see the need for speedily enacting legislation to protect our country from a sudden attack.

I must, however, call the attention of the Senate to a viewpoint which was ably expressed to the Senate Armed Services Committee by the mayor of New York City, Vincent R. Impellitteri. Mayor Impellitteri, speaking for an area which would certainly be one of the primary targets of any enemy air attack, strongly urged in his statement that funds for bomb shelters be used to pay part of the cost of permanent projects. It is his feeling and that of many others that these projects would be useful not only for defense but also for peacetime purposes. Yet the bill as reported out by the committee has provided that such dual purpose projects might be aided only through an RFC loan program.

Mayor Impellitteri pointed out that the cost of the project sites in a congested community like New York City, with its understandably high property values, would be a major portion of the cost of the shelter. Not only New York City but many other American cities can demonstrate a crying need for more adequate Federal financial assistance in the bomb-shelter program. The pending legislation, however, prohibits the use of Federal funds to purchase the sites for bomb shelters.

Mr. President, I have not had time to read the voluminous hearings and to become acquainted with all the testimony that was presented before the Armed Services Committee on this point. There are many ramifications in legislation of this kind. I do not know them all.

Moreover, this is emergency legislation and, under the conditions today pertaining, must be rushed through. I would certainly have confidence, however, that the chief executive of the city of New York has no selfish motives in the position he has taken, but speaks only from a desire to advance and further this entire program. The city of New York is eager to contribute its full share to the civilian-defense program, as well as to the entire over-all defense program of this country.

I do not think, however, that the city of New York should be placed in a position where it will be unable, due to its concentration of population, to make adequate preparation for the protection of its civilian population. New York should not suffer unduly because it stands as the first target of an enemy's attack.

I trust that when the new Congress convenes, civilian-defense legislation, as well as much of the other emergency legislation that we have hurriedly passed, will be reviewed. I hope that at that time Mayor Impellitteri's views will be given reconsideration. I hope such changes can be made as are justified by reexamination of the financial formula set forth in this bill.

I know that the important consideration of the moment is the commencement of this vital program. Nothing must interfere with the earliest possible passage of this bill. I therefore do not propose to introduce any amendments or to delay the Senate any further.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point in my remarks a statement made by Mayor Impellitteri on December 15 before the Senate Armed Services Committee.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CIVIL DEFENSE—NEW YORK CITY

(Statement by Mayor Vincent R. Impellitteri to Senate Armed Services Subcommittee, Washington, D. C., December 15, 1950)

I appreciate the opportunity of appearing before your committee to outline to you the importance to New York City of establishing a permanent civil defense program on a national level for the whole of the United States. We realize the importance of being prepared for any eventuality in case our country is attacked. New York City, in our opinion, would become a prime target and we are determined to be ready if such an attack should come.

We are approaching this problem without hysteria and with the knowledge that New York City, like other energetic and advancing communities, must be kept functioning regardless of the possibility of attack. We reject the take to the hills and make for the caves philosophy. We shall not adopt a policy of dispersion and decentralization. We propose to do everything within our power to see that our city continues as a major port and as the greatest industrial, financial, business and transportation center of the country. Any other approach would give aid and comfort to our enemies, and impede all out mobilization of our full strength.

We are happy that a report is being made by your committee looking toward the enactment of Federal legislation to coordinate and aid States and local governments in the civil defense program. The main issues are clear. The strategists are available, and no prolonged, time-consuming studies are necessary. Lack of a definitive, authoritative Federal policy, implemented by Federal law and appropriations, has to date severely handicapped the cities and States. Washington must come forth with policy, leadership and help.

IMPORTANCE OF NEW YORK CITY TO THE WAR EFFORT

New York City is the greatest city in the world largely because of its port, which in turn has brought great industries to the area. In peace and war, the New York port, which is at the crossroads of the world shipping lanes, sends more ships of all varieties to more world ports than any other harbor in the world. The great part played by the New York port of embarkation during the last war is well known to all. We are proud of that record and ready to renew and expand it if we are told what is wanted and when.

New York City is the nerve center of far-flung industries and business. It is the financial center of the world and our most important gateway. Moreover, many great industries are concentrated within the city upon which millions of people depend for their livelihood. Ours is the center of management and finance.

New York's unique geographical situation requires many bridges and tunnels to connect its various boroughs and provide communication with the surrounding area to the north and south. These bridges and tunnels are part of an expanding, modern arterial highway system. Our population is approximately eight million and our rapid transit carries to and from Manhattan Island below Fifty-ninth Street approximately two and one-half million people each day. Our bridges, tunnels, and arterial system move millions of people in and out of the entire metropolitan district with a population of fifteen million.

Anyone familiar with the factors which make a city function smoothly, including water supply, utilities, transportation, industry, and communications, will not take seriously suggestions that we prepare to evacuate 8,000,000 people. There is no rhyme or reason in such thinking. It would be impractical to reproduce in the open country the public utilities and other services necessary to accommodate the millions of people in this and other large cities. New York will not be abandoned nor can our operations be suspended even for a day.

APPROPRIATIONS

Virtually all State and city officials are looking to the Federal Government to establish the mobilization policy and program to be followed throughout the country. These decisions must be made federally and be guided by a Federal agency, and implemented by Federal appropriations allocated fairly to the States and municipalities on the basis of estimated strategic dangers and needs.

There must be sharp differentiation between emergency disaster relief and long-range permanent construction so planned as to be usable for public purposes in peace as well as for civilian defense in war.

New York, like other cities, must operate on an intelligent budget for operating and capital expenditures. Our powers to levy taxes and incur debt are sharply defined, and limited. The State also is limited in its resources. We cannot plan and budget our program intelligently until we know what is going to be done on the Federal level.

CONTROL AND CARE OF BOMBED AREAS

We cannot make a really accurate estimate of the cost of housing, clothing, feeding, and providing medical attention for bombed areas. If we could predict accurately when and where attacks would be made, our Armed Forces could stop them, and our civilian defense problem would be simplified. Obviously, medical and other supplies required for the care of disaster areas must be stockpiled at various strategic points. These must be rushed to disaster areas as required, much as our Government and the Red Cross handle disasters in peacetimes. The cost of stockpiling must be borne by the Federal Government, and we in our communities must organize to use these materials when they are needed. We have attempted to estimate how much money will be required in our community for this purpose, and the results have varied greatly, depending upon the assumptions made by the estimator. We are not sufficiently familiar with the civilian defense needs to make accurate forecasts, and look to Washington for advice.

We do know that certain materials will be required and should be purchased promptly. The newspaper reports advise that the National Security Resources Board recommended to Congress an appropriation of $632,000,000, subdivided into three separate categories for the purchase of special equipment to augment fire, engineering, transportation, communications, stockpiles of critical materials and medical supplies and for communications and control centers. If our preliminary checks of possible requirements in New York City prove to be anywhere near accurate, this amount will be inadequate if several communities are attacked at once.

SHELTERS

I do not know what type of shelters your committee will recommend. I feel very strongly that it would be a distinct waste to spend $2,250,000,000, as suggested in some quarters, on shelters which would have no peacetime use. It would be impossible for municipalities even with State aid to finance the share of the cost of these expensive projects in the proportions suggested. States and cities cannot stretch their credit to 50 percent of the cost of such work. I strongly urge that you change this provision so that 80 percent of the funds are provided by the Federal Government with 20 percent contributed by the State and city governments. This is a more realistic approach. I also urge that any bill authorizing such shelters enlarge the definition to include places of assembly, parking garages, hospital additions and other related facilities which will serve a permanent, public use.

HOSPITAL FACILITIES

The city of New York has a substantial hospital expansion program under way. However, the funds available within the exemption from the debt limit granted by the State of New York will be inadequate to complete even part of the program. Should an emergency occur today, New York's hospitals could crowd in a substantial number of injured persons on an emergency basis. We could not, however, cope with a disaster. Were we on the other hand to expedite our entire planned hospital program and expand it so as to meet the immediate future needs of the city of New York, the emergency needs in case of disaster could also be met. Obviously, as we increase the capacity of our permanent hospitals, we also increase our ability to handle emergency cases. More money must be made available for this program if we are to expedite it and have it serve our people after an attack. Our plans and finances must be adjusted now if we are to meet this emergency.

MASS TRANSPORTATION

Plans have been virtually completed for large-scale additions to New York City's subway system. These plans include a new subway in Second Avenue in Manhattan, a low-level express subway in Sixth Avenue, and other extensions. Funds are not now available to build these subways. It would be entirely feasible to excavate substantial sections of these subway extensions and to use these excavations as bomb shelters. Once the emergency is past, subway sections can be completed and returned to their intended use as extensions of the existing rapid transit system.

PARKING GARAGES

One of our greatest concerns is traffic congestion. This problem is serious, anyway. In the light of a possible atomic attack on New York City, it is frightening. I have recently appointed a city parking authority, and they are now finding ways and means of financing construction of parking garages to get vehicles off the streets. Parking garages can be designed and built to serve as air-raid shelters. There are other important uses to which these garages could be put to in connection with civilian defense. Among them is use as temporary accident wards and hospitals. Great flexibility is possible in buildings of this type and they could be located at points of greatest congestion. We need parking garages in New York, having 12,000,000 square feet of floor space. We must have Federal help on this program.

I am in complete disagreement with those who have urged that the construction of combined parking garages and shelters be left entirely to cities. If this is done, no program which will meet the need is remotely possible. Funds needed for schools, hospitals, and other essential city services cannot be made available for the construction of parking garages and reduction of traffic congestion. It makes much more sense to build all-purpose buildings with shelter funds.

ARTERIAL PROGRAM

All studies by administrative officials, police, and engineers concerned with emergency transportation have shown that the express highway and parkway system constitutes the best means of ingress, egress, and rapid travel. These arteries can be controlled by proper officials and restricted to military and civil defense vehicles. We have a substantial program, including strategic expressways leading in and out of the city under way and the completion of these arteries is a defense requirement. Additional Federal defense funds should be made available to speed up this arterial program and push it to an early completion. Our contracts are ready to let. We need funds and priorities.

PRIORITIES

Some dislocation of labor working in the construction industry is inevitable. Everything possible should be done to keep this at a minimum. In this connection, I urge you to take the steps necessary to insure that equipment and materials will be available for the defense program once the national administration has fixed it. I am sure you will find that Gen. W. H. Harrison, Administrator, National Production Authority, will agree that if the civilian defense program is approved as essential to the war effort, priorities must be determined accordingly. This will provide relief to labor which is in danger of unemployment, which will shake morale and seriously impede both mobilization and defense.

Additional information on the military and economic importance of New York City is attached.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in the RECORD a copy of a letter addressed to me by Mayor Impellitteri.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CITY OF NEW YORK,
OFFICE OF THE MAYOR,
New York, N. Y., December 19, 1950.

Hon. HERBERT H. LEHMAN,
New York, N. Y.

DEAR SENATOR: I am attaching copies of the statement I made before the Senate Armed Services Committee in connection with the proposed civilian defense bill.

The last draft of the bill available before I left Washington last Friday still contained a clause prohibiting the use of any of the Federal funds for the purchase of sites for bomb shelters. It also limited Federal participation to 50 percent of the cost of such projects. In a congested community like New York, the cost of the site alone will be between 25 and 50 percent of the total cost of the project. This automatically reduces the Federal participation far below 50 percent of the actual cost. I doubt very much if the States will find it possible to provide adequate shelters if these provisions are not changed to increase the Federal share of actual cost.

You will see that I strongly urged that shelter funds be used to pay part of the cost of permanent projects that will be useful for defense and in peacetimes. Referring the combined parking garage and shelter program to the RFC is not the answer. Some form of subsidy or grant is essential.

I hope that you will help adjust this law to make it workable in New York.

Cordially,

VINCENT R. IMPELLITTERI,
Mayor.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut is recognized.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I understand that the senior Senator from New York wishes to make a very brief observation.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, I merely want to associate myself with the remarks which have just been made by my distinguished colleague [Mr. LEHMAN]. I feel that he has hit the nail on the head, and that it is most essential that the matter of which he spoke be attended to at the earliest possible time.

I thank the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Massachusetts has a brief statement which he wishes to make at this time.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I understand that the proposed Federal Civil Defense Act contains a provision granting congressional consent to interstate civil defense compacts.

I am particularly interested in this provision, having introduced, last September, Senate Joint Resolution 204, the so-called Lodge-McCormack resolution, which also provides for prior congressional assent to interstate cooperative efforts and mutual assistance compacts in this vital field of civil defense. In States of relatively small area, which are thickly populated, it is impossible to limit civil defense to State lines. In Massachusetts, in fact, throughout the industrial eastern seaboard, this provision has vital importance.

In this connection, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of a telegram from Harold C. Ostertag, chairman, Northeastern Regional Conference on Civil Defense, dated September 22, 1950, enthusiastically endorsing this proposal, be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y.

Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE, Jr.,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

The Regional Conference on Civil Defense, sponsored by the New York Interstate Cooperation Committee and the Council of State Governments, and attended by State administrators, civil-defense directors, and legislators from the 10 Northeastern States, unanimously adopted today a resolution strongly recommending immediate passage of pending Lodge-McCormack resolution granting consent to the States to enter into interstate compacts for developing maximum of mutual aid in civil defense among the States. The States of this region strongly believe immediate action on Senate Joint Resolution 204 and House Joint Resolution 542 by Congress is imperative.

HAROLD C. OSTERTAG,
Chairman, Northeastern Regional Conference on Civil Defense.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield so that I may make an observation?

Mr. McMAHON. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. KEFAUVER. The interstate compact provision of this bill is substantially the same as the one proposed by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts. This is one of the most important parts of the bill, and I know that the governors are extremely eager that the proposed act be in effect so that the States can legislate accordingly when their legislatures meet early in January. I am glad that the Senator from Massachusetts brought the matter to the attention of Congress and to the attention of the governors at an early date, because it is one of the most important parts of the civil-defense program.

Mr. LODGE. I thank the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Connecticut.

EX-PRESIDENT HOOVER'S SPEECH

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, before beginning my rather brief remarks on the pending bill I wish to say that along with every other citizen of the United States I have given consideration to the message delivered by ex-President Hoover night before last. There will be many analyses made of the speech, and I intend to make my own close analysis of it and comment on it at some length after more reflection and deliberation. However, the importance of the speech is such and the necessity for pointing out to the American people some obvious things about it is so immediate that I shall venture to make some observations about the speech.

Mr. President, there was a specific denouncement of appeasement in Mr. Hoover's speech, and then a proposal was made to commit a most monstrous act of appeasement. Ex-President Hoover suggested that we turn away and retire to our own shores. In other words, says he, Turn the whole world over to the Communists except the Western Hemisphere. I would call the attention of the American people to the fact that the ex-Vice President of the United States, Mr. Henry Wallace, made substantially the same proposal in 1946. As a result he was driven from the Cabinet and denounced in unmeasured terms.

I would also call attention to the fact that in a treaty which we ratified in this very room within the past 12 months, this Nation pledged its sacred word to regard an attack on any of the treaty nations as an attack on ourselves. I do not believe the American people are going to welsh on it. There is plenty of room for debate as to how we shall implement or fulfill that obligation, and I for one have some questions in my mind as to how we should implement it, but the world should be told that we do not intend to welsh on our word, because that is not the spirit of the American people. It goes without saying that the obligation which we assumed is not unilateral. The Atlantic treaty nations—none of them—can contemplated welshing on their obligations. I was happy to hear the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] announce today that so far as he was concerned he, too, denounced appeasement, and that he would have no part of it. However, I call his attention to the fact that the program enunciated by the ex-President constitutes nothing else but appeasement.

How many soldiers we should place in Western Europe for our own security I do not pretend at the moment to say. I think we shall have to study that question, and consider it very soon. I am not one of those who believe that the entire strategy of this situation can be settled in the Pentagon, and in the Pentagon alone. As a Senator of the United States I propose to have something to say about it myself, because it is partly my responsibility.

I notice, too, that the ex-President of the United States assured the world that the atomic bomb did not amount to very much. I do not know exactly the words he used. I do not know what information is available to him which is not available to me. I do not believe he should give that kind of assurance to the American people, and sing that kind of siren song. That brings to mind the observations of another gentleman who has some reputation in this field, Dr. Vannevar Bush, who, I am told, has suggested recently that we could not successfully penetrate defenses with our atomic bomb. That must be good news to the Kremlin, the Soviets, and bad news to our friends in Europe. I do not think he knows what he is talking about. He is the gentleman who wrote a book in which he stated many theses and enunciated many propositions. I am reliably informed that in the book he made the prediction that the Soviets would not achieve an atomic bomb within 10 years. While the book was being printed the news of the Soviet achievement came out, and they had to stop the presses and he had to rewrite that portion of the book. After that I think no one took too much stock in the book. Therefore I do not think the Kremlin would pay too much attention to Dr. Vannevar Bush.

FEDERAL CIVIL DEFENSE ACT OF 1950

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4268) to authorize a Federal defense program, and for other purposes.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I have tried to keep in close touch with the hearings on the civil defense bill. I think the Senator from Tennessee who served as chairman of the Armed Services Subcommittee for this purpose and his colleagues and the staff are to be congratulated for the wisdom and sense of urgency which they have brought to their task. They have done an effective job and have met a rigorous time table.

I think that praise is also due to the National Security Resources Board; its Chairman, Mr. Symington; its acting Civil Defense Director, Mr. Wadsworth; and its legal adviser in this field, Mr. Sabin. They, too, through their recommendations, have contributed to the formulation of the bill which is now before us.

This bill is not presented to us as the embodiment of perfection. Indeed, perfection would be impossible, no matter how much time was spent in consideration, because the problem is so new and the field is so new that only concrete operating experience can tell us how the bill might later be improved.

Nevertheless, I am satisfied that this legislation is sound in principle, that it reflects the best that can be accomplished at this time, and that in the interests of national security it should be speedily approved.

I want particularly to congratulate the Civil Defense Subcommittee of the Armed Forces Committee for its accomplishment on three counts. The committee rewrote the original bill so as to place emergency powers under a separate title and so as to segregate these powers from the authority to be exercised during periods less dangerous and extraordinary than the time in which we now live. I feel that this recasting of the bill not only conduces to clarity but also helps keep the powers to be created more cleanly and effectively in line with the job that needs to be done.

Second, I want to congratulate the Civil Defense Subcommittee for its contribution in section 102 (a), which creates a Civil Defense Advisory Council. The Council can materially assist the Civil Defense Administrator and lend him both the value and the prestige of its advice. Furthermore, the Council is related to unofficial organizations without whose cooperation no sane civil defense program could succeed. I think the day will come when the Civil Defense Administrator will be grateful indeed for this provision in the bill.

In passing, incidentally, I wish to express my great satisfaction with the appointment made by President Truman as regards the top position in the existing civil defense agency created by executive order. Gov. Millard Caldwell, of Florida, is well known to all of us as an able, vigorous and public-spirited man, whose sole concern is with the security and safety of the United States.

Finally, I desire to congratulate the committee which reported out this bill for its wisdom in defining the conditions under which a civil defense emergency may be declared. It is only a recognition of objective truth to say that we are in an emergency today—a civil defense emergency, as well as other kinds of emergencies. The Soviet timetable does not appear to permit a rate of speed on our part short of our best effort.

For the sake of the record, I should like to offer several comments which I think may well form the subject of future consideration by the Congress. These comments reflect my own thinking based upon more than a year of study in the field of civil defense.

The bill makes no provision for federally organized mobile aid battalions which could move into areas so badly stricken that the State concerned and its neighboring States could not meet the emergency. The experience of World War II strongly suggests that expertly trained, full-time forces under the control of the National Government are an essential component in a realistic civil-defense program.

Second, the bill makes no provision even for limited reduction in vulnerability. A vital new defense plant could be constructed alongside an important old plant, thus making both a highly tempting target. Nothing is said about building codes that would require blast-resisting material in certain new construction. Although the spatial concentration of hospitals and fire-fighting apparatus in Hiroshima cost many lives that might otherwise have been saved, the bill is silent as to any move toward intracity dispersion of critical facilities. Nor does the bill contain language relating to the partial elimination of certain obvious "choke points"—such as telephone trunk lines concentrated in Washington, D. C., and railroad bottlenecks in Chicago. Needless to say, I am not talking about any widespread or major dispersal program. On the contrary, I would recommend powerfully against any such approach. But strictly limited steps—as simple as choosing a plant site a few miles from an existing plant rather than alongside, or locating a new hospital away from other hospitals or constructing a new office building with reinforced materials—these steps may become highly important in meeting enemy attack.

In the same connection one of the more serious dangers that confronts us relates to radio stations, television stations, newspapers, and other media of communication under conditions of enemy attack. It is quite possible that Communists are even now organized to seize a radio station when an enemy attack may occur, and to broadcast messages generating panic and chaos among the populace. An irresponsible and reckless use of communications facilities could greatly impair our capacity successfully to withstand a surprise assault. I think the gravity of this problem is apparent simply by mentioning it. The bill before us has nothing explicit to say on this score.

The authority to be conferred upon the Administrator, even so, is so immense and so rife with poverty and criticality that I think at some time the Congress will want to consider the concept of a congressional "watchdog" committee charged with continuous scrutiny of civil defense. The checks and balances established in our Constitution are liable to be thrown out of kilter unless this great increment in the power of the executive branch is associated with stepped-up activity in the legislative branch. Furthermore, the Administrator ought not to be hamstrung by excessive statutory restrictions—but the very granting of such latitude, so necessary to his urgent task, demands that elected representatives of the people keep abreast of his actions through the "watchdog" mechanism. I do not need to remind Senators that the bill provides no appeal from the Administrator's decisions, even though he may conceivably aggrieve great States and millions of people. This factor underscores the eventual need for a congressional "watchdog."

I may say in passing that the civil defense subcommittee of the Armed Services Committee, able though it is, headed as it is by the great and distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], and having among its membership the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], to whom I have paid just tribute for the work he has done, is not equipped to do this job, because the work which is pouring into that committee—and I know a little about it—is such as to inundate the committee and its staff.

In this context I must also express concern over the fact that, as between listed critical targets, no provision is made for the possible necessity of priority treatment—even though a materials shortage, for example, might require that several areas receive special attention in the interests of national survival. I therefore suggest the future possibility of furnishing the option of priority treatment in certain cases—whereby the Administrator, on written request of the Secretary of Defense, would be empowered to grant priority to certain areas on the critical target list.

In this context Senators know how thoroughly I approve the civilian control principles which underlie the bill now before us. These principles are right and indispensable. At the same time, closest connections with the military must clearly be maintained, and we may therefore wish to consider the desirability of a statutory military liaison committee.

I offer these comments for the record only. The importance of speed in passing the bill before us is so great that I do not wish to make any issue of the points I have raised. At the same time I am reasonably certain that these points will figure in future congressional deliberation concerning civil defense. Indeed, they should be and must be considered. It is my hope that the Civil Defense Administrator and the executive branch may see fit to come forward with legislative recommendations dealing with what I believe to be the important issues which are essentially omitted from the present bill.

However, I do suggest one amendment at this time. It relates to the provision that would vest in the Administrator—a man appointed from civilian life, and without military knowledge or background—almost complete and exclusive legal responsibility for rendering what in essence is a military judgment, namely, the selection of critical target areas. Moreover, since the selection of those areas is to require the allocation of hundreds of millions of dollars of Federal funds, the Administrator might well find it easier to execute the decisions made if the decisions rested not only upon his judgment of the situation, but upon the considered advice of the Secretary of Defense, who, of course, will be in consultation with the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

In the meantime, while I still leave it with the Administrator to make the final legal determination of the critical target areas, I have suggested that he be required, before he fixes these areas, to consult with the Secretary of Defense, and he in turn shall consult with the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question at that point?

Mr. McMAHON. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] that if the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McMAHON] should be adopted in its present form, it seems to me it would involve the danger of the Administrator being able to make recommendation or make his decision on critical target areas only after receiving recomemndations submitted by the Secretary of Defense, following consultation with the Joint Chiefs of Staff. That seems to me to throw the matter back into the lap of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and might very unnecessarily and excessively alarm the people of the communities where the areas are located.

I wonder if the Senator from Connecticut would not accomplish the same objective if, instead of using the word "recommendation," he would simply say "after consultation with the Secretary of Defense." That would leave out even the Joint Chiefs of Staff. What we want to do is to establish the critical target areas, so as to divide the shelters among them and provide the necessary protection, but I do not think it wise to scare unnecessarily the people in the communities affected.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I do not know how one would scare the people more than the other, but I would be glad to accept his modification of the amendment.

I ask unanimous consent that the amendment now pending be considered as stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, beginning on line 8 and continuing on line 9, to strike out "as determined by the Administrator" and substitute therefor "as determined by the Administrator after consultation with the Secretary of Defense."

Mr. SALTONSTALL. At least once every year.

Mr. McMAHON. I was somewhat intrigued by the suggestion that it would be better not to say that the Department of Defense had anything to do with the critical-target areas, because then when we became active in an area our potential enemies would know that the military considered that to be a critical area. That is the greatest venture into fantasy I ever heard of, because at least we must give the enemy credit for common sense enough to know that if we start spending a great deal of money and taking considerable precautions in a particular area it is done after consultation with the Secretary of Defense.

I may say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I have another motive in offering this amendment. Perhaps it is just as well that I state it. I look for a great many delegations to be descending on the Administrator asking that their particular areas be named critical areas, or that the critical areas he has drawn be enlarged. There will be a civil-defense activity proposed in a place—well, I had better not name any particular place, because it might be within the constituency of some Senator with respect to which it would be perfectly obvious there would be no sense in spending taxpayers' money to fortify it. So I would like to have the people know that when they come here to beat on the Civil Defense Administrator to put a shelter, we will say, in their town, he has an obligation to both himself and the Secretary of Defense. I think that will give some prestige to his decisions which might be very helpful and might save the taxpayers some money.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McMAHON. Yes.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I should like to understand the language exactly as the Senator has agreed to have his amendment modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the clerk state the language as modified.

The ASSISTANT JOURNAL CLERK. On page 12, beginning on line 8 and continuing on line 9, it is proposed to strike out "as determined by the Administrator" and substitute therefor "as determined by the Administrator after consultation at least once each year with the Secretary of Defense."

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, the language "once each year" may indicate that he is to consult only once a year.

Mr. McMAHON. I will drop the "once each year" out of the amendment because I agree with the Senator.

Mr. KEFAUVER. The language would be, "as determined by the Administrator after consultation."

Mr. McMAHON. Yes; "after consultation with the Secretary of Defense." That is its final form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the wording has been agreed to, let us have it read, so we may have it cleared up. Let the clerk state the amendment as modified.

The ASSISTANT JOURNAL CLERK. It is proposed to insert "as determined by the Administrator after consultation with the Secretary of Defense."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request that the language be so modified? The Chair hears none, and the amendment is so modified.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut has the right to modify his own amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska is correct. The amendment has been so modified.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, while we are considering this amendment I think a word or two about the legislative history would be pertinent at this point. The amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, in my opinion, is a good amendment in that it clarifies what is expected of the Administrator in selecting taget areas, that is, that he will consult with the Secretary of Defense, and he undoubtedly will consult with other officials, because there are also other considerations, but, of course, he would consult with the Secretary of Defense, and the Chiefs of Staff would be the main ones from whom he would receive information and suggestions which would be of determinative value to him in making his selection.

I think it should be pointed out that on page 64 of the hearings Mr. WADSWORTH, to whom I join the Senator in paying high tribute for the work he has done, was asked a question. I read a part of it:

> As I understand the legislation, it is your intention to utilize the military for * * * making target evaluations and supply that information to you which will then become an inherent part of your planning; isn't that correct?
> Mr. WADSWORTH. That is correct, and I would like to make another statement along that line.

Then he went on to talk about the National Security Resources Board.

At the time the bill was being marked up in the full Committee on Armed Services, the following colloquy took place:

> Senator KEFAUVER. May I call your attention to this fact, Senator SALTONSTALL, that the maps of the critical areas as gotten up by the Administrator have been sent to the Governors of all of the States. I believe there has not been one complaint about the selections made.
> Senator RUSSELL. Did he get them up or did the Joint Chiefs get them up? When you start bringing the Joint Chiefs in, of course, that is bringing in strictly the military.

Senator KEFAUVER. How were they gotten up, Mr. WADSWORTH?

Mr. WADSWORTH. They were gotten up after consultation with other agencies, including the Joint Chiefs. The list of the Joint Chiefs was only critical military installations. We had to add some on the population basis.

Then he proceded with his testimony.

With respect to the proposal of the Senator from Connecticut not to put the burden on the Joint Chiefs, in the first place, we do not want to get the military into that part of the picture. In the second place, it would result in an inordinate burden if civilians and Governors and mayors were to feel that on this matter they had to come here and have consultation with the Secretary of Defense and the Joint Chiefs of Staff. There are other considerations. But I think the way the Senator from Connecticut has the language now drawn, which follows what they have already done in listing the critical areas, and their intent for the activities in the future, the provision is clarified, and does give direction as to what will be done. And I think it will lessen some of the pressure on the Administrator.

So, Mr. President, on behalf of the committee, I very happily recommend that the Senate adopt the Senator's amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, as modified. Without objection, the amendment as modified is agreed to.

Mr. McMAHON. I thank the Senator from Tennessee. I think both of us have accomplished our objectives. I want the local delegations, whom we wish to keep from bothering the Joint Chiefs of Staff, to realize that there is a necessity for the Administrator to go into very serious consultation with the Secretary of Defense, and that he simply cannot reach down and parcel out $100,000,000 for this shelter or that shelter.

Mr. President, I shall close by again making a reference to the recent address delivered by the ex-President of the United States, who assured the American people that if they would just withdraw to this continent and wait for a break they could balance the budget; that is the promise he held out to them. Mr. President, if we follow that advice—and let me interpolate that Mr. Hoover must have been looking at a flat map, instead of a globe, when he reached that conclusion—we shall spend three times as much on civil defense in the United States in the next decade as we propose to spend in protecting our security by keeping our word and retaining our allies. If we really wish to bankrupt the Nation in implementing this bill and in digging holes in the ground all over America, we should adopt the thesis of the ex-President for the defense of our Nation.

Mr. President, there never has been a piece of legislation which should be put into effect any quicker than that now pending. There are things which urgently need to be done, and we shall not be true to the best interests of the security of our people if we delay unnecessarily a moment.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McMAHON. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I think all Members of the Senate are in total agreement with the statement made by the Senator from Connecticut about the necessity of enacting civil defense legislation. However, the final disposition of this measure depends upon how it will be handled in conference. I did not quite understand all the Senator said. I have been trying to arrange for some sort of recess or adjournment which will be agreeable to all Senators. I ask this question because I am interested in having constructive action taken: Does the Senator have in mind anything except the present plans about which we have been talking, or does the Senator believe we should remain here until the conference report on this particular measure is ready and until we take final action on it?

Mr. McMAHON. This morning I talked to the Senator from Nebraska, and I know what his disposition is. However, I have not heard of the result of his efforts to obtain an agreement to vote on the conference report on this measure during this Congress. Can the Senator inform me about that?

Mr. WHERRY. I think we are ready to report. I have contacted Members on both sides of the aisle, and I believe arrangements can be effected so that action will be taken on the conference report on this measure before the present Congress terminates. However, that probably will not be done until the 1st or 2d day of January.

I wonder whether the Senator from Connecticut has in mind anything different, relative to having the Senate take speedier action than that.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I do not anticipate that we could obtain quicker action than that on the conference report. Certainly I do not wish the present Congress to expire and have this measure die.

Mr. WHERRY. Yes.

Mr. McMAHON. Because then we shall have a new Congress and there will be new committees, and it will be necessary to go through the hearings on this measure again; and that would delay getting these procedures under way. Of course, they should be gotten under way promptly.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me again?

Mr. McMAHON. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Let me say that I now have a complete understanding of the observations and judgment of the Senator from Connecticut in regard to the handling of the conference report, and I believe it can be worked out accordingly.

Mr. McMAHON. Yes; anything which can be done to assure that this measure and the conference report on it will not die will be quite satisfactory to me.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I desire to associate myself with the remarks which were made earlier today by the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. LEHMAN] in dealing with the peculiar and distressing problems of the major large cities of the United States in connection with civil defense. It is well known that the chief targets will be cities such as New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Detroit, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Cincinnati, and so forth, and that the need is concentrated primarily in those cities. The acquisition costs for shelters will be high. The cities already are in great financial difficulties. I hope it will be possible to make arrangements whereby the Federal Government's share of the appropriations for these major cities will be greater than will be the case on the average for the country as a whole.

I also hope that arrangements may be made so that the Federal Government will deal directly with these cities, and will not be compelled in each instance to proceed through the States. I hope all these problems may be worked out.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I call up my amendment to the civil defense bill, and ask to have it stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPARKMAN in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 24, it is proposed to strike out line 1 and to insert in lieu thereof the following: "have been conducted by the Civil Service Commission and a report thereon shall have been evaluated by the Administrator. In the event such full field investigation by the Civil Service Commission develops any data reflecting that such applicant for a position of critical importance is of questionable loyalty or reliability for security purposes, the investigation will be discontinued, referred to the Administrator for evaluation whereupon the Administrator may refer such data to the Federal Bureau of Investigation to conduct a full field investigation. The results of such latter investigation by the FBI shall be furnished to the Administrator for his action."

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, there are now in the bill provisions for handling the security angle. The amendment I now offer will, however, clarify those provisions; it is a little more specific in regard to carrying them out.

I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Tennessee whether he will accept the amendment.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I should like to make a brief statement before accepting the amendment, so that the position of the Administrator and the process through which this matter has gone, in order to reach the point where the Senator from New Hampshire has presented his amendment, can be clearly understood.

The bill as originally presented by the Administrator and as originally introduced in the Senate and in the House of Representatives provided that all Federal employees having to do with civil defense would have to be individually checked by the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Section 409 of the bill, on page 27, also provides that everyone working for the Atomic Energy Commission will have to be checked, just the same as is now required.

During the hearings on the bill, as appears beginning on page 118, Mr. Cozier, representing the Department of Justice and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, came before the committee and said, in substance, that the work of the FBI had been so greatly increased by various laws which have been enacted that over a period of 3 months, for instance, the pending work of the FBI had been increased to the almost incredible extent of 63 percent, and that during that period the work assigned to investigative personnel had increased the workload per agent about 54 percent. He says that the personnel of the FBI was already on a 6-day week, and that it simply could not assume the responsibilities set forth in this bill.

Following that, we had a consultation with Mr. Caldwell, who feels that everyone ought to be screened; with Mr. Wadsworth and with Mr. Cozier; and the language which now appears in section 403 was agreed upon, which provides that employees shall go through the usual civil-service investigation, that the files of the FBI and other investigative agencies of the Government shall be checked, and that if anything shows up in any of those the FBI shall make an investigation, but that the FBI shall make an individual check of such employees who shall occupy "any position determined by the Administrator to be of critical importance from the standpoint of national security." Mr. Nichols and others of the FBI have informed the chairman of the subcommittee and the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire that even as it is, this gives them a workload which they simply cannot assume. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether that is correct?

Mr. BRIDGES. That is correct.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I am not very happy about agreeing to this amendment because I should like to see as many of the employees checked by the FBI as is humanly possible. But I am sure that, with the excellent Administrator we have, if there is any question at all about them from any source, or if he has any doubt about them whatever, he will exercise the right which he has under the Senator's amendment to require the FBI to make an individual check, and that is in addition to anything that may show up in a civil-service examination. So in order to try to satisfy the necessities of the situation in the FBI, I am willing to accept the amendment and take it to conference; but I want to say to the Senator from New Hampshire I hope that in conference, if the House does not agree to the amendment, we may find some method whereby we may obtain a little bit more in the way of a check than is provided for by the Senator's amendment; but I think this is the best we can do at the present time. So, Mr. President, I accept the Senator's amendment.

Mr. BRIDGES. I thank the distinguished Senator from Tennessee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] is agreed to.

The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, my colleagues, the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Florida, are about to draft certain language regarding a matter which pertains to the question of when the emergency powers go into operation, which is one of the vital points of this bill.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 15, it is proposed to strike out the word "the" in line 10, and all of lines 11 to 22, inclusive, and insert:

(a) The existence of such emergency may be proclaimed by the President or by concurrent resolution of the Congress, if the President in such proclamation, or the Congress in such resolution finds that there is imminent danger of an attack on the United States (as defined in paragraph (f) of section 3 hereof) by bombing or otherwise and that the national safety therefore requires the invocation of the provisions of this title. Any such proclamation of the President shall only be issued after he transmits notice of his intention to the Armed Services Committees of the Congress.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, as has already been stated, there has been some informal discussion of this particular provision of the bill, and I hope that the settlement of this question, as worked out by the Senator from Ohio, the Senator from Tennessee, the Senator from Massachusetts, and the Senator from Florida, will prove acceptable to the Senate. It is agreed, as a matter of general procedure that the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio is wisely designed to prevent any general resort to the powers of this act on an emergency basis. It is agreed that there should be no power to resort to the provisions of this act in general throughout the United States, its Territories and possessions, except after Presidential proclamation based upon the stated conditions or the enactment of a concurrent resolution of the Congress, either of which would secure the widest possible publicity to the action taken. However, I think it is agreed, at least among the four Senators, whom I have just mentioned, that it is entirely conceivable that there may be great danger evident as to an exposed area or even areas of the United States, as defined in this bill, which includes the Territories and possessions, which danger may not be established with such certainty, or may not exist on such a clear scale as to require or justify at that particular time, the invoking of emergency operation of this law by either of the two methods just mentioned; that is, by Presidential proclamation, which will call into existence all of these emergency powers throughout the Nation, or the passage of a concurrent resolution by the Congress, which would create the same result.

However, the danger might be so imminent in the exposed area or areas, as, for instance, in Alaska, Hawaii, or at the Canal Zone, or at other places which might be suggested, that it might be apparent that ordinary wisdom would require the creation of such a situation that these emergency powers could be quickly utilized in the threatened areas; as, for instance, by making available, to the civilian defense authorities in that particular area, of all of the transportation facilities owned by all the branches of the United States Government in that particular area, or by making available all the medical supplies, or by turning over all of the supplies of gasoline or of various other substances which can be thought of, which would have a direct bearing upon the ability of the civilian defense agencies there immediately to assist the civilian population to survive an attack, if such an attack should eventuate.

And so this proposed language has been drawn, and I hope it will prove sufficient. It is thought that by this language the giving of the power to the President to invoke the emergency powers under title III and to furnish the rights to the civilian defense authorities which are given only by title III, without a Nation-wide proclamation or without the enactment of a concurrent resolution here, shall be confined to the exposed area or areas on the perimeter of our system. We believe that this amendment so confines it and so localizes any occasion in which these emergency powers would be utilized, without general proclamation or without the passage of a concurrent resolution.

My proposed amendment, therefore, would read:

(b) Such an emergency shall exist, as to a localized area or areas only, when the President determines that the national safety requires the invocation of the provisions of this title as to any exposed area or areas of the United States, and, after transmitting notice of such determination to the Armed Services Committees of the Congress, directs the Administrator to proceed pursuant to the provisions of this title, as to such exposed area or areas of the United States, but not elsewhere.

Mr. President, I offer this as an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I intend to accept the amendment of the Senator from Florida, but I merely want to say a word as to the reason for the amendment.

On page 15 the committee very wisely has separated the general establishment of the defense organization in the entire bill into two groups of power, namely, one power that should go into effect at once so the whole thing can be organized; the other, the rather extraordinary power that would be exercised in the event of an actual attack on the United States.

The committee has done an excellent job in dividing those powers. I think the powers in the second part of the bill are not too great for an emergency, but I feel that under the language of the bill the manner of stepping into this emergency is almost too easy. Emergencies nowadays come pretty cheap, and already one of the requirements is that the President may declare the existence of a state of civil-defense emergency only under certain conditions, one of them being a declaration of war and the other the existence of a national emergency declared by the President. We already have that. So that part of the bill is already obsolete.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I have read the amendment of the Senator from Ohio and I hope the distinguished Senator from Tennessee will accept it. However, I invite the attention of the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Tennessee to the use of the word "imminent." The House bill uses the words "in the event of an enemy attack," which might be all over before we knew about it, or "the anticipation of an imminent enemy attack."

The distinguished Senator from Ohio also uses the word "imminent." That is the only word in his amendment to which I would call especial attention, having in mind whether there is not some other word that would apply a little more clearly to the problem we are trying to solve. Something that is imminent can be right now, or it can be a few hours from now; and yet an attack may come very suddenly and we might know nothing about it except through the CIA, or something else.

Mr. TAFT. I do not happen to think of any other word at the moment. I do not think the emergency powers should go into affect in the entire Nation and suspend all rules regarding contracts and a great many other things unless someone is willing to say that an attack is imminent. If he is willing to say that, and is a responsible person, I do not think we should wait until the bomb falls. I think we must leave that question to someone. One might be willing to say that an attack is imminent when the statement is not quite true. But I cannot think of any better word at the moment. If the Senator has one in mind, I shall be glad to consider it.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I speak only for myself and not for the Senator from Tennessee. I think the word used by the Senator is better perhaps than any other.

Mr. TAFT. The Senator from Florida says, in general effect, that he agrees to that proposition. We should not allow these powers to be suspended everywhere until there is some imminent danger of attack. But he points out that there may be localized areas in Alaska, or elsewhere, throughout all the possessions of the United States, where it might be desirable, if such a state of emergency exists, not to commit the entire Nation to the suspension of all ordinary safeguards over the powers of the Executive. So the Senator from Florida has offered an amendment which seems to me to be entirely proper.

I would suggest that he might change the words in the first part as well as in the last line. Otherwise, I am glad to accept the amendment of the Senator from Florida and to modify my amendment to include his amendment immediately following the end of my amendment.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, with reference to the legislative history of this matter, I desire to say a few words.

First, it was determined by both committees to try to separate the regular powers from the emergency powers, and, of course, to put into effect only the great emergency powers in the event that it becomes absolutely necessary for the protection of the country. In section 301 of the House bill it is provided that in the event of an enemy attack or the anticipation of an enemy attack, the President may proclaim an actual emergency for civil defense purposes.

The Senate bill provides, in section 301, that upon a declaration of war, or upon a declaration of a national emergency by the President, or by concurrent resolution of the Congress, certain things shall be done. If those things, or any one of them, should happen, the President may declare a civil defense emergency. The Congress may be asked to declare war, but that would not automatically put into effect the provisions of the bill, because the emergency might be in some remote place, and it might not be so substantial that we would want to have the great powers given the Administrator put into effect. Even after the declaration of an emergency such as the one which the President proclaimed recently, he might not necessarily put into effect the provisions of this bill.

Those are two of the ways in which this bill could be placed in operation.

The Administrator was particularly anxious that we write some section similar to subsection (c). A situation might arise in an area of the United States, including the Territories, but the Administrator might not want to alarm the whole country as it would be alarmed by a declaration of war or by the declaration of a complete civil-defense emergency. The Administrator and the President might not want to give information which would be of value to the enemy by making a proclamation that we had information that the enemy was massing for an attack, for instance, on one of the Hawaiian islands.

It was provided in subsection (c) that when the President determines that the national safety requires it, the provisions of the act may be put into effect by transmitting notices to the Committees on Armed Services, and directing the Administrator to proceed.

The subject was discussed in the full committee, and the subcommittee was authorized to try to draft language that would not be quite so broad as the language of subsection (c). I think the language which has been worked out by the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], the distinguished Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND], the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL], and other Senators is an improvement.

I should like to make it clear that we do not concur in the feeling that an attack may be localized. It is very difficult, of course, to tell where it might come. So that under the language "area or areas" the President may have a right to declare a civil-defense emergency, under the latter part of the section, in a substantial area and not merely in some little island or some particular section. I understand that is the intention of the authors of the amendment.

Furthermore, Mr. President, I do not understand that the language requires that the President make a public declaration that the provisions of the act are being put into effect as to a particular area or areas, without doing it as to the whole United States. I wonder if there is any disagreement on that point. I think it would be unfortunate, in some circumstances, if the President had to make a public declaration in order to put into effect civil-defense powers in some remote territory.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, the understanding of the Senator from Florida in offering his amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio was that under that particular provision, that third method of invoking, in some threatened area or areas only, the emergency provisions of the act, the amendment would not require any public proclamation by the President, but, instead, it was built upon the thought that it is quite conceivable that the warning of a threatened attack may not be later actually realized and that the situation may not justify either the expense of the national confusion, excitement, and apprehension which would result from a public proclamation either throughout the Nation or at any point in the Nation. We felt that, under that last provision, the President could proceed effectively after having made his determination and after having advised the Armed Services Committees of Congress, without any further conditions being placed upon his invoking, in that specific area only, the emergency powers of the proposed act. Is that the answer the Senator desires?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I am very glad to have the answer of the Senator from Florida. I think the legislative record should show what the sponsor of the amendment to the amendment has in mind.

Mr. HOLLAND. I should like to invite comment from the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL].

Mr. TAFT. I agree fully with what the Senator from Florida has stated. I understood that to be one of the purposes of his amendment.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I believe also that all of us are clear as to the meaning of "imminent." Some of us may have wanted to use a stronger word, and apparently we could not agree on a weaker word.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I brought up that question so, if the word were changed in conference, the Senator from Ohio would be on guard, so to speak.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I am certain that we all realize, in this atomic age, with airplanes able to fly through the air at such tremendous rates of speed, that the word "imminent" would not necessarily mean that an attack would have to be on the way before the proclamation could be made, but would include reasonable grounds for believing that preparations were being made with the intent to bring about an attack on the United States.

Mr. President, with that explanation of the amendment, as modified, I think we have brought about an improvement in the language of the section, and have brought it nearer to what the Armed Services Committee wanted to do. I am deeply grateful to the Senators for the thought they have given and the work they have done on this most difficult point in the entire bill. I accept the amendment as modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], as modified by the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND].

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

TRIBUTE TO MILLARD F. CALDWELL ON APPOINTMENT AS ADMINISTRATOR OF CIVILIAN DEFENSE

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I do not want the occasion to pass without expressing my very great appreciation of the comments made by the distinguished Senator from Connecticut a few minutes ago in complimenting the President of the United States upon his selection of a person to serve as Administrator of Civilian Defense. The person who was chosen, of course, is a very distinguished Floridian and a former Governor of Florida, Millard F. Caldwell. I wish the RECORD to show that, speaking for the people of Florida, we are grateful for the selection of one of our outstanding citizens to carry this heavy load of responsibility on behalf of our Nation, and we are grateful, also, to the Senator from Connecticut for his gracious remarks. Because of his essentially high character and his great and proven executive ability, because of his distinguished career for 8 years as a Member of the House of Representatives, and his outstanding service for 4 years as Governor of Florida, during which time he was honored by his fellow governors by being chosen to serve as president of the National Governors' Conference, it seems to the people of Florida that the selection of Governor Caldwell is peculiarly fitting, and that his service should demonstrate again his executive ability, as well as his ability to work cordially with the Congress of the United States and the governors of the several States in a position which will certainly require sympathetic and cooperative action on the part of both Congress and the governors of the respective States. I again thank the Senator from Connecticut.

FEDERAL CIVIL DEFENSE ACT OF 1950

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4268) to authorize a Federal defense program, and for other purposes.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the end of the bill it is proposed to insert:

SEC. . After June 30, 1953, or after the date of the passage of a concurrent resolution by the Congress which declares that the powers conferred on the Administrator under the provisions of this act are no longer necessary, whichever shall first occur, none of the functions authorized under such provisions may be exercised.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, the House bill contains the provision set forth in my amendment, except that the date is June 30, 1954, instead of 1953. In this time of emergency, when we are asked to enact a great deal of legislation which is not desirable in ordinary times, I think it is very wise, if we can do so, to establish a precedent by which a date termination is put on the various powers which we grant. The Committee on Finance has placed a date termination on the excess-profits tax, as an emergency tax. I think the date finally agreed upon with the House is July 1, 1953. It seems to me in the case of this bill that this is the proper time to fix a termination date, and that we should set the time for 2 years. The Eighty-third Congress will then have an opportunity during the first 6 months to extend the powers if it wishes to do so. Of course, if the emergency continues no doubt they will extend the powers. However, I think it is very important that the proponents of a continuation of emergency powers shall bear the burden of proof, instead of having the burden carried by those who wish to repeal emergency powers, after an emergency has passed.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I regret exceedingly to do so, but, representing the committee, I must very vigorously oppose the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio. In the first place, Congress at any time by the passage of a bill can terminate the legislation. It is no more possible to build up civil defense establishments on an interim basis than it is possible to build up our Military Establishment on an interim basis. The reason why the pending bill has been separated into three sections covering a long range of governmental powers, with emergency power granted in only one section, is to have established on a permanent basis a skeleton organization which could be activated at any time over the years when the situation demanded it. Of course, it is contemplated that Congress at any time could either repeal the legislation, or the Committee on Appropriations could reduce the appropriations, and thus reduce the size of the organization. At least, the organizational administration and the functions should be kept on a permanent basis, so that the organization would be ready to be activated in the event we entered another period of cold or active war or difficulty with another nation. The whole bill, with the exception of section 3, is based upon and written with the idea that it would be in effect until Congress terminated the act, as Congress has already terminated other war powers during recent years, but that we would set up a permanent organization to be used if necessity called for it.

In the first place, Mr. President, the bill allows the States to make compacts which are based, and intended to be based, on a long-range basis. The stockpiling of materials, the training of personnel, and all that sort of thing are expected to be on a permanent basis.

Furthermore, Mr. President, we could hardly ask the cities and States to put up the amount of money which would be necessary under this legislation in order to do a first-class job and to get personnel of the caliber necessary to carry on in a satisfactory manner, if it were known that in any event this activity would be terminated June 30, 1953.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I should like to ask the Senator a question. If an emergency should exist in 1953, 6 months prior to the date set by the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, does the Senator from Tennessee have any idea that Congress would be reluctant to continue the law?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Not at all; but neither do I have any question that if we were at a time of complete peace and did not need the stand-by provisions of the law, the permanent provisions, Congress would repeal the act.

Mr. CHAVEZ. It is simply a matter of opinion. My inclination is to go along with the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, because if an emergency should arise I am positive that Congress would continue the law. If there were no emergency, and the law should be repealed entirely, there is no reason why that should not be done. There is no reason why we should not say that it should end in 1953. Of course, it is a matter for argument. Personally I do not like to give continuing or perpetual power to any agency of the Government.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, we do not wait to build our fire departments until we think there may be someone in town who is going to set fire to a building. We do not wait to start legislation about the hoof-and-mouth disease until after the disease becomes prevalent. We try to prevent the spread of the disease.

I should point out also that the pending legislation has not been conceived as emergency legislation, for only this period. The National Resources Security Board, under the chairmanship of a very able and distinguished public servant, Mr. Symington, started consideration of this program a year and a half or two years ago. Perhaps at that time the Board was under the chairmanship of someone else. This question was under study for a long time before the situation became more critical during the past 3 or 4 months. The so-called Hopley board was appointed, of which Mr. Hopley, who passed away recently, was chairman. It made an investigation and recommendations concerning civilian defense. That study started several years ago, before any immediate emergency arose. The Atomic Energy Committee has also been considering the subject.

At this time we are living in a world of emergencies. I think there is no reasonable expectation that by 1953 we shall have reached the period when we shall not need to have on the books at least the framework for the organization proposed by this bill. The fact that we are determined to keep the framework of the organization until such time as there is peace in the world may have some little persuasive value among those with whom we are in disagreement today. It may tend to persuade them that we are ready to go all the way, and are going to present our cause and protect our people so long as those with whom we are in disagreement want to upset the peace of the world.

Mr. President, the British tried the very thing which has been recommended by the Senator from Ohio. At the end of the war they had a fine civilian-defense organization, one of the most remarkable in the history of the world. The Armed Services Committee and the Atomic Energy Committee had the benefit of the studies which had been made, and what had been done by the British in connection with civilian defense.

After the cessation of hostilities the British abandoned the civil defense organization, together with its facilities. The personnel were completely dispersed. They left no organization around which to build when they started again, sometime before we did. They had to go through the task of reorganizing. They had to spend a great deal of money to rehabilitate facilities which they could have maintained over a period of years. I know that the British feel that it would have been much more in the public interest of their nation if they had had at least some kind of an organization to build around, and if they had not let everything be dispersed.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. As a member of the committee, I know that this subject was discussed in the committee room. After some discussion the provision referred to was left out of the bill as it was reported.

I invite the Senator's attention to a fact I am sure he knows, namely, that the House bill has a provision, section 412, which ends the act after June 30, 1954. In accelerating the discussion, and perhaps getting the matter into conference, I wonder how the Senator would feel if the amendment of the Senator from Ohio were offered to the emergency title only. I can see a great deal of argument along the lines which the Senator is discussing, in favor of continuing the permanent organization. I can see also what the Senator from Ohio means about giving Congress an opportunity to review the emergency powers and making the Administrator sell the arguments in favor of those powers, rather than the other way around. I wonder how a suggestion of that character, for the purpose of taking the entire question to conference, would appeal to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts. With the House providing that the act shall cease after June 30, 1954, and in view of the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts to apply the House provision to title III of the bill, the emergency section, there may be a very good opportunity for a compromise in the conference. But if we were to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Ohio we would not have anything upon which to compromise, except that the termination date would be somewhere between 1953 and 1954. I would very much prefer that the bill not have a termination date. However, I would recommend to the conferees that we agree upon the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts as a compromise of the difficulty.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I feel that I am right. However, I do not wish to delay the bill at this point.

In view of the statement of the Senator from Tennessee that he will follow in conference the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts and attach the suggested date to the emergency sections, I withdraw my amendment.

What I picture is this: We are setting up a new Federal department, with an Administrator at a salary of $17,500 a year and a Deputy Administrator at a salary of $16,000 a year. There will be 5,000 employees before one can say "Jack Robinson." This activity is going down through the halls of time with another Federal department. If I were sure that there would never be more than a dozen people doing a little planning, I would not object. But I think it is a mistake to set up a permanent bureau. I hope that the Senate conferees may agree to the House provision as it is.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Why is the Senator withdrawing his amendment?

Mr. TAFT. I have tried to reach an agreement with the Senator from Tennessee on other questions. He has been most reasonable. I do not want to press this matter to a knock-down and drag-out vote.

Mr. WHERRY. As one who listened to the debate, I was deeply impressed by the attempt that was being made by the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Florida to have accepted what I thought was a very constructive amendment. I am wondering what is the serious objection to the amendment. If the Senator from Tennessee is willing to take it to conference, just what is wrong with it?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I gladly accepted the amendment prepared by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], and the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND].

Mr. WHERRY. I beg the Senator's pardon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment has been adopted.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Senator for that statement. I was called off the floor in an endeavor to try to work out a unanimous-consent agreement. When I left the amendment to which I have just referred was under consideration. I felt that it was a very constructive amendment, and I am glad to hear that it has been adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio has withdrawn his latest amendment.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I now offer an amendment for the purpose of raising a point and asking the Senator from Tennessee a question about it. I think I can withdraw it in time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 27 at the end of line 9, it is proposed to insert:

It is intended that the powers granted by this section shall only be used to finance projects deemed by the Corporation to be self-liquidating in not more than 50 years.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, the report of the committee states very clearly that the power of the RFC to lend money up to $250,000,000 is intended to be used only for self-liquidating projects, garages or other arrangements that may pay out the expense. But I did not find that statement in the bill itself when I read the bill. So I suggest the amendment. The Senator from Tennessee has told me that even without the amendment, under the RFC law loans can only be made which are in fact considered by them to be sound, and therefore, self-liquidating in one way or another.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, section 4 (a) (3) of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation law provides that no loan shall be made unless there is a reasonable possibility of repayment and collecting the loans, unless they are sound investments, and so forth. That is not affected by this provision. The RFC still goes through its normal loaning activities, and requires the same security as is required under section 4 (a) (3) of the law, the only thing being that it may amortize investment for 50 years on civilian defense projects instead of 40 years as ordinarily provided in the RFC law. The hearings and everything we have had in the RECORD show that the intention expressed by the Senator is what the RFC would carry out.

Mr. TAFT. So the only purpose of the section, as I understand it, is set forth on page 7 of the committee report where it is stated:

These self-liquidating projects might require Federal financing. Accordingly, the bill authorizes the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans for such purpose.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes. At the bottom of page 12 of the report, the Senator will find this reference to section 408:

This section is aimed in encouraging the development of self-liquidating projects to provide civil defense facilities, including shelters, utilities, hospitals, and so forth. It merely modifies existing law to permit the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to grant loans for such purposes with a maturity period of 50 years instead of 40 years as contained in present law.

Mr. TAFT. In view of the statement of the Senator from Tennessee, Mr. President, I withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio has withdrawn his amendment.

The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, the Senate is now considering Senate bill 4268, to authorize a Federal civil defense program, and for other purposes.

Mr. President, I draw the Senate's attention to some startling provisions in the bill. I refer to page 19, section 304:

SEC. 304. During the period of such emergency, neither the Federal Government nor, except in cases of willful misconduct, gross negligence, or bad faith, any officer or employee thereof while complying with or attempting to comply with any provision of this act or of any rule, regulation, or order issued pursuant to this act shall be liable to any person, whether or not such person is engaged in civil defense, for death, injury, or property damage resulting therefrom.

Mr. President, I challenge the constitutionality of that provision. It takes from individuals the right of action against other individuals. I doubt not only the advisability but I challenge the constitutionality of it. And remember that the next section below, section 305, is as follows:

SEC. 305. During the period of such emergency, the functions and duties exercised under this act shall be excluded from the operation of the Administrative Procedure Act (60 Stat. 237), except as to the requirements of section 3 thereof.

Mr. President, the individual is thereby deprived of the Administrative Procedure Act. We are setting aside the Administrative Procedure Act. There is not a scintilla in the bill which provides for tort action at all. What is more, by the language of section 304, which I just read, an individual is deprived of the right to sue when, as a matter of fact, his property rights may be involved in a case. I do not think the bill should receive the sanction of the Senate in its present form, and I hope it may not be considered. This is the first time these provisions have been brought to my attention. I think the bill should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary for a review of the whole bill.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, the Senator will observe that section 304 comes into operation only during time of great national emergency when it is necessary to protect the lives of our people through the civilian defense.

Mr. McCARRAN. We are in an emergency now, Mr. President.

Mr. KEFAUVER. We are not in the kind of emergency, I say with due respect to the Senator from Nevada, that action would have to be taken in the event we put into operation the emergency powers of this section. An attack would have to be imminent. During a time of attack I think the federal tort claim law, which was in the Legislative Reorganization Act, would have to be waived, if the employees of the Federal Government, under some circumstances, were going to be able to do a good job. The substance of section 304 is the waiver of the Federal Tort Claim Act. We discussed the matter at great length in committee and decided that during such a time as this, except in cases of bad faith, gross negligence, or willful misconduct—that is if they are following the instructions given them in the absence of those three things—the Federal Government should not assume the responsibility it has under the Federal Tort Claim Act. That act, of course, is supposed to be in operation during normal times and covering normal operations of the Government.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. The emergency authority is granted under title III, is it not?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes.

Mr. WHERRY. It is provided there that—

The existence of such emergency may be proclaimed by the President—

(a) Upon a declaration of war by the Congress;

(b) Upon the declaration of the existence of a national emergency by the President or by concurrent resolution of the Congress.

And then follows the third contingency.

Has the provision with respect to the second contingency been amended?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes; by the Taft-Holland-Saltonstall amendment.

Mr. WHERRY. What is the language?

Mr. KEFAUVER. The language in substance is "in case of imminent danger of attack."

Mr. WHERRY. So that in answer to the observation raised by the distinguished Senator from Nevada the provision still would be:

Upon a declaration of war by the Congress;

(b) Upon the declaration of the existence of a national emergency—

But now it is amended to make it only operative in case of imminent national emergency.

What is the difference between a national emergency and an imminent national emergency?

Mr. KEFAUVER. The words are "in case of imminent danger of attack."

Mr. WHERRY. For the purposes of the RECORD, what is the difference between that and subsection (b), as it now stands?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I may say to the Senator that a mere declaration of war does not put this emergency authority into operation; there still must be imminent danger of attack.

Mr. WHERRY. Do all three of the stated conditions have to exist before the emergency authority will go into operation?

Mr. KEFAUVER. No; the idea is that we might be at war and still might not put it into operation.

Mr. WHERRY. I wished the Senator to answer that question along with the question I already have asked.

At the present time a national emergency has already been declared.

Mr. KEFAUVER. But this emergency authority does not go into effect with the declaration of a national emergency.

Mr. WHERRY. But it would, as originally intended, would it not?

Mr. KEFAUVER. No.

Mr. WHERRY. I mean to say that the original provisions of the bill, under subsections (a), (b), and (c) were that the emergency authority would go into effect upon the declaration of a national emergency. Is that not correct?

Mr. KEFAUVER. No; the Senator must read lines 8 and 9, to see what kind of national emergency is referred to in the bill. I read two lines of section 301:

The provisions of this title shall be operative only during the existence of a state of civil defense emergency.

That is the kind of emergency referred to in subsection (b).

Mr. WHERRY. Beginning in line 11, on page 15, in section 301, we find these words:

Existence of such emergency may be proclaimed by the President—

(a) upon a declaration of war by the Congress;

(b) upon the declaration of the existence of a national emergency by the President or by concurrent resolution of the Congress; or

(c) at any time when the President determines that the national safety requires the invocation of the provisions of this title and, after transmitting notice of such determination to the Armed Services Committees of the Congress, directs the Administrator to proceed pursuant to the provisions of this title—

And so forth and so on. Now subsection (b) has been amended has it not?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes; both subsection (b) and subsection (c) have been stricken out.

Mr. WHERRY. And new language has been inserted has it not?

Mr. KEFAUVER. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] discussed that.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, if the Senator will read the new language, I believe he will find it covers the point he has in mind.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to have that langauge read into the RECORD at this point.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Very well; I shall be glad to have the Senator from Massachusetts do so.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. The language proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] and the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND], which was accepted by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] as an amendment, reads as follows:

(a) The existence of such emergency may be proclaimed by the President or by concurrent resolution of the Congress if the President in such proclamation or the Congress in such resolution finds that there is imminent danger of attack on the United States (as defined in paragraph (f) of section 3 hereof) by bombing or otherwise and that the national safety therefore requires the invocation of the provisions of this title. Any such proclamation of the President shall only be issued after he transmits notice of his intention to the Armed Services Committees of the Congress.

That is subsection (a).

Then the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] proposed an addition to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], and it also was accepted, in the form of a new subsection (b), which reads as follows:

(b) Such an emergency shall exist, for a localized area or areas only, when the President determines that the national safety requires the invocation of the provisions of this title as to any exposed area or areas of the United States and, after transmitting notice of such determination to the Armed Services Committees of the Congress, directs the Administrator to proceed pursuant to the provisions of this title as to such exposed area or areas of the United States, but not elsewhere.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I would as soon ask the question of my colleague, the Senator from Massachusetts, now that he has explained the amendment.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. That amendment puts the question of an emergency in a different category, I agree.

Let me ask this question: How is immunity from suit handled under the Holland amendment, since it relates to a localized emergency, as I understand? The Holland amendment reduces the emergency to local areas, first, and then—if necessary—deals with a national emergency. Is that correct?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Under the Holland amendment, if an attack on Pearl Harbor were imminent, and the President did not want to set this machinery into operation for the entire United States, he could apply the emergency powers to that particular area.

Mr. WHERRY. Then would immunity from suit apply only to that area?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes; then it would apply only to that area.

Mr. WHERRY. I understand.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, if I may answer a further observation of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], let me say, in regard to the section about which he spoke, that the Administrative Procedure Act, which he said would be waived in time of great emergency, provides for the orderly system of procedure, by means of allowing witnesses to be present, for instance. That provision and the other provisions which have been included in the Administrative Procedure Act can be complied with really only during normal times, but not during the kind of situation we are discussing in connection with the pending measure. I refer also to findings of fact, the right of appeal, and so forth, as set forth in the Administrative Procedure Act.

Our country got along without any Administrative Procedure Act at all until about 1946, as I recall; I think that is when the Administrative Procedure Act was passed.

Certainly during a time of great emergency, as is contemplated in connection with the pending measure, we should not apply the Administrative Procedure Act to things which may be done by the Administrator of the act now proposed or by his employees.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, I have been hopeful that this bill would not reach a vote today. It is a very important piece of proposed legislation. It is more sweeping in its terms than any which ever before has come to my attention. There are questions in my mind in reference to this measure.

Frankly, Mr. President, it contains provisions which I simply do not understand.

For instance, I call attention to the provision the Senator from Nevada discussed a moment ago, namely, that in regard to immunity from suit. I think I understand what was intended or what is intended by that provision; yet I wonder whether that will be its effect when it is placed in effect and is construed.

That section begins as follows:

SEC. 304. During the period of such emergency, neither the Federal Government nor, except in cases of willful misconduct, gross negligence, or bad faith, any officer or employee—

And so forth, under certain conditions—shall be liable to any person, whether or not such person is engaged in civil defense, for death, injury, or property damage resulting therefrom.

I wonder whether that immunity is one which will be dissolved when the emergency is dissolved. That is one question.

I wish to ask several questions, and then I hope I may hear at length from the Senator from Tennessee in regard to some of the questions which are in my mind.

I also wonder about the provision in the bill with respect to the powers under title III; I refer to the emergency powers provided in section 303. I do not know whether any amendment has been made to that part of the bill, for I have been off the floor. The section in question, as it appears in the printed copy of the bill, reads as follows:

SEC. 303. During the period of such emergency—

I interpolate to say that means as civil defense emergency, as distinct from any other—the Administrator is authorized to—

(a) Exercise the authority contained in section 201 (h) without regard to the limitation of any existing law, including—

Then certain specified laws are listed. That provision would appear to me to nullify every law on the statute books that protects the right of property. Section 201 (h) is the provision which gives to the Administrator the right to acquire property. It provides that he may acquire property by condemnation or otherwise. Of course, Mr. President, one way of acquiring property is by simply forcibly seizing it. We have laws providing compensation for the taking of property; but, under the terms of section 303, as I read them, all of those laws are nullified, and there is nothing left in the way of an obligation on the Administrator or the Government with respect to any property taken, not even the obligation of payment of compensation, because all laws are nullified. The language is "exercise the authority contained in section 201 (h) without regard to the limitation of any existing law." The provisions for the application of the right of eminent domain are limitations upon the Government. So far as I can see, they go out.

I go back now to the forepart of the bill, where there is provision for the creation of a Civil Defense Advisory Council, and for any other advisory council the Administrator may desire to establish. Then, at the bottom of page 7, I find this provision:

(c) The members of the Council and the members of any other advisory committees, other than the Administrator, may be compensated at rates not in excess of $50 per diem and, while away from their homes or regular places of business, they may be paid actual travel expenses and not to exceed $15 per diem in lieu of subsistence.

That language is sufficiently broad to clothe the Administrator with the power, and it does clothe him with the power, to appoint advisory committees and pay them 365 days out of the year at $50 a day. It is a pure delegation of absolute, uncontrolled authority, with no standard whatever to guide him in any action.

Certainly we want adequate civil defense, and I am not criticizing that. I understand what a tremendous job the committee has had in working out the bill. I have read as much of the hearings as I could. I just came from my office, where I had been poring over them again. I have not had an opportunity to read them through. I have had to pick out here and there some matter which I deemed of more pressing moment than a complete consideration of the entire bill or of the hearings, which, after all, to a very great extent, explain why the proponents of the bill desired certain provisions to be written into it. I should like to have had the opportunity to study them thoroughly. I think the Members of the Senate ought to have the opportunity to study them thoroughly.

I would hope, Mr. President, that we could discuss the matter, and I should like to hear from the Senator from Tennessee at length and have an opportunity to pose certain other questions to him; and then I could hope that we could let this bill go over until we return just before the close of the year or the close of the session, at which time other Members of the Senate, who I know are vitally interested in this matter, would have an opportunity to come equipped to understand what the bill seeks to do.

The report indicates—and I am sure that those who prepared the report believed, and do believe—that the philosophy of the proposed legislation is simply to make the Government of the United States a guiding authority to aid the States in the primary job of civil defense. It is so stated; and yet I have never seen a bill which so completely subordinated the States and their subdivisions to the arbitrary rule of an administrator. He prepares the programs. He presents the programs to the States. Certainly, the State can adopt or reject; but the State rejects at its peril; and if the program which it sets up, which it feels is a sound program, does not meet with the administrator's approval, then that State is out, and its people are without any protection under this proposed act.

With respect to the furnishing of financial aid, the administrator writes the terms; he writes the conditions. If he feels that the operation of the State is in any wise unsatisfactory to him—not according to some standards of the Congress—he can refuse further aid, and nothing can be done about it; it is a final decision; and that ends it, until the Congress can act to correct what I feel is ill-advised legislation at the moment.

I call attention to the provision which I have just been discussing. On page 11, among the general powers of the administrator, to be exercised continuously and not the extraordinary powers in the case of a declaration of a civil defense emergency, we find that the administrator has the power to—

(i) make financial contributions, on the basis of programs or projects approved by the administrator, to the States for civil defense purposes, including, but not limited to, the procurement, construction, leasing, or renovating of materials and facilities.

That, Mr. President, is absolute authority. It is without limit. He may make contribution without limit for any purpose he may desire. The bill includes specifically certain uses for which the money is to be had, but there are the words "but not limited to," which make the sky the limit. Further, we find this:

Such contributions shall be made on such terms or conditions as the administrator shall prescribe—

And again—and we are now speaking of the terms and conditions—including, but not limited to, the method of purchase.

He can tell them how to buy, and from whom, if he wants to and whether by bid or by privately negotiated purchase. He is there empowered to tell them what they may do with respect to any purchase that is made with this Federal contribution.

I read further:

But not limited to the method of purchase, the quantity, quality, or specifications of the materials or facilities, and such other factors or care or treatment—to assure the uniformity, availability, and good condition of such materials or facilities.

And this is the only standard we find—

Mr. President, that is not putting a primary responsibility on either the State or its political subdivisions. It is leaving the primary responsibility in the Federal Government's Administrator entirely. He does the directing, he writes the rules, and he requires the performance.

There is another question which is bothering me with reference to purchases with such funds. The bill is not clear on that point. I hope I have the attention of the Senator from Tennessee, because I realize how valuable, in time to come, in the construction and interpretation of this proposed act, the positions of the sponsors, including the chairman of the committee, are. If a contribution is made, I assume that with respect to any article or thing purchased title thereto vests in the States. I hope that may be the view of the committee. If it is not, then there are several other knotty questions arising.

On the next page of the bill we find language with reference to contributions to the States for shelters and other protective facilities. That, as I understand the philosophy of the bill, Mr. President, represents the most important single feature of the bill. It represents bomb shelters and security when bombs are falling. The language is as follows:

That financial contributions to the States for shelters and other protective facilities—

And so forth. I assume again, Mr. President, and I hope the Senator will put into the RECORD the views of the committee on this question, that as to such shelters and protective facilities for which there is a Federal contribution, title to them vests in the States. If it does not, then we run into the knotty questions of ownership by the Government of certain facilities on a piece of real property and ownership of the land by the State with certain powers of the Government to dispose of them if they are found either unsuitable for defense or inadvisable for use in the program.

Mr. President, there are a number of questions which, it seems to me, should have more attention than can be given to them here. I believe the submission of the bill to the Judiciary Committee would be helpful solely because it has a highly qualified staff in the field of legal draftsmanship, well versed in the rules of statutory construction, and so forth. Of course, the answer can always be made, "If we find it wrong, we can amend it." But it seems to me there is not at this minute a compelling necessity to act today. A waiting period of 7 or 8 days cannot affect the operation of this bill. That will be soon enough to go forward under it, particularly when we now have a defense establishment, established by Executive order.

Mr. President, I have received complaints from municipalities which feel that the bill, while, as some of them have said, gives lip service to the primary responsibility of local subdivisions, actually gives them none but places all the control at the top level, in the Federal Government, and as to any association they might have, or any dealings with the Government, they feel that they are going to be compelled to go through the State government. In that respect I want to say, in all fairness, that the committee has, I believe, been helpful in its draft in including the power, at least, to deal with subdivisions to a greater extent than was provided for in the House bill, as I hurriedly read it, but it seems to me those matters are very important. It is a cooperative thing. We must get cooperation at the local level, and there is need for confidence in the minds of those who represent the local level that they can go direct to the Administrator, if that be necessary.

I invite attention, Mr. President, to another matter which has just entered my mind. There is a provision in the bill for education by the Administrator and for a training program. The report of the committee indicates that it is believed this educational and training program will cost approximately $10,000,000. If there is some figure that is reasonable, I should like to see a limitation as to the expenditure that could be made for that purpose written into the bill. After all, this is the Congress of the United States. We are spending other people's money, and we want to do adequately and completely the thing that needs to be done, but in doing it we do not want to grant any authority on any page, sentence, phrase, or word of the bill that is not needed anywhere.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I do not want to prolong the debate, but the remarks of my distinguished friend from Oregon [Mr. CORDON] called my attention to the fact that in the matter of civil defense there has been issued by the Government Printing Office—and I invite the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to it—a very comprehensive and lucid booklet on how to prepare for an atomic attack. It tells certain things which a citizen can do and which a community can do. The only unfortunate thing about it is, speaking about expense, that it suggests that a copy of the booklet may be obtained by sending 10 cents to the Government Printing Office. I was hoping that through the civil defense bill those booklets might be made available to citizens free of charge, or for a stamp. The 10 cents is not important. The booklet is a good one. It is very concise. It is almost in the so-called primer class. It might be necessary for some of our citizens to know what to do.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, referring to the question raised by the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], I believe 60,000 or 70,000 of the booklets were sent to States and cities for free distribution, but when anyone writes in for a copy he has to pay 10 cents for it.

Mr. MAGNUSON. But any citizen can receive one free of charge?

Mr. KEFAUVER. That is correct.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I thank the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, the questions raised by the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. CORDON] are, of course, important. However, the issues he raised have been discussed back and forth in the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy and in the Armed Services Committee, and also to a considerable extent on the floor of the Senate. I think the Senator will find in the hearings and in the report the answers to most of the questions which he so ably raised.

Let me say, in the first place, that the mayors and other representatives from his own State, and particularly from the city of Portland, have been among the most urgent in asking that Congress immediately enact this proposed legislation. The time is already late if the cooperative program envisioned in this proposed legislation is to be carried out, and it is absolutely imperative that the bill be finally passed by January 1 in order that the 44 State legislatures which meet in January can formulate their program, can enter into compacts with other States, as provided for in the bill, and can carry out the part of the program which is theirs and which is a large part of it.

Governors of States, mayors of cities, and associations comprising local officials have blamed Congress already for our great delay in passing the bill, and they are urging prompt action. The problem has been fully considered. Everything in the bill may not be perfect, but in view of the urgency of the matter we have spent a tremendous amount of time on it, and we have tried to prepare a bill which would be satisfactory. In our opinion it is in good shape. Of course experience may show that certain improvements should be made.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I should like to answer some of the questions raised by the Senator from Oregon, unless he wants me to yield on this particular point.

Mr. CORDON. I should like to ask the Senator to yield for a question with reference to the position of the mayors.

Mr. KEFAUVER. We have had, generally speaking, four groups of witnesses who have testified as representatives of cities, States, and municipalities. The Conference of Governors insists that the plan set forth in the bill should be followed. It is the Federal principle of dealing with States and letting the States deal with their local communities. Generally, that has been the way the Federal program has been handled in the past. The Conference of Governors urges that it be done in that way.

Witnesses for the American Municipal Association urge that the contact be on a sort of dual basis, that is, that the Federal Government deal simultaneously with the cities and the States. How it would be possible to work out a program to deal simultaneously with both the States and the cities, the witnesses were not able to say. The distinguished mayor of Portland, Oreg., Mrs. Lee, testified to that effect. I believe difficulty would be encountered if we were to get away from the principle of having the Federal Government deal with the States, and letting the States deal with their own political subdivisions.

Another practical difficulty is presented by the fact that in some instances one city runs into another city. For example, the incorporated city of Detroit completely surrounds two other incorporated cities. Mrs. Lee, the mayor of Portland, testified that some of the large industrial areas of Portland were located in counties outside the city of Portland, and even in other surrounding cities. In the case of Los Angeles, 5 or 6 cities run one into another. Therefore, how it would be possible to have one person to look to in situations of that kind cannot be explained. It seems to me that it would have to be left to the States to work out such problems with their own local communities on the basis of local cooperation. Furthermore, I think it is a good principle to try to keep the Federal Government on the basis of dealing with States, and not letting the Federal Government, through its agents, get into the hair, so to speak, of cities and municipalities, with all the resulting troublesome reactions.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I join with the Senator from Tennessee 100 percent in what he has said. As I see it, the whole concept of the bill is directly contrary to what the Senator from Oregon has said, although I always have the utmost respect for his opinion. The problem starts with the individual. It works from the individual through the community to the State and from the State to the Nation. The whole principle of civilian defense, as I see it—and I worked on the problem for 5 years during World War II—is to stimulate voluntary action in communities. Without volunteers we cannot have civilian defense.

One of the great problems which developed during World War II was brought about by the Federal Administrator, the late Mayor LaGuardia, of New York, who, when called upon by a municipal, or other local official, would sometimes say things and make understandings and agreements which would completely upset the whole program developed with the State. The result was that one community would get one idea, another community would get another idea, and at the same time the State would be trying to encourage still another idea through municipalities and communities.

If the Senator from Oregon will read the policy declaration on page 2 of the bill he will see that it is the policy and intent of Congress that the responsibility for civil defense shall be shared by the Federal Government and the several States. The Federal Government must deal through the States. We have had a great deal of discussion on this subject, and we decided that it would be absolutely necessary to require the Federal Administrator to deal through the States. Furthermore, the Federal Government would provide cooperation in planning, and it would provide certain necessary equipment. Certain equipment would be paid for entirely by the Federal Government. The cost of other equipment would be shared by the Federal Government and the States. It seems to me that if the States are not sufficiently interested to put up their share of money for necessary civilian-defense equipment, the Federal Government should not put up a penny. I do not say that because we do not want to protect the States, but it seems to me that the impetus for wanting to protect their people must come from the States.

I can assure the Senator from Oregon from my experience of 5 years—and we started civilian defense in Massachusetts in February 1940—that people are afraid; that they want to cooperate if they have good leaders, and they will do their utmost. It must be done on a voluntary basis. It is not possible to buy civil defense.

I agree heartily with what the Senator from Tennessee has stated in response to the query of the Senator from Oregon. I believe the whole concept of the bill must be based on the individual. If it is not, I am not for the bill, and civil defense will not work, in my opinion.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I thank the Senator, and he is exactly right. It has been urged all the time that it is the individual, the local community, the city, and the State through which the problem must be handled. All the Federal Government can be asked to do is to guide, suggest, and direct. I invite the attention of the Senator from Oregon to the bottom of page 2 of the committee's report, where it is stated:

> It is a problem of survival to be solved by the individual, the community, and the State, under the guidance and coordination of the Federal Government. It is not intended that this program will be operated and controlled by the Federal Government, but rather that the Government furnish the necessary guidance and cooperation along with certain assistance in financing the program.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I feel more strongly than I can say the importance of passing this bill at this time. As one who has had a great deal to do with the handling of defense measures in New York State during the early stages of World War II, and the years spent in preparation, it is my opinion that we were further advanced in civil defense for a year and a half before we actually got into World War II, in December of 1941, than we are today, even though a shooting war is going on.

I handled civil defense in my State from the time the Defense Council was organized by me as Governor in 1940. I know that the coordination must be through the States. We cannot possibly be successful in our efforts unless the coordination springs from the State and the State is the responsible unit which deals with the Federal Government.

We had no difficulty in New York, and I am sure that my colleague from Massachusetts, who was Governor of his State at the same time I was Governor of New York, will testify that he had no difficulty in coordinating the activities of the various municipalities and counties. We coordinated the cities. We coordinated the police forces of the State. We coordinated the fire-fighting forces of the State. We made arrangements so that one city would help another city if the need should arise. It was all carried out under the encouragement and direction of the Federal Government.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. The State of New York and the Commonwealth of Massachusetts had very distinct understandings between them.

Mr. LEHMAN. We certainly did. As a matter of fact, the State of New York had distinct understandings with other neighboring States.

Mr. President, I could not go back to New York and acknowledge that I was willing to have the Congress adjourn while a measure of this importance was pending. The minds of the people of New York—and I do not think they are different from the people of other States—are definitely fixed on the idea that we must develop our civilian-defense machinery and be ready to defend our people if the need should unhappily arise. In justice to the people whom we represent, I think we must enact at this time a civil-defense program which will at least be reasonably adequate. I do not claim that this bill is perfect. I read a statement earlier in the day, upon which I commented. I stated that there were certain things in the bill which I believed could be improved. I spoke not only for myself, but for the mayor of the great city of New York. I hope and expect that when the Congress meets again next year, whatever weaknesses there may be in the law will be removed and we can have a more perfect law. But the bill before us at least will tide us over. It will start the ball rolling, and will make it possible to give reasonably adequate defense to the people of the country.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me to propound a question to the Senator from New York?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. Has the Senator from New York studied the bill before the Senate?

Mr. LEHMAN. I have studied it with some care.

Mr. McCARRAN. Would the Senator from New York vote for a bill which he felt and knew contained provisions which were directly contrary to the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. LEHMAN. If I knew that they were directly contrary to the Constitution of the United States, of course I would not vote for such a bill. But I am not at all convinced that the provisions of the pending bill are contrary to the Constitution of the United States. I understand that the committees in both the House and the Senate have carefully studied the situation. Certainly, there is no indication that there are any provisions which are definitely contrary to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I do not wish to yield the floor at this time.

Mr. CAPEHART. Will the Senator yield for as long a speech as the able Senator from New York has just made?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes, indeed.

Mr. CAPEHART. I should like to make an inquiry of the able Senator from Tennessee. I invite his attention to section 201 (h), in line 19, on page 10. Under this paragraph the Administrator is authorized, not merely in a time of emergency, but during the life of the bill, whether there is an emergency or not, to—

(h) procure, by condemnation or otherwise, construct, lease, transport, store, maintain, renovate or distribute materials and facilities for civil defense, with the right to take immediate possession thereof.

There is nothing in the bill that says what he shall pay for them, or how he shall pay for them. There is nothing in the bill which provides that such properties must be returned to their original owners when they are no longer needed in the program.

I believe that the Administrator of Civil Defense should have the right to take such action during an emergency, that is, when the President has declared the emergency or when we are at war. But this provision would give the Administrator the right to do such things in the normal operations under the act. I do not know why we should give the Administrator more power than we gave the President of the United States under the 1950 Defense Production Act. Under title II of the 1950 Defense Production Act, section 201, we established a formula under which the President could acquire, condemn, and take over property; also a formula under which, when the Government had finished with the property, it was to be returned to its original owner. Here it is proposed to give the Administrator a blank check, not in time of emergency. I think he ought to have such authority in time of emergency, but we are proposing to give him a blank check during the life of the bill, and the life of the bill might well be 50 years.

I am one of those who feel that we should always have on our statute books legislation dealing with civilian defense, but the pending bill would give the Administrator—not the President of the United States—the right to take over property and keep it forever. There is nothing in the bill which requires that when the Government no longer needs the property it shall be returned to its original owners. There is nothing in the bill as to the method of disposition of the property.

Mr. President, I propose to offer an amendment before we are through today, to substitute the language of section 201 of the Defense Production Act of 1950.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I think that I can save the Senator a little time in that connection. I fully agree with the Senator from Indiana. The Senator will observe, on page 14, section 202, that it was the intention of the committee to put into operation title II of the 1950 Defense Production Act and make it applicable to this act, so that the same procedure would be followed as would be followed in the amendment which the Senator is about to propose. The hearings sustain the idea that that is the purpose of section 202. However, the Senator from New York [Mr. LEHMAN] had some misgivings about it, and did not think it was quite as clear as it should be, so he submitted an amendment which contains title II of the Defense Production Act. It is the same as the language of the Defense Production Act, with the exception that the Administrator is substituted for the President. So that part of the Defense Production Act is now explicitly made a part of this bill.

Mr. CAPEHART. If we are to do that, does not the Senator believe that it will be necessary to eliminate subsection (h) from section 201?

Mr. KEFAUVER. No.

Mr. CAPEHART. I do not understand the situation. What does section 202 mean?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Subsection (h) of section 201 is the normal language applying to any agency which has the right to procure anything. There are several ways in which property can be procured. It can be procured by condemnation. It can be procured by filing with the district attorney a notice of entry and taking over, paying for it later. It can be procured by rental, by purchase, and, of course, in many other ways. That language is the usual language which is found in any statute by which any administrator is given the right to procure property. It does not waive any of the requirements of condemnation or any of the protections which are usually provided. That language will be found in the case of any corporation or administrator given the right to procure property.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I find that we did adopt an amendment offered by the senior Senator from New York which apparently covers the situation. Does it fully cover what we have been discussing?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes, I think it does.

Mr. CAPEHART. I shall study it and try to ascertain if it does. If it does not I shall talk about it a little later.

TRIBUTES TO SENATOR DONNELL

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me to pay tribute at this time to my colleague from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL]?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I shall be glad to yield for that purpose, if I do not lose the floor thereby.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from Tennessee yielding for that purpose? The Chair hears none and it is so ordered.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, I should like to say a few words, inadequate though they be, about my distinguished colleague from Missouri who will not be with us in the next Congress.

I wish to express the deep sense of personal satisfaction I have had in serving in the Senate with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL]. During that time, and before, he has rendered outstanding service to his State and to his country.

I need not tell his colleagues here that he is a brilliant scholar and a tireless worker. His high sense of honor, his scrupulous honesty, and his intellectual integrity are proverbial. If a thing is right to the senior Senator from Missouri it is right, and if it is wrong, it is wrong and that is all there is to it.

In the Senate he judged with the fear of God in his heart. The truth is his Bible and he carries it with him always. I believe I express the sentiment of all his colleagues when I say that we wish him continued health and happiness and good luck in whatever he undertakes.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I am most happy that the junior Senator from Missouri rose and uttered the kind words he did in behalf of his colleague [Mr. DONNELL]. Everyone knows that I do not happen to subscribe to his political philosophy, but I have observed him in committees and in the Senate Chamber, and I wish to say amen to all that has been enunciated by the junior Senator from Missouri respecting his colleague.

I am very devoted to the State of Missouri. As the Senate knows I happen to be of Spanish extraction. The first contacts my ancestors had with the Anglo-Saxon civilization of the United States of America was through Missouri. The American flag was raised in the Mexican Territory by Missouri troops who left Independence, Mo., in 1846. Since statehood we have had two governors who were natives of Missouri. Our basic law in New Mexico is still the Spanish Code.

I believe I know the history of Missouri. From early days to this moment Missouri has had great men to represent her in the Senate. But I can say in all sincerity that Missouri has had no better man to represent her in the Senate than the senior Senator from Missouri, who is to leave us when the present Congress adjourns.

Again I say amen to all the junior Senator from Missouri has said respecting his colleague.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I wish to join in the laudatory remarks which have just been made relative to the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL]. I join with the Senator from New Mexico in expressing my appreciation to the junior Senator from Missouri for the glowing tribute he has paid to his colleague, who is in every way a man worthy of membership in the United States Senate. No one here will dispute the statement that we all agree that the senior Senator from Missouri ranks among the highest of our citizens for ability and integrity. He is very able, influential, and studious. His character is above reproach.

I wish to join with other Senators in extending to him best wishes for his happiness wherever he may go, and to say to him that we shall greatly miss him, especially because of his industry and energy in the committees of the Senate and on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I wish to add about three sentences to what has been said about our colleague, FORREST DONNELL. I have served with him as a colleague in two capacities. We both served as governors of our respective States simultaneously, and we have now served together as Senators of the United States.

I have never known a man who has been more courteous, who, when I visited his State, was more hospitable, or who has been more sincere and conscientious in his work for the government of Missouri, and more lately for the Government of our whole country.

I shall greatly miss him as a friend and as a colleague in this body.

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR THOMAS OF UTAH

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me to pay tribute to our colleague the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS]?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I shall be glad to yield for that purpose under the same circumstances as I yielded previously.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I should like to read into the body of the RECORD the following tribute to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, subscribed to unanimously by the members of the committee:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE.

TRIBUTE TO ELBERT D. THOMAS

In these closing days of the second session of the Eighty-first Congress, we, the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, are saddened by the forthcoming departure from our group of our respected chairman, ELBERT D. THOMAS. In recognition of his distinquished record of public service and as a token of our warm personal regard for him, we, his colleagues on the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, are honored to pay him this tribute.

His great vision and his unselfish devotion to the welfare of the American people have materially contributed to a permanent record of legislation serving their interests. Included in this legislation are such important landmarks as the National Labor Relations Act of 1935, the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, the Servicemen's Readjustment Act, the Science Foundation Act, and many other important measures designed to improve and serve the welfare of the people of this country. His record, which is written in the history of legislation before Congress during the period of his service, more than any statement we could make, reflects the outstanding public service which this great American, for whom we have a deep and affectionate regard, has rendered.

His unique personal qualities, his sympathetic understanding, his unselfishness, and his high character have made of each of us a warm and personal friend. It is in token of this friendship and out of regard for his statesmanlike qualities that we, his colleagues, set down our signatures.

JAMES E. MURRAY, LISTER HILL, HERBERT H. LEHMAN, H. ALEXANDER SMITH, MATTHEW M. NEELY, ROBERT A. TAFT, FORREST C. DONNELL, WAYNE MORSE, PAUL H. DOUGLAS, HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, CLAUDE PEPPER, GEORGE D. AIKEN

FEDERAL CIVIL DEFENSE ACT OF 1950

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4268) to authorize a Federal civil defense program, and for other purposes.

Mr. WHERRY. Let me inquire of the distinguished Senator from Tennessee whether it is true that sections 304 and 305 are in the House bill?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes; it is true that they are in the House bill.

Mr. WHERRY. It is the intention of the Senator, is it not, to have the text of the Senate bill substituted for that of the House bill, as an amendment after the Senate bill, as amended, is passed?

Mr. KEFAUVER. That is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. In view of the fact that there has been so much colloquy about sections 304 and 305—colloquy engaged in by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CORDON] and other Senators—would it in any way jeopardize the final action on the bill if we were to strike sections 304 and 305 from the Senate bill, and then pass it? Under those circumstances, inasmuch as those sections are in the House bill, the subject matter of those sections would then be before the conferees.

I make that suggestion in view of the fact that there has been so much debate in the Senate in regard to those two sections. How does the Senator from Tennessee feel about removing those two sections from the Senate bill, and then letting the bill go to conference? Under those circumstances, those two sections would be in issue before the conferees, and that matter would be a subject for consideration by us when the conference report comes back to the Senate.

Mr. KEFAUVER. In answer to that question, let me say that the provisions of this bill in regard to procurement and many other matters——

Mr. WHERRY. I am speaking of sections 304 and 305. They contain provisions with regard to immunity from suit and waiver of the Administrative Procedure Act.

Mr. KEFAUVER. The Senator will find the same general principles covered by Public Law 875, a law to give Federal assistance to State and local communities in case of major disasters.

Mr. WHERRY. I do not dispute that, and at this time I am not disputing the merits of those provisions. I am simply asking whether it is true that section 304 or a provision similar to it is contained in the House bill. Is it also a fact that the provisions of section 305 of the Senate bill are to be found in the House bill? If so, in view of the fact that considerable colloquy seems to have developed in the Senate in regard to those provisions, I would suggest that those two sections be omitted from the bill as it is passed by the Senate. That action would not jeopardize the passage of the bill, and thereafter it would be up to the conferees to determine whether to include or exclude those sections.

Would not it expedite the procedure to have us omit those two sections from the bill, and then let the conferees act on those matters in accordance with their best judgment, in connection with drawing up the conference report?

Mr. KEFAUVER. If the text of the Senate bill, as amended, is substituted for all after the enacting clause of the House bill, by unanimous consent, at the conclusion of the debate, will not all parts of the bills be in dispute? In other words, the conferees could then rewrite any section.

Mr. WHERRY. They could if the language were omitted. But if this language is written into the bill, and if it also is written into the House bill, nothing will be in dispute, so far as that language is concerned. Is not that correct?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Under the rule laid down at one time by former Senator Pitman, who at that time was acting as Presiding Officer, if the Senate bill constitutes an amendment, I think the conference may rewrite the entire bill, so long as what is inserted is germane.

In any event, I say to the Senator that I know there are at least some differences between section 304 as contained in the Senate bill and the similar section of the House bill. I have not examined section 303 in detail.

Mr. WHERRY. I am merely making the suggestion. I have been very much interested in several of the questions asked during the colloquy—for instance, questions about the authority provided by sections 304 and 305. Nevertheless, I am quite satisfied that if those two sections were dropped from the Senate bill, inasmuch as similar—if not identical—provisions are contained in the House bill, these provisions then would be before the conference.

I make that suggestion at this time in order to expedite the procedure in connection with the handling of the bill.

On the other hand, if these sections are included in both bills, there will be nothing on that subject to come before the conference, because those issues will then be settled.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I appreciate the suggestion very much.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota, with the understanding that I shall not thereby lose the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Minnesota, with the understanding that the Senator from Tennessee does not thereby yield the floor. Without objection, the Senator from Minnesota is recognized.

Mr. WHERRY. Just a minute, Mr. President; unanimous consent must be obtained for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Perhaps the Chair did not understand the request.

Is there objection?

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to have some questions about this bill answered.

Of course, the Senator from Tennessee is not required to yield, and I do not want him to yield if he does not wish to do so. Nevertheless, I wish to ask some questions about the bill.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I also wish to ask some questions about the bill.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, I have reserved the right to object to the unanimous-consent request, and I am speaking on that subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not hear the Senator, unfortunately.

Mr. CORDON. I am sorry if I did not speak loud enough.

Mr. President, let me say that I will not object if I correctly understand that the Senator from Minnesota does not intend to take too long in making his remarks. I wonder whether the Senator will indicate how long he intends to speak.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I was going to ask a question or two about the pending measure.

Mr. CORDON. Oh, very well, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota is recognized.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I wish the RECORD to show that I am not objecting to the proposed unanimous consent, but there is no need for such unanimous consent if the questions which are to be asked relate to the pending bill.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, may I ask what is before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota has the floor.

Mr. McCARRAN. Was unanimous consent requested?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was, and it has been granted. The bill is open to further amendment; no amendment is pending at this time.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, my inquiry of the Senator from Tennessee is in reference to what provision is made in this measure for further consideration by the Congress of some of the problems which might arise under the administration of a civil defense act. In other words, there has been some conflict here today as to the committee jurisdiction of this measure. It has been suggested that the bill should go to the Judiciary Committee. The bill has been reported by the Armed Services Committee.

I believe that the distinguished senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCMAHON] spoke about the necessity for the creation of a special committee to watch over the activities of civil defense. For the purpose of the RECORD, I should like to have the observation of the Senator from Tennessee as to what he thinks would be the procedure or the machinery for further consideration on the part of the Congress of civil defense activities. Where would mayors come, where would governors come, where would interested local groups come, to obtain further information?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from Minnesota has asked the question, because certainly no one claims that this measure will be the final answer. I said in the beginning that this measure is only one of the bills which will have to be passed in connection with civil defense.

Of course, it is contemplated that it will be necessary for the Congress to enact a compensation law. Perhaps it will be necessary for the Congress to pass a bill—which might be referred to the Banking and Currency Committee—in regard to the financing of certain kinds of self-liquidating projects.

However, this bill contains provision for a 12-man advisory council to be appointed, and to be known as the Civil Defense Advisory Council. Section 102 of the bill deals with that Council, which is to be appointed by the President, with half its members to be taken from a slate submitted by the Council of State Governments, the Governors' Conference, the American Municipal Association, and the United States Conference of Mayors. It is expected that the Administrator will advise with this council a great deal.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I am happy to yield further for a question.

Mr. HUMPHREY. It is the observation of the Senator from Minnesota, and it is, I believe, expressly written in the language of the bill, that it is a Federal-State-local Government relationship as outlined and projected under the terms of the bill. I merely say by way of suggestion, that we have had many special committees in the Congress which have taken up subject matters of importance, such as the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, and the Senate Select Small Business Committee. While I believe in using the straight line committees, that is, the normal committees of the Congress, it may be necessary in the days to come to establish a special committee to review the tremendous powers which are authorized under this bill,

I make the further observation that the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments has a subcommittee on Intergovernmental Relations. It appears to me that some difficulties will arise in connection with the Federal-State-local Government administrative relationships, and that it would possibly be proper for the full committee to give some consideration to those problems.

I wondered whether the Senator from Tennessee, as he has studied this bill, would find any objection, for example, to an intergovernmental relations committee to give careful scrutiny to the operations of this act, and possibly if in the foreseeable future the necessity should arise, of having a specialized committee—a joint committee, possibly, or a special committee of the Senate—to give further study to civilian-defense operations and administration.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, answering the inquiry of the distinguished Senator, I think there might be some merit in such a committee, but we are establishing a good many committees to watch over various activities, and I believe it would be better to go along and see how the administration of this bill is going to operate, and, for the time being at least, let the normal Senatorial committees, plus the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, try to handle the problem. I am sure, if something of that kind becomes necessary and urgent, the advisory council, which is provided for, or the Administrator, will bring it to the attention of Congress, so that we can adopt appropriate legislation and act on it; but, for the time being, I should rather not commit myself as favoring a special committee to oversee the operations of the act.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I am happy to yield further for a question.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I merely want to say to the Senator that the observations which have been made here today as to the urgency for this legislation are surely pertinent and to the point. I had the privilege of meeting with the municipal officers of my State, and they are desperately concerned about the confusion which now exists in the whole field of civilian defense. I believe the Committee on Armed Services, and particularly the Senator from Tennessee, has performed a distinct service by bringing about the consideration of this bill, and I know it is going to do much to clarify the situation and to point a way.

I hope that the Senate will act expeditiously upon it. It seems to me it is vitally important that this proposed legislation be passed within the next 2 or 3 days—or today, I would hope—so that we can assure the governors and the local officials and the State legislatures and city councils as to what the relationship of responsibility is between Federal, State, and local government. I merely wanted to urge the favorable consideration and speedy passage of the bill.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I thank the Senator. I want to say that all the mayors and the governors feel that it is very urgent that the bill be passed; in fact, they feel that it should have been passed many, many months ago.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. If the Senator from Oregon will let me answer some of the questions he has already asked, I should like to do that first. I am afraid there may be so many questions that I cannot answer them, anyway.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one question relating to a matter to which the report of the committee does not seem to advert?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield to the Senator from Oregon for a question.

Mr. CORDON. What is the view of the Senator from Tennessee as to the legal effect of the language found in paragraph (f) on page 18, beginning in line 21? It reads:

> And to incur obligations on behalf of the United States for civil-defense purposes as authorized in this act.

The question is, Does the Senator construe that to be an unlimited, unqualified delegation of contract authority to bind the United States during the emergency period?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I am glad the Senator has asked that question. This is a statement of what all war agencies have a right to do; that is, they can employ temporary employees to meet an emergency, without regard to civil-service law, but, before they can become permanent, such appointees must qualify under civil-service law. It is only to meet an immediate situation. The Senator will see that that provision comes under title III of the act. In other words, if it were necessary to get additional employees to help out in an emergency, it would be too slow a process if we were required to go through the civil service, without making some temporary appointments.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question on the same matter?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. CORDON. Is it the Senator's view that the language, "and to incur obligations on behalf of the United States for civil-defense purposes as authorized in this act," is limited only to obligations for the temporary employment of additional personnel without regard to the civil-service laws?

Mr. KEFAUVER. No, I did not intend that. The second part of subsection (f) means that the Administrator can incur an obligation to build an emergency shelter, or to remodel a subway, or something of that sort, under his emergency power, to take care of people who may be in jeopardy.

Mr. CORDON. Does not the language, however, grant him the unqualified and unlimited authority to contract and bind the Federal Government in any field within the purview of the act?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes, that is correct within the purview of civil defense, so long as it is operated for the purpose of protecting people, as provided by the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on engrossment of the amendment and the third reading of the bill.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee has not answered the question asked by the Senator from Nebraska about sections 304 and 305.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I may say to the Senator, I do not think that is a proper way to legislate. Sections 303 and 304 are in the bill. If any amendments are indicated, we shall be glad to join in accepting any amendments which in our opinion represented an improvement; but I think it might be setting a very bad precedent merely to omit sections of the bill on the idea that they would be in conference.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I am not asking the distinguished Senator to mutilate the bill. All I am stating is that those provisions are in the House bill, and that the thing the Senate is working toward is a deadline for the passage of the bill, and there has been a great deal of objection. I am not even going to put my suggestion in the form of a motion, because, after all, I must leave it to the wisdom of the manager of the bill on the floor. But it is one way by which we can preserve any right which the conferees may have to look this thing over and bring it back through a conference report, according to their best judgment, and still not delete provisions which are found in the House bill which cover the subject matter of sections 304 and 305. It is one way to expedite it without getting into difficulty about the passage of the bill at this time.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KEFAUVER. If this bill were, by amendment, substituted completely for the House bill, could any part of the bill then be rewritten in conference, provided the portions so rewritten were germane?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair suggests that paragraph 3 of rule XXVII be read. The clerk will read it.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. Rule XXVII, paragraph 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, reads as follows:

> 3. (a) In any case in which a disagreement to an amendment in the nature of a substitute has been referred to conferees, it shall be in order for the conferees to report a substitute on the same subject matter; but they may not include in the report matter not committed to them by either House. They may, however, include in their report in any such case matter which is a germane modification of subjects in disagreement.
> (b) In any case in which the conferees violate subsection (a), the conference report shall be subject to a point of order.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I would rather go along with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, as I interpret the rule, it would be a germane subject, and the conferees could do what they chose with reference to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Everything will be in conference.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Do I correctly understand the Chair to mean that if the amendment is adopted everything will be in conference?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is correct.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, in answer to the questions asked by the Senator from Oregon, let me say that he first asked about compensation for any property taken by the Administrator under the act. It was and is the intention of the committee, as set forth in the hearings, to provide in section 202 that the provisions of title II of the Defense Production Act be applied to this bill. That provides methods of arriving at compensation. But, in order to clarify it entirely and to remove any doubt about it, the committee and the Senate accepted the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. IVES] which makes it very clear. It deals with compensation.

In that connection the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] was also going to propose a similar amendment. He has advised the chairman of the committee that the amendment meets the point he had in mind and that it is acceptable to him.

The next question asked by the Senator from Oregon was as to what would become of the property involved. The title to property acquired by full contribution on the part of the Federal Government, such as the communications system or any property for which the Federal Government pays the entire amount, belongs to the Federal Government.

With reference to shelters on a 50–50 sharing basis, the title is in either the State or the local community, depending on what the legislation of the State provides for, or depending on the arrangement between the political subdivisions. Most of these things are provided by executive order, and the States want to pass on the subject, but they cannot do so until this bill is passed.

I think the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] fully answered the inquiry as to where the primary responsibility lies. In the declaration of policy, in the whole history of the legislation, and in the report the primary responsibility is in the community or State, and the only thing the Federal Government is trying to do is to give suggestions and directions, so that we can have uniformity in practice. Of course it rests upon the Federal Government with reference to the imminence of attack, the approach of planes, or the imminence of bombing, and matters of that sort.

The Senator from Oregon also asked with reference to section 303. The only purpose of section 303 is to exempt the Administrator from the operation of certain statutes which would make it impossible for him to operate quickly enough in case of a great national emergency. The statutes are set forth on page 10 of the report. The first one is 610 United States Code 278a, which provides that in the leasing of buildings to the Government the maximum rental shall not exceed 15 percent of the fair-market value.

The Administrator, in a time of emergency, would have the right to lease a building without going into the question of whether it exceeded 15 percent of the fair-market value.

The next statute listed is 41 United States Code 5, which provides that all purchases and contracts for supplies and purchases of services must be advertised.

We thought that could be waived during the exercise of these emergency powers.

The next one is 40 United States Code 259, which provides that no money shall be paid for a site for a public building in excess of the amount appropriated.

That is a peacetime provision. It might not be possible to have any amount appropriated at all for the purchase of a building or a site.

I am sure the Senator would agree that that restriction should be removed in case of an emergency.

The next statute referred to is 40 United States Code 267, regarding restrictions on buildings, the approval of sketch plans, with a limit on the cost, and what not. The architectural plans must be approved under the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act.

In other words, Mr. President, we are trying, during a time of emergency, not to tie the hands of the Administrator with restrictive provisions about advertising and what not which apply to other Federal agencies and which would apply to the Administrator during a time of normal operations.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield for a question.

Mr. CORDON. Permit me to preface my question with the statement that I have no objection whatever, insofar as the section provides for the relieving of the Administrator from any obligations under the statutes mentioned. The thing that bothers me, with reference to which, frankly, I intend to offer an amendment to the bill, is the phrase in lines 5 and 6 "any existing law." That is found on page 17 of the bill. This would relieve the Administrator of any limitation of any kind, including a requirement to pay reasonable compensation.

Mr. KEFAUVER. That is the usual language employed when emergency power is given. The intent is that if some other statutes, such as those which I have mentioned, which old line agencies have to deal with, are applicable, the Administrator will not have to act under them. But if it makes the Senator any less concerned about the matter if he wants to study it over further, I should be willing to accept an amendment clarifying that part of the bill.

Mr. CORDON. I would suggest, if the Senator will permit me, that if we eliminated the words "any existing law", then we would have the authority which is found in section 201 (h), but there would be no limitation with reference to those set out in the several acts described.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Then we would be confronted with the problem as to whether it would be possible to pick out all the laws relating to advertising, and so forth. If we find we can do it, we shall do so. But if it is going to hamper the work of the Administrator, we may have to put the language back in conference.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, as I have studied the situation more recently, I think the Senator from Oregon has done well to call these points to our attention. As I interpret section 303, subdivisions A through F, the situation would exist only when an actual emergency had arisen.

Mr. KEFAUVER. That is correct.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Let us assume that city X has been bombed. If we were to try to place any limitations in this provision it could tie up all the assistance which the Administrator wanted to give. If it is desired to control the Administrator I would suggest that we place the matter in the discretion of the President. I was going to suggest the Budget Director or the Secretary of Defense, but I think the President is the proper person who should exercise discretion in a matter of this kind. If Chicago and New York were to be faced by a sudden emergency, it would be unwise to have the Administrator's hands tied with respect to what money he would be able to spend until Congress acted or until he got further authority. That is the way I interpret the section.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I appreciate the observations of the Senator from Massachusetts. I may say that it would involve the Food and Drug Act, some sanitary provisions, the Public Health Act, and many other acts. It would relate back to the matter of procurement, construction, maintenance and use of some facilities. Is the Senator from Oregon satisfied with the explanation given by the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CORDON. The Senator from Oregon is concerned with the language. It appears to him that the inclusion of the language clearly would render the provision without effect, because it would have no constitutional standing. If the Senator would permit the Senator from Oregon to suggest, the reason it assumes the importance it does is because it would affect the right and power of the Government to take property without compensation.

Mr. KEFAUVER. The compensation provision is taken care of in section 202, which carries the Defense Production Act into this bill, and it is also taken care of by the so-called Ives amendment. Therefore, ample compensation would have to be paid. That subject is already taken care of.

EXCESS-PROFITS TAX OF 1950—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield so that I may bring up the conference report on the excess-profits tax bill?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from Georgia for the purpose of bringing up the conference report on the excess-profits tax without displacing the pending bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It being a privileged matter, it would not displace the pending bill.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I submit a conference report on the bill (H. R. 9827) to provide revenue by imposing a corporate excess-profits tax, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read for the information of the Senate.

The report was read by the legislative clerk.

(For conference report, see proceedings of the House of Representatives, January 1, 1951, pp. 17025–17027.)

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the conference report?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I wonder whether the Senator from Georgia desires to ask for a quorum call. We have not had a quorum call all day, and perhaps this would be a good time to have one, unless the Senator from Georgia would like to proceed without having a quorum call. I shall be glad to accept the Senator's judgment.

Mr. GEORGE. I would rather proceed without a quorum call. I had hoped that a quorum would be present, or that a quorum had already been developed.

I wish to make a brief statement regarding the conference report.

The conference, on the whole, was very satisfactory. The House agreed to practically all of the Senate amendments. However, there were some provisions which we had to amend, or upon which we had to make compromises or to recede. I will discuss briefly the changes made in the Senate amendments by the conference.

First, as to the termination date for the excess-profits tax: The Senate bill provided a termination date with respect to taxable years beginning after January 1, 1953. The House bill had no termination date. The conferees agreed to terminate the tax with respect to taxable years beginning after June 30, 1953.

Second, as to the ceiling rate: The Senate bill had an over-all ceiling on normal tax, surtax, and excess-profits tax of 60 percent. The House had an over-all ceiling rate of 67 percent. We compromised on an over-all ceiling rate of 62 percent.

Third, as to the rate of return to be allowed on borrowed capital: The Senate amendment permitted borrowed capital to be counted at 100 percent in computing the credit for invested capital and in computing net additions to capital under the average-earnings basis. That is, under the Senate amendment, borrowed capital was treated the same as other forms of capital. The House bill allowed a credit for borrowed capital measured by the interest paid on the borrowed funds. The conference accepted the Senate formula but allowed only 75 percent of the borrowed capital to be included in computing the invested-capital credit instead of 100 percent. However, one-fourth of the interest payments on this borrowed capital is to be deductible in computing excess-profits net income. This was not allowed under the Senate bill.

The House conferees agreed to the Senate bill increasing the corporate surtax rate by two percentage points.

The House conferees also agreed to the Senate amendments relating to public utilities, and the provisions relating to minerals with two exceptions:

First. The House conferees refused to agree to the Senate amendment exempting trona from the excess-profits tax as a strategic mineral.

Second. Beryllium was also eliminated by the conferees. It was pointed out that this last mineral was a derivative from "beryl," which is exempted as a strategic mineral.

I regret to report that we were unable to reach an agreement on that part of amendment No. 75, offered by Senator KERR, which gave the benefit of the growth formula to a taxpayer commencing business in the base period but prior to May 1, 1946. Under the growth formula before this amendment a taxpayer had to commence business before the beginning of the base period to secure the benefit of the growth formula. A corporation commencing business after the beginning of the base period is entitled to be treated as a new corporation, and the House conferees were unwilling to give such a corporation the benefit also of the growth formula.

The amendment of the Senate bill relating to the handling of deposits under the Merchant Marine Act was disagreed to by the House conferees. It was vigorously opposed by the Treasury. The Senate conferees receded on this amendment with the understanding that it should have further study next year.

The House did not agree to the Senate floor amendment which was intended to provide relief in cases where two or more corporations consolidated their operations during the base period and an increase in their combined incomes resulted from the consolidation. The amendment provided in effect that the increase in net income attributable to the increased efficiency resulting from the consolidation be added to average base period net income. The House conferees believed that this type of relief provision would involve very difficult questions of proof and make impossible the type of automatic relief which this bill employs. The House conferees believed that to give relief in this area and in the manner which the amendment provided, would depart from the basic principles of automatic relief followed elsewhere in the bill.

The amendment, offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON] relating to the amortization allowance for facilities certified for defense purposes, was not agreed to by the House conferees. The Senate conferees receded on this amendment with the understanding that the matter would be brought up in connection with the next revenue bill.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCMAHON], providing for a minimum base period credit based upon the years 1936 to 1939 was opposed by the Treasury, and we were forced to recede.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado to exempt Government payments to encourage exploration, development, and mining from the income tax was agreed to, as well as the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR] to clarify the utility amendment where the unregulated rates of a utility are substantially as favorable to users and consumers as are the regulated rates.

The House conferees also accepted the Senate amendment giving sewerage disposal services subject to regulation the benefit of the utility treatment, treating perlite as a strategic metal, and the Senate amendments providing relief in the case of mines.

In connection with abnormalities in income in the tax period the Senate conferees receded on a House bill provision which would give the Secretary of the Treasury the authority to prescribe classifications in addition to those specified in the bill.

The Senate bill contained a special relief provision for corporations which experienced an unusually rapid growth during the base period. Qualified taxpayers were permitted to use a substitute average base period net income computed from their income in 1949, or the average of their income in 1948 and 1949, or the average of one-half of their 1949 income and 40 percent of their 1950 income, or the average of the income in the last half of 1948 and 40 percent of the income in 1950. The first two options were contained in the House bill; the third was added by the Committee on Finance; the fourth was the result of a Senate floor amendment.

The conference restricted the option to use the income of the last half of 1948 and 40 percent of the income of 1950 in order to confine the use of the option to cases in which the company's income for the calendar year 1949 was 25 percent or less than for the calendar year 1948.

As reported by the Committee on Finance a company qualified for growth treatment by establishing that its payroll in the last half of its base period was 130 percent or more of its payroll in the first half or its gross receipts in the second half were 150 percent or more of its gross receipts in the first half. Moreover, a company could qualify for the growth options only if its total assets in January 1, 1946, did not exceed $20,000,000. These limitations proved unduly restrictive and the committee offered a floor amendment which permitted a taxpayer to avoid the $20,000,000 limitation if it complied with the following tests:

(a) The taxpayer's net sales for the period January 1, 1950, to June 30, 1950, multiplied by two is at least 150 percent of its net sales for the calendar year 1948; and

(b) Fifty percent of the net sales in 1949 were attributable to a product or class of products not generally available to the public prior to January 1, 1946; and

(c) The taxpayer's net sales attributable to such product in the calendar year 1946 is not more than 5 percent of the net sales of the product for 1949.

The conference liberalized these rules in the following manner:

(a) The comparison of the taxpayer's net sales for 1950 is to be made with the average net sales in 1946 and 1947 instead of 1948.

(b) The product not generally available to the general public prior to 1946 need constitute only 40 percent of the taxpayer's net sales for 1950 instead of 50 percent of 1949 as provided in the Senate bill.

(c) The benefits of the option were made available not only to products of which the product marketed after January 1, 1946, is a principal component, as was provided in the Senate bill, but also to articles which are components of such products or classes of products.

The bill as approved by the Senate was estimated to yield $3,200,000,000 in a full year of operation. The conference agreement will increase this by about $100,000,000. This increase comes mainly from the reduction in the amount of borrowed capital allowed from 100 percent to 75 percent, and the increase on the over-all rate limitation. Of course, if the upward trend in corporate profits continue the bill will yield between $4,000,000,000 and $5,000,000,000 next year.

Mr. President, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

FEDERAL CIVIL DEFENSE ACT OF 1950

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4268) to authorize a Federal civil-defense program, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill 4268 is before the Senate. Are there any further amendments to be offered?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, a companion bill, House bill 9798, is on the calendar. It is Calendar No. 2681. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the House bill; that the House bill be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause and substituting the language of the Senate bill, as amended; that the Senate insist upon its amendment, request a conference with the House of Representatives thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. MCCARRAN. Mr. President, is the bill still open to amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still open to amendment.

Mr. McCARRAN. I move to strike out sections 304 and 305, on page 19, of the bill.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada has moved to strike sections 304 and 305 from the Senate bill and has suggested the absence of a quorum.

The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my suggestion of the absence of a quorum may be withdrawn, and that the further proceedings in connection with the call of the roll may be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, in order to get the matter before the conference and studied there, I have agreed to accept the amendment of the Senator from Nevada.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I have an amendment which has been prepared by the Senator from Oregon. I offer it and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 18, in line 21, it is proposed to strike out all after the word "incur", and to insert "such obligations on behalf of the United States as may be required to meet the civil-defense requirements of an attack or imminent attack."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT WITH RESPECT TO FUTURE PROCEEDINGS AT THE PRESENT SESSION

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, out of order, I should like to have the Senate consider a proposed unanimous-consent agreement which is extremely important. In view of the fact that we have just almost completed a quorum call, I think we might try to have this agreement entered now.

I have conferred with the minority leader, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY], and also with Members on this side of the aisle, and I know that the Senator from Nebraska also has conferred with various Senators, in respect to the proposed agreement.

I shall now read it, and ask that it be adopted, if possible. I hope all Senators will listen carefully to the reading of the proposed agreement, because some Senators may wish to object or may wish to ask a question about it:

Ordered, That at the conclusion of its business today the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon on Tuesday, December 26, 1950; that immediately after the convening of the Senate on said day the Presiding Officer shall, without debate and without the transaction of business of any nature, declare the Senate in recess until 12 o'clock noon on Friday, December 29, 1950; that immediately after the convening of the Senate on said day of Friday, December 29, 1950, the Presiding Officer shall, without debate and without the transaction of business of any nature, declare the Senate in recess until Tuesday, January 2, 1951, at 11 o'clock a. m.

Ordered further, That on said day of Tuesday, January 2, 1951, a motion shall be in order that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference reports on the following bills, namely:

H. R. 9920. An act making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, and for other purposes;

S. 4266. An act to amend and extend title II of the First War Powers Act, 1941; and

H. R. 9798. An act to authorize a Federal civil defense program, and for other purposes.

Provided, That not to exceed one hour's debate shall be permitted on each of said conference reports, to be equally divided between those favoring and those opposing said reports, and controlled as follows: In the case of H. R. 9920, by Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. BRIDGES, respectively; in the case of S. 4266, by Mr. McCLELLAN and Mr. TAFT, respectively; and in the case of H. R. 9798, by Mr. KEFAUVER and Mr. SALTONSTALL, respectively.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, let me inquire whether the proposed agreement means that no other conference reports can be considered?

Mr. LUCAS. It does not. It does mean, however, that any other conference report which might be considered would not come under the limitation of time stated in the proposed agreement.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, let me ask the distinguished Senator from Illinois to read once again the part of the proposed agreement referring to a limitation on debate.

Mr. LUCAS. That part reads as follows:

Provided, That not to exceed 1 hour's debate shall be permitted on each of said conference reports, to be equally divided between those favoring and those opposing said reports, and controlled as follows—

And so forth.

Mr. LEHMAN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LUCAS. We are asking that the Senate convene at 11 a. m. on Tuesday, January 2, because about 2 weeks ago the Democratic conference agreed to hold a further conference on the afternoon of January 2, at 2 p. m. I think all Senators understand why we have to do that; it is because, as everyone knows, the Senator from Illinois will not be a Member of the Senate the following day. Consequently, it is necessary for the Democratic conference to meet at that time and make decisions as to the leaders of the Senate, who will take over when the new Congress convenes.

I yield now to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I respectfully call to the attention of the majority leader that there is included in the proposed unanimous-consent agreement a provision in regard to a conference report on the civil-defense bill. Of course, that bill has not yet been passed; and if it is not passed, such a conference report would not exist, and such a provision would not appear.

Mr. LUCAS. Of course, then that portion of the agreement would automatically be withdrawn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to have the Senate withhold action on the proposed unanimous-consent agreement until we ascertain whether the civil defense bill does pass. Frankly, I am very much in doubt as to whether I would concur in the proposed agreement unless that bill passes.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. The proposed agreement provides that when the Senate recesses today, the future program shall be thus and so. Such a provision means that the Senator from New York and all other Senators if they desire, can remain here until the civil defense bill is passed. The meaning is that when that bill is passed, the proposed agreement will control the time in the future.

Mr. LEHMAN. Very well. However, I would not agree to the proposed agreement unless the civil defense bill does pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Parliamentarian advises the Chair that, so far as the proposed agreement is concerned, it would make no difference whether the bill is passed or is not passed.

Mr. LUCAS. Of course, Mr. President, the only difference is that the Senator from New York has just made the suggestion that in the event the civil defense bill is not passed, he will object to the entire proposed unanimous-consent agreement. Do I correctly understand the Senator from New York?

Mr. LEHMAN. Yes, I would object to any recess, in such case. I think the civil defense bill is so important that we should remain here all next week, if necessary, in order to pass that bill. I think we should remain here until it is passed.

Mr. LUCAS. I think we may be able to pass it at once. I shall withhold the proposed unanimous-consent agreement for the moment, because I think the civil defense bill is about to be passed.

Mr. WHERRY. Very well.

FEDERAL CIVIL DEFENSE ACT OF 1950

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4268) to authorize a Federal civil-defense program, and for other purposes.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, a companion bill to Senate bill 4268 is House bill 9798, Calendar No. 2681.

I now ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 9798.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R.

9798) to authorize a Federal civil defense program, and for other purposes.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I now ask unanimous consent that the House bill be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause and substituting the language of Senate bill 4268, as thus far amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time; and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I now ask unanimous consent that the Senate insist upon its amendment, request a conference thereon with the House of Representatives, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered; and the Chair appoints the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHAPMAN], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] as conferees on the part of the Senate.

Without objection, Senate bill 4268 is indefinitely postponed.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT WITH RESPECT TO FUTURE PROCEEDINGS AT THE PRESENT SESSION

Mr. LUCAS. I now renew the proposed unanimous-consent agreement, under the terms and conditions stated a moment ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Including the reference to the bill which has just been passed?

Mr. LUCAS. That is correct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The agreement as reduced to writing is as follows:

Ordered, That at the conclusion of its business today the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon on Tuesday, December 26, 1950, that immediately after the convening of the Senate on said day the Presiding Officer shall, without debate and without the transaction of business of any nature, declare the Senate in recess until 12 o'clock noon on Friday, December 29, 1950; that immediately after the convening of the Senate on said day of Friday, December 29, 1950, the Presiding Officer shall, without debate and without the transaction of business of any nature, declare the Senate in recess until Tuesday, January 2, 1951, at 11 o'clock a. m.

Ordered further, That on said day of Tuesday, January 2, 1951, a motion shall be in order that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference reports on the following bills, namely:

H. R. 9920. An act making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, and for other purposes;

S. 4266. An act to amend and extend title II of the First War Powers Act, 1941; and

H. R. 9798. An act to authorize a Federal civil defense program, and for other purposes.

Provided, That not to exceed 1 hour's debate shall be permitted on each of said conference reports, to be equally divided between those favoring and those opposing said reports and controlled as follows: In the case of H. R. 9920, by Mr. MCKELLAR and Mr. BRIDGES, respectively; in the case of S. 4266, by Mr. MCCLELLAN and Mr. TAFT, respectively; and in the case of H. R. 9798, by Mr. KEFAUVER and Mr. SALTONSTALL, respectively.

STUDY OF MENTAL AND PHYSICAL SEQUELAE OF MALNUTRITION AND STARVATION SUFFERRED BY CERTAIN INTERNEES OF WORLD WAR II—REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, from the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, I ask unanimous consent to report favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 8848) to provide for a study of the mental and physical sequelae of malnutrition and starvation suffered by prisoners of war and civilian internees during World War II, and I submit a report (No. 2699) thereon. The committee this afternoon unanimously recommended the passage of this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the report will be received, and the bill will be placed on the calendar.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 555) making temporary appropriations for the fiscal year 1951, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. CHAVEZ obtained the floor.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, that I may ask a question of the majority leader?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I yield, provided I do not lose the floor.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, before Senators leave, I should like to ask the distinguished majority leader when he proposes to call the calendar. Some Senators are very much interested in it.

Mr. LUCAS. We agreed to call the calendar immediately following disposition of this bill.

Mr. WHERRY. That is correct.

Mr. LUCAS. As soon as we can clear the way, we can proceed to the call of the calendar.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I wish very humbly to suggest that I have been waiting 2 days to make some remarks, and I intend to seek recognition by the Chair as soon as the Senator from New Mexico concludes. I hope I shall not take long, and that Senators will indulge me for a few moments so that I may make some remarks I have been waiting for some time for an opportunity to make.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico yield?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I yield, on the same condition.

Mr. WHERRY. I may say to the distinguished Senator from Florida that there are several other Senators who are also waiting; there is no doubt about that. But there are many Senators who are interested in having a call of the calendar. It is only two and a half pages long, and I am satisfied it will take only a few moments, because its consideration is to be limited to unobjected-to bills. I am satisfied that, if we could call it, we could complete it within a very short time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Mexico.

A FOREIGN LEGION FOR FREEDOM

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, today, only 3 days before Christmas, it is a sad commentary on Christian people and on present-day civilization that, instead of praising God on high and asking for peace and good will to men, we find it necessary to discuss matters having to do with the destruction of God's creatures. One can readily understand why that is possible, when even those of our friends with whom we are associated in the United Nations do not implore the guidance of God in their deliberations upon what purport to be noble efforts in the interest of humanity and peace. It appears that we have reached the point in our civilization, especially in this country, where, after the Chaplain has led us in prayer each day, we find it necessary at times to discuss matters having to do with destruction, with death, with blood, with suffering, and despair.

A few days ago I made a short statement to the Senate, trying to give this body and the American people and the Congress a plan of action to be followed if we are to carry on and not have the sad experiences we are undergoing in Korea. It was on December 6 that I made the statement, declaring that the United States should not recognize communistic China, and that in furtherance of the efforts of the United States to oppose the communistic world, and in the interest of liberty and freedom, it was my opinion it would become necessary for this country to sponsor a foreign legion composed of men from all nations who believe in a free world and who are willing to fight for such freedom. Today I desire to elaborate on the main objective.

I understand a conference was held in Europe within the past few days, in which our leading foreign officer participated. I do not believe that the American people are convinced that the governments represented at that conference want to cooperate with us to the full extent that is necessary, though I am satisfied in my own mind that in those countries there are thousands, yes, millions of people who are willing to fight for freedom and liberty. I have faith in the millions of people in Europe and in Asia, who are willing to fight on our side, but I have no confidence that certain governments will do their utmost in that behalf.

The main objective, as I see it, is to utilize the youth of the world in an appropriate division of the armed forces of the United States. This program is based on the world-wide faith in religion and in the worthiness and dignity of the individual—things which are inherently and diametrically opposed to communism. Communism is paganism. It denies the existence of God. It preaches that there is no hereafter. I do not believe that, and I do not think the American people do, either. Communism worships power for the sake of power alone, vested in the state, and it is interested only in the use of that power for the exploitation of individual men and women. The youth of the world will enlist to destroy this pagan menace. All that is needed is a rallying point and a practical, common-sense program. I suggest to those who attend conferences such as the one recently held in Brussels, to which I have referred, that the legion of the world would be recruited first, under the United States Army, with the consent and cooperation of other governments, limited to a fixed number from each country. Recruiting may be limited to men between the ages even of 18 and 21.

Second, notwithstanding my feelings toward the United Nations as a result of its stand with respect to religion, but recognizing that they have certain laudable purposes in mind, if they will only carry them out, I would say that that army should be made available to the United Nations. They could be recruited, trained, fed, housed, and equipped as a branch of and on a par with United States troops; otherwise, they would not fight. Rates of pay may be adjusted. However, an attractive basic minimum rate of pay, including insurance benefits, family allotments, and other benefits should be provided.

Mr. President, only a short time ago Mr. Joseph Kennedy, who had been Ambassador to Great Britain, made, at the University of Virginia, what was in many respects an outstanding talk. Mr. Kennedy suggested that a start can be made among the peoples of the Western Hemisphere. Night before last a similiar suggestion was made by former President Hoover. In that particular respect I agree with him. Remember, I have said "in that particular respect." I think we have been missing the boat by not taking care of the Western Hemisphere from Hudson Bay to Patagonia. It is the only place that can grow; it is still young.

Mr. President, the cost of the program will be paid for by industrial production.

Only last week Mr. Edward Miller, Assistant Secretary of State for Latin America, issued a call to the 21 nations south of the American-Mexican border. I am glad that call was issued. I am in favor of it.

Approximately 2 or 3 weeks ago the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MALONE], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. KEM], and I were in Central America. The people of that area are our friends, but I received the impression, in many instances, and I know the other two Senators received the same impression, that, notwithstanding the desire of those people to send their boys to fight along with ours and to help out and be friendly and neighborly, they felt that about the only time any attention was paid to them by official Washington was when there was a so-called emergency.

A large proportion of the moneys used to pay the soldiers of the Legion of the World, including the benefits to their families, would inevitably go to the foreign countries involved, and would, in turn, be used to buy American goods. This means that the program would be largely paid for by industrial production, conserving our gold and silver reserves and our technical skills.

In turn, our industrial capacity must be expanded sufficiently through Government aid, if necessary, to meet the military needs and also to provide sufficient quantities of goods for export to satisfy the foreign demand created by the program. Of course, provision should be made for the importation of necessary raw materials. With sufficient Government encouragement for the expansion of industrial capacity, no one need worry about possible overexpansion. The times are too critical.

Only yesterday a bill was passed authorizing the expenditure of $1,800,000,000 additional for General Services for the procurement of raw materials.

Moreover, Mr. President, in order to meet the increased stress on our international-credit structure, necessarily caused by the exigencies of war, we must increase our metallic reserves. The only practical way to do that is to subsidize the production of gold and silver, as Canada has already done in the case of gold, both here and abroad, and, again, purchases of gold and silver abroad could be paid for with civilian goods.

My next suggestion is fighting communism with the weapon of hard money.

The rule of communism, everywhere, is largely based on the use of paper money, backed only by force. A study of the history of the financial operations of the Communists in Asia discloses that they are largely based on the use of paper money. What is there in Communist China now except a few I O U's which the people of the country are obliged to take at the point of a gun?

The competition of hard money would go far to disrupt the whole financial and economic structure of Communist rule, and, indeed, to undermine its entire foundation. We could do more in China today with Roosevelt dimes than we could with many other things.

Thus, hard money, silver in small coin denominations, should be infiltrated among the people of the many Communist countries where silver is acceptable—and in China silver is acceptable—through whatever means may be available. They might not know anything about an American bond, but they do know an American silver dollar and a Mexican peso. Such small coins should be distributed in the largest volume possible, because, with their very small denominations, by our standards, only a relatively small amount of our reserves would be involved. These small coins would naturally inspire confidence and would provide devastating competition with paper money; indeed, an influence infinitely greater in importance, because of the psychological effect, than the mere dollar value involved.

We can fight communism with the picture of democracy. We must hold out an ultimate hope for something better than communism, and that can be done through a public-relations campaign. A contemporaneous public-relations campaign should therefore be undertaken to portray what can be done. We should dramatize what can be done with a stable currency and loans for development, such as power and irrigation. Assistance along the lines of point 4 and the strikingly successful program of the Institute of Inter-American Affairs, to marshal the resources of labor and raw materials of such countries should be provided. The people should be bombarded with pictures of dams, industries, and so forth, and pamphlets and other orthodox media should be used consistently and intensively. Who knows but that we may, sooner or later, be dependent upon the raw materials of these countries for our own existence?

A NATURAL SUPPLEMENT TO THE MARSHALL PLAN

The Marshall plan has awakened the world to the menace of communism and has built up tremendous good will for the United Nations and also for the United States. But apparently political conditions preclude any attempt at large-scale induction by these foreign countries, in the absence of an obvious threat of imminent invasion. That has been the history up to the moment. Yes, they took the money, and we were glad to give it to them. They have progressed economically and financially. When it comes to the question of what they are going to do in the way of military personnel, their answer is, "Not anything." In addition, these foreign countries cannot offer, at the present time, attractive terms of enlistment for large numbers of troops.

Hence, in enlisting the youth of the world, the program described would capitalize on the results of the Marshall plan and lead the way toward world reconstruction. I believe it would work if only we would give it a chance to work.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. MALONE, Mr. PEPPER, Mr. McFARLAND, and Mr. BYRD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In accordance with the Chair's list of Senators, the junior Senator from Nevada is to be recognized. The Senator from Nevada.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield for a question?

Mr. MALONE. I yield with the understanding that I do not lose my right to the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the acting majority leader whether it is his intention to call the calendar today. I understand several speeches are to be made. Senators who have expressed themselves as wishing to address the Senate are the Senator from Nevada, the Senator from Florida, and the Senator from Utah.

Mr. McFARLAND. It was not my understanding that the Senator from Nevada intended to make an address.

Mr. WHERRY. I refer to the junior Senator from Nevada.

Mr. McFARLAND. I had hoped that we could call the calendar and dispose of measures listed on the calendar to which no objection is made. Extensive investigations have been made with respect to the measures on the calendar, and it is quite an expense to put measures on the calendar. I hope the Senate will be willing to stay in session and dispose of the calendar. Of course, if it gets too late, we will not be able to dispose of the calendar.

Mr. WHERRY. I submit that if we start on the scheduled speeches—and I will be present to hear them—in all likelihood we will not be able to get a quorum. I submit the thing to do is to wait until January 2 to call the calendar. Furthermore, I understand the Executive Calendar is to be called today.

Mr. McFARLAND. It may not be possible to call the legislative calendar on January 2. Some of the bills may have to go to conference.

Mr. WHERRY. I do not want to disagree with the acting majority leader. However, my opinion is that if we do not have a quorum present most bills will be objected to, and we will not accomplish anything.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I inquire who has the floor?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The junior Senator from Nevada has the floor.

DAY OF PRAYER

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the junior Senator from Nevada yield to me?

Mr. MALONE. I am hapy to yield provided I may do so without prejudice to my right to the floor.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, a resolution submitted by me has been acted upon by the Committee on the Judiciary, and reported favorably by unanimous vote of the committee. I wonder if it would be agreeable to the junior Senator from Nevada to have the resolution considered at this time. I refer to Senate Resolution 378. Its consideration would not take more than 2 minutes.

Mr. MALONE. I shall be happy to yield provided I may do so without prejudicing my right to the floor.

Mr. McCARRAN. If consideration of the resolution takes more than 5 minutes I shall withdraw my request. The purpose of the resolution is to set aside a national day of prayer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I understand that this resolution was on the calendar when the calendar was called the last time and that the House passed a similar resolution. In view of the circumstances involved, I have no objection to having the resolution considered at this time. However, it must not be considered that a precedent is set thereby and that the doors are opened to permit consideration of every measure that is not passed on the call of the calendar.

Mr. McCARRAN. The Senator is slightly in error. The resolution was not on the calendar on the last call. I submitted the resolution after the call of the calendar. It was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and the committee reported the resolution yesterday.

Mr. WHERRY. I understand a similar resolution is on the calendar of the House of Representatives. That is the resolution I was referring to. A House Member had offered the resolution, and he suggested to the Senator that a similar one be introduced in the Senate. I said I would not object to it. I have no objection to the consideration of the resolution at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nevada?

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 378) to set aside a national day of prayer was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Whereas our country is in an hour of dire danger in which hostile forces, acting without conscience and guided by a godless ideology, threaten the very survival of our cherished institutions; and

Whereas, while we must mobilize our material resources to meet this threat, we are also deeply conscious of the fact that the moral and spiritual resources of our people constitute the Nation's great bulwark in times of national crisis; and

Whereas the churches of the Nation, of all creeds and faiths, are the instruments through which our moral and spiritual resources can best be marshaled and given strength: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate suggests that the churches of the Nation, of all creeds and faiths, set aside and dedicate, Sunday, December 24, 1950, as a time for prayers and supplication for divine guidance of the men and women, elected and appointed, civilian and military, on whose shoulders rests the responsibility for leadership in this time of great crisis, and for strength and unity to enable our people to persevere, with other freedom-loving people, in the effort to bring about peace and justice in the world.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, would the junior Senator from Nevada and the senior Senator from Florida please yield, provided it is agreeable to the leadership, so that we may consider the Executive Calendar at this time?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, in the 14 years I have been a Member of this body, I have always endeavored to be considerate of the rights and interests of my colleagues. I am willing to defer delivery of my address until later. I should be glad to defer delivery of it even until such time when no one is present in the Chamber but a substitute for the Chair. I am perfectly willing to defer delivery of my address until after the calendar is called, if the Senate desires to call the calendar.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, would the senior Senator from Nevada give some indication as to how long it would take to consider the Executive Calendar?

Mr. McCARRAN. I do not think it would take more than 5 or 10 minutes.

Mr. MALONE. Does the Senator refer to nominations on the Executive Calendar.

Mr. McCARRAN. There are two nominations on the Executive Calendar

Mr. MALONE. I am happy to yield for that purpose, provided I may do so without depriving me of my right to the floor.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. McCARRAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting several nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no reports of committees, the nominations on the Executive Calendar will be stated.

CALIFORNIA DEBRIS COMMISSION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Lt. Col. William R. Shuler, Corps of Engineers, to be a member of the California Debris Commission.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

UNITED STATES ATTORNEY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Frank J. Parker, of New York, to be United States attorney for the eastern district of New York.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

UNITED STATES MARSHAL

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, there has been reported today the nomination of Ben Ivy King, of Tennessee, to be a United States marshal for the western district of Tennessee. I have conferred with the members of the Committee on the Judiciary. It is agreeable to them, and I ask unanimous consent that the nomination of Mr. King be confirmed by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, out of order, I should like to report, the nomination of Cornelius F. Reardon, of Billings, Mont., to be collector of customs for the customs collection district No. 33, and ask unanimous consent that the nomination be confirmed. The nomination was ordered reported unanimously by the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary or the acting majority leader whether the nomination of former Senator Leahy is on the calendar, or whether it is to be considered by the Committee on the Judiciary? The reason I ask the question is that I understand the former Senator is desirous that this body, in which he served, confirm his nomination. I should like to have the RECORD show that, if it is the desire of the Senator from Nevada or of the acting majority leader to bring up the nomination at this time, I would have no objection to its consideration.

Mr. McCARRAN. The matter of former Senator Leahy's confirmation to a judicial position was brought to the attention of the Committee on the Judiciary yesterday. Former Senator Leahy is to be appointed to fill a place which must be vacated and which is not vacant at the present time. It must be vacated by promoting the present occupant of the bench to another position. The Committee on the Judiciary was not content to take action on the latter nomination without some knowledge of the individual and reports from the bar association.

Mr. WHERRY. Does the Senator expect that that may happen between now and January 2?

Mr. McCARRAN. We have published the notice which is required under the rule so as to bring the nomination forward as soon as the opportunity is presented.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of Cornelius F. Reardon to be collector of customs for customs collection district No. 33?

The nomination was confirmed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the President will be notified of all nominations confirmed this day.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

The Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I should like to make a suggestion with reference to the call of the regular calendar. The Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], in his usual friendly spirit, has offered to postpone his address until after the calendar is called. I wonder if the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MALONE] would be willing to do likewise? It will not take more than a few minutes to complete the call of the calendar.

Mr. MALONE. Let me say that it will take only about 5 or 6 minutes to complete my address. I am sure that it will take much longer than that to call the calendar.

ABANDONMENT OF AMERICAN FORCES IN KOREA ON THE EVE OF CHRISTMAS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada may proceed.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, on page 4 of the Times-Herald of this morning is written a tragedy of the ages.

FIRST TIME IN HISTORY OF NATION

For the first time during the 175 years of this Nation's existence there is recorded the complete abandonment of an American Army by this Nation on the eve of Christmas eve. The two news dispatches are side by side.

TOTAL CASUALTIES TO DECEMBER 12, 42,992

The first records the total of American losses in Korea up to December 12 as 42,992. They are probably much greater at this time. Those represent the dead, wounded, and missing. Eleven thousand nine hundred and sixty-four of these accrued in the 18 days preceding December 12.

THE UNITED NATIONS COMMITTEE CABLED THREE TIMES

During that period the committee appointed by the United Nations to bring about a "cease fire" in Korea has cabled to the Chinese Communist Government in Peking three times requesting them to halt the war in Korea.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MALONE. I yield.

Mr. KILGORE. The Senator spoke about the losses in Korea. Does the Senator have the apportionment of the losses as between casualties from wounds, casualties by death, and casualties by loss?

Mr. MALONE. The number stated represents the dead, wounded, and missing—I do not have the exact number of each.

THE THREE-MAN COMMITTEE OF UNITED NATIONS

The three-man committee is made up of the United Nations representatives from India, Iran, and Canada. Two of these nations have themselves recognized Communist China, and the third is a part of the empire of a nation which has recognized Communist China.

THREE REQUESTS—ONE ACKNOWLEDGMENT

The second news dispatch records that today the committee has sent the third request to the Communist capital of China requesting them to cease fire. The committee is called the "cease fire" committee.

THE PRESIDENT WASHED HIS HANDS OF AMERICAN ARMY

Mr. President, the President of the United States sent the American boys into the so-called police action on June 26. On June 27 the United Nations passed a resolution supporting that action, by request of the President. The President promptly washed his hands of all responsibility for the American boys engaged in that bitter warfare in the cold, stormy, mountainous regions of central and northern Korea.

UN HELD MAC ARTHUR ON THE THIRTY-EIGHTH PARALLEL

The United Nations held MacArthur on the thirty-eighth parallel for 10 days, while the North Koreans re-grouped and called the Chinese Communists to their assistance.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MALONE. I am very happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. KILGORE. Do the figures which the Senator has given include the casualties of the Turks, the Australians, the British, the French, the Indochinese, and other members of the United Nations?

Mr. MALONE. They include the American casualties only. We have 90 percent of the troops in that area, and more than 90 percent of the casualties.

Mr. KILGORE. I am not disputing the statement of the Senator. I simply wished to know if the figures were all-inclusive, and whether or not they included the total casualties within the area, among all the forces engaged.

Mr. MALONE. The figures are for American troops only. We have 90 percent of the United Nations troops in Korea and it is reported more than 90 percent of the casualties.

We have completely abandoned our troops. If the distinguished Senator from West Virginia has any other information, the junior Senator from Nevada would be very glad to hear it.

Mr. KILGORE. I am seeking information.

Mr. MALONE. The junior Senator from Nevada is very glad to furnish it.

Mr. KILGORE. I merely wished to get it.

Mr. MALONE. The Senator has it now, I believe.

Mr. KILGORE. My information is to the effect that the heaviest casualties have been among the Turks.

Mr. MALONE. I have just stated that the total casualties for American troops were 42,992—the Turks alone may have had heavy losses—I do not know the exact figures, but altogether the American losses are reported heavier in proportion to the remainder of the United Nations forces.

Mr. KILGORE. May I say to the Senator from Nevada that I am asking if he includes the battle casualties, by death, by wounds, and by capture, along with the frostbite casualties, and if he has any information about the losses within the various Allied arms. There are some Allied arms. There is a British brigade; there is a Turkish brigade, and there are two or three other battalions.

Mr. MALONE. The entire United Nations troops in addition, I am informed make no more than 10 percent—the Americans 90 percent.

Mr. KILGORE. I was just wondering if the distinguished Senator from Nevada has those figures to place in the RECORD.

NINETY PERCENT UNITED NATIONS ARMY AMERICANS

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I have answered the question of the distinguished Senator from West Virginia twice. I shall now answer it a third time.

The total losses of American troops to December 12 is given as 42,992 dead, wounded, and missing. The figures include all of the American armies in Korea. Ninety percent of the personnel of the United Nations armies in Korea is made up of Americans, and more than 90 percent of the casualties are said to be represented by Americans.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KILGORE. May I ask this question——

Mr. MALONE. I decline to yield further to the Senator from West Virginia on account of the press of business before the Senate and the desire to complete my address.

Mr. KILGORE. I merely wished to know from the Senator from Nevada——

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, may we have order? The Senator from Nevada has declined to yield.

Mr. KILGORE. Has the Senator from Nevada information——

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I believe that we have answered the question of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, may we have order in the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada declines to yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President——

Mr. MALONE. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. WATKINS. The question which was raised in my mind by the answer of the Senator from Nevada is this: Does the total number of casualties include also the casualties of the South Koreans, the Republic of Korea?

Mr. MALONE. It represents the American casualties alone.

Mr. WATKINS. Were there only forty-two-thousand-odd for all the forces?

Mr. MALONE. The American dead, wounded, or missing since the outbreak of the Korean War are 42,992.

Mr. President, I wish to correct a misunderstanding with the distinguished senior Senator from West Virginia. The figures include only American losses.

Mr. KILGORE. That is the point I am getting at.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield, and if so to whom?

Mr. MALONE. I yield first to the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. WATKINS] until we complete this particular colloquy. Then I shall yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. WATKINS. I had understood that the casualties for the South Koreans far outnumbered all the other casualties of the United Nations put together, and that the figures which the Senator was reading a few moments ago included only the American casualties, and not those of any other nation.

AMERICAN ARMY ABANDONED

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, that is true and the point I am making is that our American Army is abandoned in Korea tonight. No word has been sent to them by the President of the United States, that they are receiving reinforcements, that they are to abandon Korea, or that they are being furnished reinforcements or help of any kind whatsoever.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield?

Mr. MALONE. Yes.

Mr. KILGORE. I think the distinguished Senator has brought this matter to a crux.

Mr. MALONE. I hope so.

Mr. KILGORE. After a considerable amount of questioning, the Senator has given us the total American casualties; is that correct?

Mr. MALONE. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. KILGORE. From what source is that derived?

Mr. MALONE. From a United Press dispatch dated Tokyo, December 21. It reads:

THE UNITED PRESS DISPATCH

United States forces in Korea suffered 11,964 casualties in their first 18 days of heavy fighting with Chinese Communist troops, General MacArthur's headquarters disclosed today.

The toll for November 24 through December 12 raised American dead, wounded, or missing since the outbreak of the Korean War to 42,992.

That does not include the losses suffered in the last 11 days which, under the conditions, may have been heavy.

Mr. KILGORE. I hope the Senator realizes I am trying to simmer this down to our own losses.

Mr. MALONE. Yes.

Mr. KILGORE. And the distinguished Senator from Nevada says he has simmered them down so they include the total losses from the first day we went into Korea.

Mr. MALONE. From June 27 to December 12.

Mr. KILGORE. Until a certain date. And what is that date?

Mr. MALONE. From the beginning until December 12 the total is 42,992.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. MALONE. I yield.

Mr. KILGORE. Can the Senator break the figures down. We have had some naval losses, marine losses, Army losses, and Air Force losses. Does the total the Senator has given include the Army, Navy, Air Force, and Marine Corps?

Mr. MALONE. This dispatch gives the figure of American Army losses through December 12 to 42,992. I read:

By divisions, American casualties in part total: First Cavalry, 443; First Marine, 2,891; Second Infantry, 4,131; Third Infantry, 650; Seventh Infantry, 2,097; Twenty-fourth Infantry, 146; Twenty-fifth Infantry, 1,605.

Mr. KILGORE. The Senator read Third Infantry. That infantry division is stationed at Fort Myer. Does not the Senator mean the Third Division?

Mr. MALONE. I am reading from the dispatch.

Mr. KILGORE. Can the Senator give us a list of losses of other soldiers, Koreans, Turks, British, and others of the United Nations soldiers?

NEVER BEFORE UTTERLY ABANDONED OUR ARMY

Mr. MALONE. We do not have the exact list. I am concerned with the American Army, which has been abandoned in Korea on the eve of a Christmas eve for the first time in 175 years. We have never before utterly abandoned an Army.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, does the Senator say we have abandoned the American Army in Korea, and if so, upon what is that statement based? Has it been abandoned by the Commander in Chief, General MacArthur, by the Nation, or by the Congress?

Mr. MALONE. By the Commander in Chief. The Commander in Chief is in the White House.

Mr. KILGORE. No; the only man who can abandon an army is the commander in chief in the field. Is that not right?

Mr. MALONE. What I said is that we in Washington have abandoned the Army to its fate.

Mr. KILGORE. When the Senator says, "We in Washington," may I ask the Senator from Nevada exactly what he means by the words "we in Washington"?

THE PRESIDENT ABANDONED THE AMERICAN ARMY

Mr. MALONE. I mean the President of the United States who is the Commander in Chief of all of the armies of the Republic.

Mr. KILGORE. Does the Senator mean the Congress?

Mr. MALONE. I mean the President of the United States sent those armies first into Korea in the so-called police action, and started the war with Communist China and almost immediately completely abandoned them to that helpless, inept organization known as the United Nations.

Mr. KILGORE. Then may I ask the distinguished Senator from Nevada if his use of the word "we" is the editorial we? Does the Senator from Nevada charge the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief, with abandoning the Army in Korea?

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, the President of the United States sent these troops into Korea as Commander in Chief, and then washed his hands of all responsibility, by turning them over to the United Nations. He has done nothing since.

Mr. KILGORE. I may say that the Senator from Nevada begs the question. Let me ask the Senator again if he charges that the President of the United States has abandoned the American troops in Korea.

Mr. MALONE. Is that the Senator's question?

Mr. KILGORE. That is the question.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I shall answer the question by saying that he has done nothing since he ordered the so-called police action which resulted in the war with Communist China.

Following his police-action order on June 26, he promptly turned them over to the United Nations. The United Nations has done nothing but send telegrams. We have had no promise of reinforcements; we have had no promise of supplies. The soldiers in Korea have not been told to stand and fight or to get out of Korea.

The President and the United Nations combination have done the unpardonable thing—they have done nothing—they have left the armies on their own while they fiddled around.

Mr. KILGORE. Then the distinguished Senator from Nevada says that the United Nations has abandoned our forces in Korea along with the other forces, is that right?

THE UNITED NATIONS HELPLESS BLUNDERING

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, the United Nations could not abandon anything because they have no responsibility and cannot of course direct an army. But the President of the United States did have a responsibility for our troops and he has not discharged it—nor directed anyone else to do so.

The United Nations, Mr. President, held MacArthur on the thirty-eighth parallel for 10 days while the North Koreans could regroup and call up Chinese Communists to their assistance.

That same United Nations, Mr. President, held MacArthur on the boundary of Manchuria on the theory that by avoiding any destruction of bases beyond the Manchurian border Communist China would stay out of the fight.

Also MacArthur was forced to let the Communist Chinese regroup behind the lines without interference and to try to stop them on the line of scrimmage—like a football team.

MR. MARSHALL'S AGRARIAN REFORMERS

During this period Communist China came in a million strong and we found ourselves fighting a combination of the North Korean and the Chinese Communist Army. We were at war with Communist China—those agrarian reformers discovered by Mr. Marshall in China early in 1946.

Mr. President, no positive action has been taken by the President or by the United Nations during this time. The President sent the boys into Korea in the first place, but has taken no further action while 43,000 boys have been killed, wounded, or have been lost, American boys.

ABANDONED OUR FIGHTING MEN—FIRST TIME IN HISTORY

Mr. President, we find now on the eve of a Christmas eve we seemingly have abandoned our fighting men for the first time in history. The President has not said, "Stand and fight." He has not said, "Reinforcements are coming." He has not said, "Get out of Korea." He has said nothing.

The United Nations of course are incapable of taking action. So, Mr. President, we have done the unthinkable and unpardonable thing. We have abandoned our boys at this time to their fate.

THE FESTIVITIES IN WASHINGTON GO ON

The festivities in Washington go on as usual. It would seem impossible for a real American to enjoy such a procedure.

SHAMEFUL BLOT ON AMERICAN HISTORY

Mr. President, it is a shameful blot on American history. Remember that 90 percent of these boys are ours, and that more than 90 percent of the losses have been suffered by them.

THE "POLICE ACTION" IRONY—HOME BY CHRISTMAS MYTH

They are the boys who thought they were going into a police action and be home by Christmas.

A grand Christmas it will be for them when they realize that their fathers and mothers paid the taxes that armed the Communists through the Marshall plan through the nearly 100 trade treaties that the 16 ECA nations have made with Eastern European nations and Russia. When they finally realize that the two principal European nations, England and France, have separate nonaggression pacts with Russia reading startlingly like the North Atlantic Pact, and are ready to take their choice when the fight really starts—that they never really had a chance.

THE TOKYO DISPATCH

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at this point in the RECORD there be printed two dispatches. The first is a United Press dispatch from Tokyo dated December 21, outlining the loss of 42,992 American boys up to and including December 12, and 11,964 suffered by the United States troops in their first 18 days of heavy fighting with Chinese Communist groups.

THE AMERICAN LOSSES DISPATCH

I ask the United Press dispatch from Tokyo may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the dispatch was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ELEVEN THOUSAND NINE HUNDRED AND SIXTY-FOUR CASUALTIES SUFFERED BY UNITED STATES IN 18 DAYS

TOKYO, December 21.—United States forces in Korea suffered 11,964 casualties in their first 18 days of heavy fighting with Chinese Communist troops, General MacArthur's headquarters disclosed today.

The toll for November 24 through December 12 raised American dead, wounded, or missing since the outbreak of the Korean War to 42,992.

Other United Nations units, exclusive of South Korean, reported 1,011 casualties during the 18-day period for over-all Allied losses of 12,975. Communist casualties in the same period were put at nearly 130,000 men.

ESCAPE LOSSES INCLUDED

The figures covered the fighting from the start of MacArthur's ill-fated "win-the-war" offensive in northwest Korea to the escape of 60,000 Communist-encircled United States marines and infantrymen into the Hungnam beachhead in northeast Korea.

During those 18 days, the UN Eighth Army in the northwest retreated 125 miles from the Chongchon River line to the approaches to Seoul and the Tenth Corps fought its way back 60 miles from the Chosin reservoir to Hungnam. Both were under attack by overwhelmingly superior Chinese forces.

A headquarters communique said the casualties were being revealed to refute reports that UN forces had suffered a military disaster in Korea.

By divisions, American casualties totaled: First Cavalry, 443; First Marine, 2,891; Second Infantry, 4,131; Third Infantry, 650; Seventh Infantry, 2,097; Twenty-fourth Infantry, 146; Twenty-fifth Infantry, 1,606.

The Second Infantry Division, hardest hit of the American units, caught the brunt of the Chinese counteroffensive against the allied Chongchon River line above Pyongyang late last month.

Also on the northwest front were the First Cavalry, Twenty-fourth, and Twenty-fifth Infantry Divisions.

YANKS ENCIRCLED

Elements of the First Marine and the Seventh Divisions were encircled by the Chinese on either side of the Chosin reservoir in northeast Korea and had to fight their way through attacking Chinese all the way back to the northeast port of Hungnam, 60 road miles to the south.

GI FAMILIES NOTIFIED OF 36,421 CASUALTIES

The Defense Department said yesterday that American battle casualties in Korea based on notifications to next of kin through December 15, now total 36,421.

This is an increase of 2,543 over the cumulative total announced a week ago.

The figure is considerably less than the total of 42,992 reported yesterday from Tokyo. However, the Defense Department said the Tokyo figures presumably include medical casualties.

THE HELPLESS "CEASE FIRE" COMMITTEE DISPATCH

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that another United Press news article entitled "Cease-Fire Unit Again Asks Mao To Talk Peace," dated Lake Success, may be printed in the RECORD at this point. It describes the thoroughly helpless "cease fire" committee upon which American lives must depend.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CEASE-FIRE UNIT AGAIN ASKS MAO TO TALK PEACE

LAKE SUCCESS, December 21.—The United Nations cease-fire team sent a third cable to the Chinese Communist Government today, pressing its previous unanswered bids for formal talks on halting the war in Korea.

Secretary General Lie said he hoped the cease-fire group would succeed in stopping the Korean conflict and said it would not be the mediators' fault if they failed.

The United Nations chief reiterated his belief peace could be preserved. He added that the United Nations would survive, no matter what the outcome of the Korean conflict, though he conceded some United Nations Charter principles might suffer.

The mediation team—General Assembly President Nasrollah Entezam of Iran, India's Sir Benegal Rau and Canadian Foreign Minister Lester B. Pearson—sent its first cable to Peiping last Saturday, offering to meet Chinese Communist representatives "here or elsewhere" to discuss terms of a Korean cease-fire. No answer has been received.

A second message went Tuesday night.

The third message was drafted at a 2-hour session today. Pearson, who is in Ottawa, conferred with his colleagues by phone. Canadian delegate R. G. Riddell sat in for his chief through the rest of the session.

Today's message was addressed to Chou En-lai, Chinese Communist Foreign Minister, It said:

"We hope to receive your reply to our earlier messages regarding cease-fire arrangements in Korea. Political Committee of United Nations Assembly has now taken brief recess but will meet again very shortly in order to consider amongst other things a full report from the cease-fire group. We propose to begin preparation of that report next week, and would, therefore, appreciate an early reply from you."

ELEVEN FOREIGN POLICY RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks the 11 foreign policy recommendations made during my Senate address on Thursday, December 14.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PEOPLE AWAKENING TO THEIR PERIL

This is the time of decision. At this time of great crisis I feel more hopeful than I have dared to feel for some time—hopeful because the people are at last awakening to their peril, are becoming aware of its causes, and are showing definite signs of doing something about it. I suggest the following:

First. Forthwith stop assistance of every nature to Communist nations and to nations in any way assisting Russia or her satellites to consolidate Soviet gains and to prepare for world war III.

Second. Stop supporting colonial slavery in any form anywhere.

Third. Oppose with every means at our command the recognition of Communist China by the United Nations.

Fourth. Three suggested approaches to the war in Korea and Asia are as follows:

(a) We could do the obvious, namely, arm Chiang Kai-shek's Nationalists and guerrillas to furnish the foot soldiers for the job. Then, under General MacArthur, we could make the most efficient use of our air power and our Navy, including submarines, to destroy the war-making power of Communist Korea and the aggressor Communist China troops.

(b) We could withdraw from Korea and could arm and equip Chiang Kai-shek's troops and let him do the job. It would require a longer time, but he would engage the Communist forces to the extent that it would be doubtful if they could harass us for a considerable time.

If the first two alternatives are not accepted, we could (c) completely abandon Korea and China—with all of its possible consequences and repercussions.

(d) We can then establish our first line of defense through Japan, Formosa, Okinawa, Guam, the Philippines, Indonesia, New Guinea, and Australia, using ground troops recruited from those countries.

(e) If all of these suggestions are discarded, then we can come home and defend the Western Hemisphere. We must be prepared to defend this continent in any case.

The one thing that we cannot do is to continue the present course of indecision and the nervous jittery attitude, and inactivity until our boys out there either are dead or have climbed aboard the ships.

Fifth. We should inform the governments of Europe which still maintain political and economic agreements with the Soviet Union that these should be terminated at the earliest possible date, as a prerequisite to the continued friendship and assistance of Europe by the United States. Both England and France have separate nonaggression pacts with Russia reading startlingly like the North Atlantic Pact which they have signed with us.

Sixth. Let us give no more money as loans or gifts to any government. Make such loans in the same manner, and under the same rules and regulations, that the RFC loans funds to private business in this country in times of stress. I would not give any money direct to foreign governments as such, and I would not lend taxpayers' funds to private business in a foreign country on less exacting terms than those on which the RFC would make loans to business concerns or private businessmen or GI's in the United States; and furthermore it is not necessary to do so.

Seventh. Build as rapidly as possible a military force, spearheaded by an adequate submarine fleet and an air corps of whatever number of groups may be called for, and install radar equipment to protect the Western Hemisphere.

It will be remembered that in December 1947, or early in 1948, the President received the report of his air-policy commission. The Congress also received the report of a committee, which they had previously appointed. The two reports coincided; both reports contained the statement that the United States needed a 35,000-plane striking force which would cost $16,800,000,000, over a 5-year period to be effective in defense and offense.

What happened to that report? It was buried as is usual with reports not meeting the State Department's peculiar ideas of national defense.

When that report was made, I said on this floor, "Let us refer the report to the Armed Services Committee, and have them determine whether it makes sense. If it is found that the Air Force recommended in the report is what we need, let us build it." If we did that, then we would have sufficient money left over to lend private business in the areas which were important to our ultimate safety. However, those planes have never been built and no further mention of the report was ever made.

Eighth. If the European people will enlist in their own armies and will furnish the ground troops, then—and then only—serve notice on Russia that any move on Europe will be met with an aggressive aerial attack on their means of making war, using every means at our command to defeat their purpose of controlling Europe.

If the people in Europe will not enlist in their own armies, what can we do for them?

The suggestion has been made on the floor of the Senate that we send 20 or 30 divisions of American boys into Europe as bait, to persuade the people of Europe to enlist in their own armies. However, if we sent our boys over there, the European countries would find that they would need an additional 20 or 30 divisions of our American troops, as was the case in World War II, when our forces ultimately constituted approximately 70 percent of the Allied armed forces in Europe.

Ninth. In every possible way, protect and strengthen our national economy, while making all possible speed toward proper preparedness, guard well our national economy; stop wasting the hard-earned dollars of our taxpayers through Marshall-plan and other give-away schemes; and inaugurate a businesslike fiscal policy.

Tenth. Clean up our own Government—throw out the Communists, Communist associates, adherents to foreign ideologies, persons of abnormal moral weakness, and other dangerous security risks.

Eleventh. The Armed Services Committees of the Congress should immediately institute a thorough investigation to determine why we are not prepared to fight a war, considering the huge annual expenditures for that purpose. Where did it go—and why is it not effective?

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a release I have issued dated December 23.

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(For release to all Saturday papers, December 23, 1950)

United States Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, Republican, of Nevada, said today that—

"For the first time in our 175-year history we have completely abandoned an American army and that despite the new and horrible casualty list in the war in Korea, the President is doing nothing to relieve the situation. We have done this unpardonable thing on the eve of a Christmas Eve.

"In the news dispatches we read of the appalling number of dead and wounded boys, nearly 43,000 up to December 12, but we read nothing of positive action on the part of the President," the Nevada Senator said, continuing: "He seems to be spending his time writing letters about all kinds of unimportant personal matters, and the United Nations is spending its time in the impotent action of cabling Peiping, China, to stop the war.

"What action relating to the deplorable Korean situation can the administration point to? Has the President, as Commander in Chief, ordered the evacuation of our ground forces in Korea, to stop the meaningless killings? Has the Commander in Chief ordered the American boys to stand and die rather than retreat? Has the President taken steps to reinforce our troops there, or to completely stop the shipping of supplies to our enemy by United States firms and by nations receiving our Marshall plan aid? Has the President taken steps to get the foot soldiers of the Chinese Nationalists in action? What action is being taken now?

"Apparently, all that has been done is the writing of three notes to the Chinese Reds, not by the United States Government, but by an ineffective UN organization, asking the enemy to please stop—three notes, only one of which has even been acknowledged up to this time—and they are written by a committee, the members of which represent nations which have recognized Communist China. It is high time the President took some positive action, high time he gave more of his attention to matters affecting the lives of all Americans and to establishing an American foreign policy that makes some sense.

"Through this stupid so-called police action, and the still more stupid fiddling around by the United Nations, American blood is strewn from the Manchurian border to the ports of embarkation.

"How anyone who has had anything to do with this whole stupid business can eat a Christmas dinner and enjoy it is beyond my understanding."

PROPOSED CALL OF THE CALENDAR

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of bills on the calendar to which there is no objection, beginning following the end of the last call of the calendar.

Mr. WHERRY. Does the Senator make such a motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLAND in the chair). The Chair rules that such a motion is not in order.

Does the Senator from Arizona request unanimous consent that the Consent Calendar be called at this time?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, permit me to resubmit the statement I made a few minutes ago, namely, that the hour is late—it is now 5:30—and if there is to be a call of the calendar, we should have a quorum call. But we cannot now obtain a quorum.

I humbly beseech the acting majority leader not to have a call of the calendar until later, even though that may be on the second day of January.

A short time ago I asked the chairman of the Judiciary Committee whether there were on the calendar any bills reported by his committee which have to be passed tonight, and he said there were none. Of course, we realize that 50 percent of the bills on the calendar come from his committee.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, notice has been given that the calendar would be called. I concede that only a few bills may be passed during the call of the calendar; but it will take only a short time to have a call of the calendar, and there are on the calendar some bills in which various persons are interested.

Of course, if the Senator wishes to object, that will be all right; then we shall proceed with the next speech.

However, Mr. President, I have asked unanimous consent that the Senate proceed with the call of the calendar. I was asked to make request, and I feel bound to make it.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. WATKINS obtained the floor.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me, to permit me to propound a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. WATKINS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, for some days I have been awaiting an opportunity to address the Senate, in order to make a report which I think would be pertinent in regard to a trip I recently took around the world, and also in order to have an opportunity to submit some views on foreign policy.

It is now 5:30 in the afternoon, and Senators are tired, and we have come to the immediate prospect of the taking of a recess.

I have consulted the Parliamentarian and I find nothing in the unanimous-consent agreement which has been entered which would be contradictory to the unanimous-consent agreement I am now about to propound, namely, that when the Senate convenes on January 2, following a quorum call, the senior Senator from Florida be permitted to address the Senate for a reasonable period of time.

Mr. WHERRY. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, will the Senator please repeat the request?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the senior Senator from Florida may be permitted to address the Senate on the 2d day of January, following the convening of the Senate and after a quorum call is had, and may then address the Senate for a reasonable period of time.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, there are the various conference reports to be acted on at that time. I am willing to dispense with the call of the calendar, but I hope the Senator from Florida will make his speech tonight, rather than on the 2d of January.

I do not know exactly what the situation on January 2 will be. Notice has been given that at that time we shall proceed to consider the conference reports which have been enumerated.

So I hope the Senator from Florida will proceed to make his speech this afternoon.

Let me inquire how long the Senator from Utah expects to take at this time.

Mr. WATKINS. Without any assistance from other Senators, I think I can conclude in 10 minutes. If I get assistance from other Senators, it may take me 20 minutes to conclude.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Florida will make his speech this afternoon.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I do not know of anything in the unanimous-consent agreement which was entered quite recently which would be contradictory to the request I have submitted.

I understand that the only agreement is that certain matters are to be taken up on January 2, and that there will be a limitation on the time available for the disposition of certain of those matters.

If the existing unanimous-consent agreement contains anything contradictory to the agreement I have propounded, I am willing to agree to the fixing of an hour as the over-all limit of the time I would consume—which would seem to me to leave ample time for the disposition of the other matters.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McFARLAND. What was the unanimous-consent agreement which previously was entered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair is not sufficiently advised with reference to the exact details to be able to answer the question. The Chair asks that the unanimous-consent agreement which has been entered be read, or at least that the appropriate part of the agreement, so far as concerns the request made by the Senator from Florida, be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Ordered further, That on said day of Tuesday, January 2, 1951, a motion shall be in order that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference reports on the following bills, namely:

H. R. 9920. An act making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, and for other purposes;

S. 4266. An act to amend and extend title II of the First War Powers Act, 1941; and

H. R. 9798. An act to authorize a Federal civil defense program, and for other purposes.

Provided, That not to exceed 1 hour's debate shall be permitted on each of said conference reports, to be equally divided between those favoring and those opposing said reports, and controlled as follows: In the case of H. R. 9920, by Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. BRIDGES, respectively; in the case of S. 4266, by Mr. McCLELLAN and Mr. TAFT, respectively; and in the case of H. R. 9798, by Mr. KEFAUVER and Mr. SALTONSTALL, respectively.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I renew my request.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senators will defer for just a moment, the Chair will state that the present occupant of the Chair is advised by the Parliamentarian that under the unanimous-consent agreement, as entered, the Senator from Florida could with propriety request his proposed unanimous-consent agreement; and if consent is given, he could fulfill the same under the terms of the present unanimous-consent agreement, in two ways: First, by asking that he be given the floor prior to the bringing up of the first of the conference reports; second, by asking that he be allowed to have the floor upon the conclusion of action upon the conference reports.

The Chair has stated the interpretation of the unanimous-consent agreement as given by the Parliamentarian.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida has the floor.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I thought I was to be recognized upon the conclusion of the statement by the Chair, for the Chair asked me to defer until the Chair could make a statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the Chair recognizes the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I suggest to the distinguished Senator from Florida that if he makes his unanimous-consent request to apply after the conference reports have been acted on, on January 2, there will be no objection then to giving the Senator from Florida an hour's time, at least. I should like to join in the request, because I think the Senator should be treated with all possible courtesy, in view of the fact that he has already waited 2 or 3 days to obtain the floor.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I wish to accommodate the Senator from Florida. I am willing to remain here tonight until midnight, if necessary, to hear the Senator from Florida.

The reason for the division of the time provided by the existing unanimous-consent agreement is that the Democratic caucus is called for 2 o'clock on Tuesday, January 2. Between 11 a. m. and 2 p. m., on January 2, there will not be sufficient time for the Senate to dispose of those conference reports and also to hear the speech of the distinguished Senator from Florida, for the caucus is to be held at 2 p. m. on that day.

So I hope the distinguished Senator will make his speech this afternoon. I know it is asking a great deal of him to do so; but the program for January 2 is entirely full, and I do not see how we could go through with the program unless we follow the arrangements already made.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, what would the Senator suppose would be the program for the remainder of the afternoon, on January 2? Is it contemplated that in view of the calling of the Democratic caucus for 2 p. m. on that afternoon, and the possibility that there will be a Republican caucus at the same time, there may be no session during the remainder of that afternoon?

Mr. McFARLAND. Very possibly. At any rate, I hope the Senator from Florida will make his speech today.

Mr. PEPPER. Very well. Mr. President, I withdraw the request I have made.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the acting majority leader yield for a question?

Mr. McFARLAND. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. If the acting majority leader can point out on the Consent Calendar any measure which has to do with civil defense and which needs to be acted upon between now and January 2, I shall not oppose bringing up those bills on the Consent Calendar, in order to expedite matters.

Mr. McFARLAND. Possibly we can take up such civil-defense measures following the addresses which Senators are to make. However, I do not think there are any such measures on the Consent Calendar.

Mr. WHERRY. Very well.

Mr. McFARLAND. I appreciate the Senator's suggestion.

REMOVAL OF MARKETING PENALTIES ON LONG-STAPLE COTTON

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me for a moment or two?

Mr. WATKINS. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, pursuant to the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska, I wish to inform the Senate that there is on the calendar a bill (H. R. 9832) to remove marketing penalties on certain long-staple cotton. It merely provides that in the case of cotton ginned in one type of gin, the marketing penalty shall not be applied.

Mr. WHERRY. There is no objection to considering the bill, if the Senator believes it urgent. We shall be glad to take it up.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 9832).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Texas for that purpose?

Mr. WATKINS. I yield for that purpose, provided there is no argument.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill mentioned. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 9832) to remove marketing penalties on certain long-staple cotton was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the Senator from Utah very much.

EX-PRESIDENT HOOVER'S SPEECH—AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, within recent days a great American has spoken from his heart to the American people. No one can doubt his sincerity or his motives. Our only living ex-President, Herbert Hoover, has rendered a great service to this country.

Just how far-reaching that service will be, only history can tell. Men may differ with his conclusions. They may not agree to the facts which he assumes to be true, but no American, and more particularly the men in this country who have in charge our foreign policy, should fail to heed his grave warning message, and if they disagree, they should do so only after the most thorough examination and testing of what he has said.

The most profound advice which he has given us is his call for honest men now to state honest differences of opinion and to shape our future course on the anvil of public debate. This courageous stand should inspire all men who are deeply and sincerely interested in their country's future, to stop, look, and listen, so that we can give our foreign policy the complete and exhaustive examination and overhauling it so desperately needs.

It would be tragic indeed if for any reason Mr. Hoover's warning should be smothered with isolationist smears, either laughed off or ignored in order to evade the real issue he has raised. It will be a disservice to this country for men to pat Herbert Hoover on the back with one hand, while they deliberately dig the ground from under his feet with the other.

Mr. President, I speak today as one Senator who had grave questions about many phases of our foreign policy, yet who in spite of those doubts voted for the Greek-Turkey loan, also known as the Truman containment doctrine, and who also voted for the Marshall plan and for our appropriations to implement both these efforts to deter communism and to protect America and the other free nations of the world.

I raised many questions about the advisability of entering into the Atlantic Pact and I proposed reservations which would have preserved America's freedom of action. I announced that if these reservations were accepted I would vote for the pact. The reservations were rejected and I voted against the pact.

In accordance with our constitutional processes, the pact was approved and became the law of the land. As a loyal American I have supported that pact as the law of my country. I sincerely wanted it to succeed, but as the months have gone by since the ratification of the Atlantic Pact, I have heard and read with grave misgivings reports from Europe which indicated that our allies were not actually making progress toward building their defenses, even though heavily supported by us with money and arms.

Approximately 16 months of valuable time have passed since the pact was ratified. As far as visible results are concerned, that time seems to have been largely wasted, if not completely lost.

We were told during the debate that time was of the essence, that it was necessary to get the pact approved and its implementation under way immediately to meet the threats of Communist aggression, not only in Europe but throughout the world.

Necessarily, to make such a pact work as our Atlantic defense, it was necessary to have it in full operation within a very short time to meet the growing Communist threat. Referring again to Mr. Hoover's speech, let me quote:

> It is clear the UN cannot mobilize substantial military forces.

And remember that the Atlantic Pact was supposed to have been organized under and within the framework of the UN Charter.

He further declares:

> It is clear continental Europe has not in the 3 years of our aid developed that unity of purpose and that will power necessary for its own defense. It is clear that our British friends are flirting with appeasement of Communist China.

Again Mr. Hoover emphatically asserts:

> But the prime obligation of defense of western continental Europe rests upon the nations of Europe. The test is whether they have the spiritual force, the will and acceptance of unity among them by their own volition. America cannot create their spiritual forces; we cannot buy them with money.
> You can search all the history of mankind and there is no parallel to the effort and sacrifice we have made to elevate their spirit and to achieve their unity. To this date it has failed. Their minds are confused with fears and disunities. They exclude Spain, although she has the will and means to fight. They haggle with Germany, although she is their frontier. They vacillate in the belief that they are in little danger and hope to avoid again being a theater of war.

Mr. Truman and his Secretary of State, Mr. Acheson, deny these statements of facts and characterizations of Western European psychology. A mere general denial is not enough.

Why should not the President, who is supposed to have all the facts in his possession, give to the American people a bill of particulars? What have our European allies done to this date to prepare their defenses? What specific actions have they taken in the way of creation of defenses, of budgets, of programs actively under way? What have they done besides talking, holding meetings of the Atlantic Defense Council, or of interchanging notes with their allies?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATKINS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I appreciate the questions which the Senator has propounded, because I am in total agreement with him. They are questions the American people are asking today, and they have a right to ask them. I wonder whether the distinguished Senator saw in today's Baltimore Sun an editorial which is along the line of his remarks. Near the end of the editorial, speaking of the American people, the editorial concludes:

> They want to know what the evidence is, pro and con, on the willingness of Europe to contribute to its own defense. They want to know how we want to handle the balky Germans.

The editorial goes on with a statement of various questions to which the Senator from Utah has alluded. If the Senator does not mind, and since this editorial fits in so completely with his remarks, I may say that, although I had intended asking for its insertion in the Appendix of the RECORD, I should like to have it follow at the proper place in the Senator's own remarks, in the body of the RECORD, if possible.

Mr. WATKINS. I should be very glad to accept it and have it placed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Senator very much. I ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

Mr. WATKINS. I may say I saw the editorial a moment before I rose to speak. I think it is along the same line that I am now discussing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATKINS. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I should like to inquire whether the Senator from Utah has had his attention drawn to a statement on this subject by Gen. Lucius D. Clay, who, I think, has never been classified as an isolationist or an appeaser, dealing with the very subject which the Senator is discussing.

Mr. WATKINS. I have not.

Mr. BREWSTER. It is a statement made by him almost a month ago, on November 27, at Charleston, S. C. If the Senator wishes it to be inserted in the RECORD at the close of his remarks, I should like to read it and ask him to insert it at any point he suggests.

Mr. WATKINS. I should be glad to yield to the Senator from Maine in order that he might read it, with the understanding that it be placed at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator request that that be done?

Mr. WATKINS. I so request, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, consent is granted.

Mr. BREWSTER read the statement referred to.

(See exhibit 2.)

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, is there any truth to the persistent stories which come out of France, Italy, and the Benelux countries that their people want to be passively neutral in any war that may arise between the United States and Russia and her satellites? Such rumors have been persisting for many months, in fact, for more than a year, and many persons who have investigated the situation have come back and told us, and their statements are not contradicted, that the common people of those countries have had enough war, do not want to be involved in another war, and would rather have their countries occupied than to fight again.

Only yesterday the President declared that our allies mean business. Is that based on mere promises for future action, or have they put into effect measures which will establish a claim that they do mean business? Let Mr. Truman and Mr. Acheson specify.

No revelation of defense secrets need be involved in giving to the American people information on these questions. If anything has been done to build up defenses, that fact should be revealed to offset the damaging statements that have been made repeatedly, not only by the press, but semiofficially, that little if anything has been done to this date.

Giving the American people the facts—if substantial progress has been made—not theories or promises, will do more to restore the confidence of the people in our present policies with respect to our defense frontiers in the Atlantic area, than all the glittering promises our diplomats can make for future action.

In the words of the Scriptures, let them prove their faith by their works.

This was no doubt the basis for Mr. Hoover's proposal that—

> To warrant our further aid, they should show they have spiritual strength and unity to avail themselves of their own resources. But it must be far more than pacts, conferences, paper promises, and declarations. Today it must express itself in organized and equipped combat divisions of such huge numbers as would erect a sure dam against the Red front. And that before we land another man or another dollar on their shores.

Mr. President, there are still other questions which the President and the State Department should answer to the American people, and the answers to these questions should be given promptly so that they may be considered early in the first session of the Eighty-second Congress.

May I submit these interrogations among others that could be added?

First. What concessions has this administration made to our Western European allies in the Far East?

Second. What arrangements have been made concerning the division and allocation for civilian and military use of strategic materials?

Third. What concessions has this administration made concerning the financing of the rearmament of Western Europe, in proportion to the contributions of our allies? There is no point in shuffling hand-out programs by announcing the termination of ECA on one hand and the gift of $12,000,000,000 in armaments on the other. We desperately need to know what the European nations are determined to do for themselves.

Fourth. What is the maximum manpower potential of the Western European nations themselves which is available for the defense of Europe, and what proportion of that available manpower are they willing to enlist in the program?

Fifth. What is the basic military defense strategy underlying the North Atlantic Pact? Does it call for the defense of anti-Soviet Europe, or just for part of Western Europe?

Mr. President, these are questions to which the American people want answers. Many other questions will be asked from time to time. But I feel that Mr. Hoover has rendered one of the greatest services ever rendered to this country by any patriot in its long history. He has pointed out what is in the minds of literally millions of Americans. They want to know the truth about the entire situation. If the story is a bad one, they can take it. On the other hand, if there are matters with respect to Europe and the defense of Europe and of the free world that are encouraging, they should have the facts. The President should take the American people into his confidence, and that immediately, so that the American people can know what to do about the future course of American foreign policy.

[From the Baltimore Sun of December 22, 1950]

QUESTIONS TO BE ANSWERED

Mr. Hoover has now said what he thinks our foreign policy should be in these years of crisis. Mr. Dewey has said what he thinks it should be. Neither has outlined a complete program, but each has said enough to indicate the general course he wants the Nation to follow.

Between the policies outlined by these men—the one our only living ex-President and the other the titular head of the Republican Party—there is one glaring difference. To all intents and purposes, Mr. Hoover would have us withdraw all support from Europe, save possibly Great Britain. Mr. Dewey, by contrast, does not write Europe off as hopeless. He is certain Britain will fight and he has greater hopes of both France and Italy than Mr. Hoover. He is not wholly convinced that they will make valuable allies, but he thinks it would be a mistake to abandon them now when the general rearmament program under the Atlantic Pact is just getting under way.

These, then, are the two well-developed points of view which have been laid before the American people. Both have their passionate adherents. But the great body of Americans are tremendously puzzled by the whole business. Moreover, nothing that has so far come from either Mr. Truman or Mr. Acheson has served to lessen the general puzzlement.

The American record since the end of the Second World War proves that we lay great stress on the role Western Europe should play in the general struggle against Communist imperialism. Leaving out of account the loans made at the conclusion of hostilities, we have sent billions to Europe with the sole purpose of helping these countries to repair their economies and regain the spiritual tone of which 5 years of war had bereft them.

Specifically, we expected them to rehabilitate their industrial plant. Next we expected them to remove trade barriers so that Western Europe, if not Eastern Europe, would be a free trading area, comparable to the United States. We expected that the material prosperity resulting would of itself revive the flagging wills of these people so that they would be capable of self-defense, if self-defense were necessary.

Some industrial rehabilitation did, in fact, occur in Europe under the stimulus of the Marshall-plan funds. But small progress has been made toward removing trade barriers. Europe, including even Western Germany, seems superficially prosperous, but almost everyone feels that it is a false, almost hysterical prosperity. The revival of spirit, without which little else is important, is a matter of debate, with all too much evidence suggesting that it has not occurred.

It was to stimulate the will to self-defense that the Atlantic Pact was first proposed, then debated, and finally adopted. Under its terms, the United States becomes once more the arsenal of Europe. Also, as has now been decided, General Eisenhower, a man whom all Europe (save perhaps Germany) admires and trusts, has been named to create a unified defense force. Some American troops, perhaps a great many of them, will be a part of this defense force under the plan as discussed. If all goes well, the industry of the German Ruhr, as well as that of Britain, France, and Italy, will contribute a share of the implements of defense.

The knotty question of creating an actual German armed force is still being debated, though almost any military man will tell you that unless the Western Germans participate in the defense of their country there is almost no hope for the rest of continental Europe.

These, then, are some of the issues posed by the addresses of Mr. Dewey and Mr. Hoover. They would not, they could not, have brought them up if they did not feel, as so many of us feel, that the American people are floundering dangerously.

The reason the American people are floundering is not hard to find. They do not trust their present leadership. They know that Mr. Truman is a man of fits and starts. They find in him neither great wisdom nor steadfastness of purpose. They are being convinced, many of them unwillingly, that Mr. Truman is not capable of thinking in the large terms which the crisis demands.

When they turn to Mr. Acheson, they get little comfort. Even if they have not been worried and confused by the charge that he is "soft" with Communists, here and abroad, they are still uneasy. They know that he had a large part in the formulation of the Marshall plan and in its execution. They know that the Atlantic Pact was mainly his idea. But if they come to believe, and it is clear already that many have come to believe, that the Marshall plan has failed and that the continent of Europe will not resist if the Russians attack, then all Mr. Acheson's fine structure will collapse and we shall have to retreat to the lines suggested by Mr. Hoover.

And this, however it may be gilded by the apologists for complete isolationism, is a grisly prospect for 150,000,000 Americans and for the rest of the world too.

The American people cannot and should not follow a leadership which leaves so many life-and-death issues hanging in midair.

They have a right to demand that Mr. Truman and Mr. Acheson make an honest and straightforward effort to tell them the whole story as they see it.

They want to know what the evidence is, pro and con, on the willingness of Europe to contribute to its own defense.

They want to know how we want to handle the balky Germans.

They want to know what will happen to Japan, to the Philippines, to southeast Asia, and our supplies of tin and rubber, to India, and to Australia when we are finally forced to evacuate Korea.

They want to know, in brief, whether Mr. Truman and Mr. Acheson truly understand the fix we are in and what they propose we should do about it.

If these and related questions are not answered soon and with complete candor, our precious national unity will have been lost beyond recovery and the confusion which now grips the country will be replaced by a tragic and destructive isolationism.

EXHIBIT 2

GENERAL CLAY HITS WEST EUROPE APPEASEMENT

CHARLESTON, S. C., November 27.—Gen. Lucius D. Clay, former military governor of West Germany, assailed tonight increasing talk of possible appeasement abroad and said nations which we arm must be willing to fight for freedom.

In the United Kingdom and in Western Europe, Clay said, we are hearing appeasement talk instead of a renewed determination to get ready.

Clay, now New York State civil defense director, spoke to the southern governors' conference here. He questioned the wisdom of economists who, he said, have asserted the Marshall plan could not be used for war production without retarding the economic recovery of the beneficiary countries.

"The reasonable use of production facilities for armament purposes need not adversely affect the soundness of the over-all economy," Clay said. "In Europe and in this country, prosperity has been achieved even when substantial portions of the national productive powers were used."

Clay suggested that we put Marshall plan money into our own war machine unless we get assurance that Western Europe is preparing for a fight for freedom."

He urged the Government to find out what Western Europe is doing to rearm, because there is nothing more important to the success of our fight for freedom than the support of West Europe.

"Unless we can be sure that rearmament is taking place, should we not ask ourselves if any of the money being used to strengthen Europe could be employed more effectively in increasing our own strength.

"Western Germany will still be willing to join us in the defense of Europe," he added, "if the Germans are not made second-class associates."

He said he was not in favor of a preventive war but rather of bringing about "a proper balance in military strength that will make war unprofitable to any aggressor."

The need for that accomplishment is urgent, he said, because as "more and more satellite troops are being pushed into action we are coming dangerously close to a major war."

Mr. BREWSTER. That editorial which I read a few moments ago would seem to be very compelling evidence from a man who knows more about the European situation, certainly, than does any other American at this time, as a result of the 3 years he spent there in rehabilitation work. He speaks with profound knowledge to the very point which the Senator from Utah is seeking to drive home.

Mr. WATKINS. I appreciate the statement. Former President Herbert Hoover, by reason of his residence for many years, not only in Europe, but in China and the Far East, is, in effect, practically a world citizen. I think he is one of the best informed men in the world today on world conditions. Although he is not holding any official position at this tme, I understand he keeps in touch with events all around the world. That enables him to get information which will permit him to give expression of views which have all the force and effect of coming from one of the best informed men in the world today.

Mr. BREWSTER. That is unquestionably the case; and it should be added that General Clay—and I hope the country can take comfort from it—has just been selected by Mr. Charles Wilson as his chief assistant in the production effort at home, and he will seek to develop our own strength in America and be sure it is not wasted in any misadventure.

Mr. WATKINS. America is to be congratulated upon securing the services of General Clay as Mr. Wilson's assistant. I think he has a correct understanding of the European situation.

HIGHWAY CONVENTION WITH REPUBLIC OF PANAMA—REMOVAL OF INJUNCTION OF SECRECY

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLAND in the chair). As in executive session, the Chair lays before the Senate Executive W, Eighty-first Congress, second session, a highway convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama, signed at Panama on September 14, 1950. Without objection, the injunction of secrecy will be removed from the convention; the convention and message from the President will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and the President's message will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The message from the President is as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

With a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith the highway convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama, signed at Panama on September 14, 1950.

I transmit also, for the information of the Senate, the report by the Secretary of State with respect to the convention and a copy of each of two notes exchanged on September 14, 1950, constituting a modus vivendi between the two Governments, together with a translation of the Panamanian note.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

DECEMBER 22, 1950.

Enclosures: (1) Report by the Secretary of State; (2) highway convention with Panama, signed September 14, 1950; (3) copy of each of two notes dated September 14, 1950, with translation of Panamanian note.

REPORT ON WORLD CONDITIONS

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, Senators will recall the famous words of the gladiators in the Roman Colosseum as they entered mortal combat:

O mighty Caesar! We who are about to die salute you.

As one of those whose term is about to expire in this great body, I salute my colleagues. I thank them for their uniform courtesies and their numerous kindnesses. I should like to make a few reports and observations for whatever value they may be to my distinguished colleagues in the service of their country during this period of great crisis.

On the sixth of September, in conjunction with two of my colleagues in the Senate and some Members of the House, I was one of the delegates to the Interparliamentary Union Conference at Dublin, Ireland. The meeting of this old and eminent organization was the occasion for the convening of representatives of 34 nations in the great capital of a great country. I shall not discuss the proceedings of the Interparliamentary Union, but shall refer only to some evidence of the shape of things to come which we heard at the conference. Our delegation made an effort to get through a resolution condemning the aggression which was taking place in Korea. The delegations of the other countries present were agreeable to the adoption of a general resolution. However, they were not willing to insert the word "Korea" in a resolution of condemnation. It reflected some timidity on the part of other countries, which has had some lamentable consequences in more recent times. As I say, it was interesting as evidencing the shape of things to come.

Another resolution, which I am sure my colleagues will recall, was a resolution offered by certain representatives from the Far East—Ceylon, India, and I believe other countries—in which they denounced food policies, particularly of this country. They surmised that those policies contemplated a scarcity of production of food and artificial raising of the price of food in the world market. They pointed out that hundreds of millions of people were starving in Asia, and intimated, even if they did not charge, that much of the starvation and suffering was due to the curtailed production of food in the United States, and that there would be much larger surpluses of food on hand were it not for scarcity production; that there would have been more food available for the starving millions of Asia had we not artificially raised the price in the world market so that they could not buy the food.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. Does the Senator from Florida recall that they pointed to the destruction of food, as well, which they deplored, and, to our great humiliation, denounced us as military colonialists?

Mr. PEPPER. That was embodied in their suggestion. I was going to refer to that a little later in my statement. They assumed falsely that we were destroying food in large quantities in this country. Fortunately, the chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture, Representative COOLEY, from North Carolina, was chairman of our delegation, and to the surprise of our critics our delegation unanimously supported the resolution which was offered. It indicated that we were interested in succoring the starving people of Asia and other parts of the world and made it very clear that we were not squandering or wasting food in this country, or denying it designatedly to those who needed it in any part of the world. We were also advised by delegates from the Middle East that the United States was playing a policy of duplicity, and that while we perpetrated and condemned aggression in Asia we were guilty of it in the Middle East. Of course, they had reference to what had happened with respect to Palestine and Israel, in some respects, and with respect to the policies of certain Western Powers in the Middle East in the past.

However, that is rather a prologue to what I heard on Sunday from someone who had received a report from a representative of his company in Cairo. It is to the effect that when a picture of our President appeared on the screen in the newsreel there were manifestations of displeasure and animosity from the audience in the theater. When the manager of the theater remonstrated with the audience against their protest and their display of animosity, the audience reacted by tearing up the seats in the theater. As I say, those are only some of the ominous signs that we had as a prologue at the Interparliamentary Conference in Dublin. They indicate that there are many parts of the world which either misunderstands the attitude of the American Government and the American people, or were disseminating a propaganda which is desirous of discrediting the policies of our Government and our people and perverting them to mean something they do not mean.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. I think the Senator could well emphasize, as it is unfortunately and tragically true, that within the next 3 months, under present policies, millions of bushels of potatoes will be destroyed, to the very great distress of the Senator from Maine. I also think that everyone appreciates what those potatoes might do in the production of industrial alcohol, or for our rubber-research program. I will not labor the point now. The fact that the foreign countries were talking about it in Dublin is, I hope, something that will persuade our friends in the next Congress to see that something is done about it.

Mr. PEPPER. Of course that relates to a domestic matter, and we know that here at home, and, as I pointed out to the delegates at Dublin, we have a policy and law which would permit those organizations who would like to supply food to the needy to come and get it provided they pay transportation charges across the ocean. We would make the food available to them for nothing. It is probably true that with potatoes and commodities like that they could not without great expense transport them across the ocean, and perhaps it would not be feasible to do so. At the same time, certainly, we are not a heartless and callous country, inconsiderate of the hungry and impoverished people of the world, as some of the critics of our policies would like to have others believe.

While we were in Dublin we heard debate between the spokesmen on both sides on the subject of Ireland's partition. Among those participating in the debate were the Minister for External Affairs of Ireland, Mr. McBride, and Mr. De Valera, the leader of the opposition. One of the participants was a member of the British Parliament who came from the north of Ireland. Another representative who participated was a member of the House of Commons who lived in England. The issue of partition was fairly debated before this international convention of 34 nations.

I may say, Mr. President, that I believe very strongly in what I gave out as a press release before leaving Dublin, that it is in the interest of the security of the Atlantic group that a way be found to eradicate the partition of that great and courageous people of Ireland, and I believe that they should either be a member of the North Atlantic Pact group of nations or at least a member of and participant in the military-aid program, for certainly they are of the greatest value and strategic importance to the security of the Atlantic community. I believe the elimination of the partition that divides Ireland, and allowing those people in a national referendum to determine their own destiny and to choose their own government, is not only in the interest of their unity, but it would also contribute immeasurably to the strength of the Atlantic community.

Mr. President, we spent a very brief period in London. It was obvious from only a superficial observation of England that things were very much better, that there was a far more encouraging attitude on the part of the people to be observed, that the economic strength of the country had been vastly improved and increased by the many programs in which we had participated, and in which we had been the greatest benefactor, and that today Britain was far abler to do her part in preserving freedom and resisting aggression in the world than she would have been had we not given her the great assistance which she has obtained since 1945. She will perhaps do more, although I understand that percentagewise she is doing as much as we are doing at the present time in the way of industrial production, and in building up armed forces. She is making a very material contribution by troops which are actually fighting in Korea. And Britain today deserves commendation for the part she is playing in standing by our side in opposing the aggression which confronts the free world today.

In Germany we found greatly improved economic conditions and a growing demand for a peace treaty and the end of occupation, and repeated assertions that the Germans were not going to furnish troops to defend Western Europe unless they had their own staff, command, and army on equal terms with other Western European nations.

We made a brief stop in Yugoslavia, and, having been to that country in 1945, I found a great change in conditions as I observed them at that time. When I arrived in Belgrade in the fall of 1945 and drove with the Ambassador of the United States from the airport into the city, we passed long lines of people in the streets carrying banners or placards, and chanting words and songs, and a little bit later we heard speakers speaking on a great decorated platform, and all was commendation of Russia or communism, and extolling the virtues of Lenin and Stalin. Of course, Tito was arrayed as one of the Communist immortals along with Stalin and Lenin.

On this visit this year, as is known by my distinguished colleague, the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER], who is doing me the honor of listening now, and was present in Belgrade, as well as two Members of the House of Representatives, Mr. COOLEY, of North Carolina, and Mr. POAGE, of Texas, there would be an occasional picture of Lenin. There was no picture of Stalin anywhere. There were certainly no banners extolling the virtues of Stalin and Russia. There were no Russian flags displayed anywhere.

On the contrary, Marshal Tito told us in the conference we had with him how definite and how final the break was between him and the Kremlin, of the aggression the Kremlin had committed against Yugoslavia, and how determined he was to defend his country, and preserve its integrity and its sovereignty.

He told us about the needs of the country for famine aid on account of the drought which the country had suffered. He told us that the 31 divisions which were attributed to Yugoslavia were not the total military potential of his country, and I believe, having inquired, as we did, of many sources outside of our own Embassy, that the consensus of the informed people is that Yugoslavia will fight if Russia attacks them, and that the resistance they will put up in case of an attack will divert large Russian forces from those we would have to face in other parts of the world. I am sure that the action Congress has recently taken in giving famine aid to the people of Yugoslavia is definitely and directly in the interest of the security of our own country and the free world.

We protested to Marshal Tito against religious persecution for which his government had been responsible. He assured us the whole subject was under consideration by his Government at the present time. I inferred that the Government's policy was going to undergo a favorable change.

We did also have advice that the general attitude of Tito, he being determined in his opposition to the Russian aggression, and his generally friendly attitude toward the Western Powers, was of great value to our country in keeping the Russians from getting a seaport on the Adriatic, constituting less danger to Italy than had existed in the past, that is, less Communist pressure on Italy which would draw it away from the western countries, and also be of value to us in that it removed the pressure which had previously been upon Greece.

It was the opinion of those to whom we talked in Yugoslavia that the breach between Tito and Stalin is a real breach, that the prospect is that it will be of indefinite continuation, that the people are opposed to the domination of their country by Stalin and Russia, that they are opposed to the collectivization of their lands into communal farms, and the confiscation of their property by the Government. It was thought that Yugoslavia having been cut off from economic aid with the satellite countries and with Russia by the attitude of resistance they have taken to the aggression of communism in their country, they have to turn more and more to the Western Powers for economic aid, and gradually, as the Russian aggression becomes more pronounced, they will orient themselves more and more in the western orbit, and become more and more a country which may be depended upon to resist, certainly in Central Europe, the Russian aggression.

Tito also promised at my urging to expedite the return of all Greek children whose parents or the members of whose family would request their return. Later in confering with the Prime Minister of Greece and my reporting Tito's promise to him, the Prime Minister said he would call upon Greek parents or families to request the return of their children at once. Since my return to the United States, a number of these children have been returned to Greece.

As the author of the resolution of the Senate calling upon the President to do all he can to help these children to be returned, the results are particularly gratifying to me. Now that diplomatic relations between Greece and Yugoslavia are being resumed, there is every likelihood all of these Greek children will be returned.

In Greece, where we were for a time, we observed a remarkable economic, political, and morale recovery on the part of the people. A phenomenal job has been done by the American military mission which has been there, and by the economic aid we have given to that country. We have reduced our ECA contribution from $274,000,000 to $208,000,000, because it was felt by our ECA representatives that the local government could do more than it had been doing.

We saw the great work that had been done, and it would give an American's heart joy to see the way the Greek people appreciate the fact that the intervention of the United States, to the extent of protecting them against Communist aggression, has saved their country from outside domination, and given them an opportunity to rehabilitate themselves from the terrible destruction they sustained, and the devastation they experienced in the war.

However, Mr. President, we began to see there a pattern, which we saw repeated many, many times in the Middle East and in other parts of the world, where we found that the Government policies and personnel were simply inadequate to meet the challenge of modern times. For example, their tax policies were so unfair to the masses of the people that one could not expect either adequate revenue or general popular support for those policies. We found that, relatively and generally speaking, the rich pay little taxes. They are often able to bribe or intimidate the tax collector against the collection of the taxes. There is a great deal of corruption in officialdom, and there is, generally speaking, a total lack of a political party that is devoted, genuinely and unselfishly and truly, to the service of the public interest, and that has real democratic progress as well as broad, general goods as the aim and the aspiration of the party. Too often there appeared, as we saw in other countries, the same little cliques running everything, and though governments may change from day to day, basically the people who control public authority are the same people.

Mr. President, I do not mention that in derogation of the great people of Greece, to whom I am devoted, but I mention it as a pattern we observed through almost all the Middle East, and as we go to the Far East, we find it even more pronounced, which indicates there will never be the strength these great people should possess until there arise in all these countries political parties that are truly devoted to the public interest, that will diligently, faithfully, and fearlessly serve the people, which will adopt governmental policies and programs, including tax programs and policies, which are fair to all the people, and which will cause the people to have confidence in the true democracy that actuates the Government, and will cause them to be willing to associate themselves with those policies, even to the point of giving their lives that their country and their high aims may prevail. However, I do want to say that the future of Greece, in my opinion, is bright, for the intrepid spirit and courage of these people has revealed a determination that, no matter how hard the struggle, they are going to see it through, and this ancient home of democracy is not going to become the citadel of any new tyranny which might be devised by those who would be their masters.

In Turkey we found an improving economic condition, largely by the assistance of the ECA, a splendid morale on the part of the government and the people, unflinching courage in the face of Soviet intimidations and threats, and a willingness on their part to fight if they were attacked, to fight until they had stopped the aggressor, or until they had spent themselves in an effort to resist his vicious aggressions.

We were there at a time when the Turkish troops were embarking for Korea. We talked to the head of our military mission there, General Arnold. We came to appreciate the magnificent job General Arnold had done in welding the army into greater strength and unity and power, and we heard from General Arnold an expression of confidence in the showing the Turkish troops would make in Korea. I have followed with acute interest what those troops did there, and I heard stories from some of our people of the valor of these Turkish soldiers. They said that after the Turkish troops had been engaged in a terrible ordeal in resisting Chinese Communists who had come into the affray, after they had suffered severe casualties and they were ordered to retire, the first word these Turkish troops sent back was, "We are doing all right. Just let us alone. We are getting along fine."

It finally required a peremptory order from a superior authority to pull those courageous Turkish troops back out of the most terrific part of the front. That is the kind of courage, that is the kind of fighting qualities, those tough Turks have got. I feel that what we have done with our economy program and our military-aid program to Turkey has been wisely done, and corroboration and confirmation of it is being displayed by the fighting qualities they have exhibited in Korea.

I may add that today the democratic forces of Turkey are stronger than they have ever been in the recent past. They have free elections, and I believe it is only fair to say honest elections. They have a Government elected by the people and accountable to the people. I heard only recently of housing programs out in the little villages in Turkey which the Turkish Government is carrying on. They are poor relatively. Their private soldier receives only 21 cents a month for military service, and, therefore, it not being a very attractive service, they have a great shortage of noncommissioned officers. The soldier receives only two uniforms a year, one for winter and one for summer. Yet with those limitations which would be painful to us, as I say, they have shown remarkable and commendable fighting courage. There is a new Turkey oriented to the West which has risen upon the splendid edifice established by Kemal Pasha after World War I.

We were thrilled to observe the great strength, the morale, and the courageous facing of the future which one finds in Israel. Israel is truly a new hope for an old part of the world. Israel deserves our continued help, for it will be an effective bulwark of democracy and resistance to aggression in the whole Middle East.

Then we went on through all the other countries in the Middle East—Egypt, Lebanon, Syria, Iraq, Iran, Saudi Arabia. There one finds many contradictions. One finds great potentialities. Some of the countries have great new agricultural possibilities which would be fulfilled if they had irrigation and reclamation. In some areas those projects are getting under way. Many have great natural resources, some being developed, some not fully developed, and some not opened up at all.

On the other hand, one finds in most of those countries much abject poverty, as most other visitors will recall. In some places conditions are almost offensive. It almost nauseates one to see the deplorable condition under which the people are living in some areas, where children are drinking green, stagnant water out of ditches where cattle and dogs are washing themselves. There are for large masses of people conditions of squalor almost indescribable. Yet somewhere nearby one will find the greatest evidences of riches, luxury, and indulgence.

In nearly every one of these countries one can expect two things. One is they do not have a tax system that is fair to the masses of the people and another is that the efficiency of their governments needs greatly to be improved. One of the valuable contributions we are making is to give them assistance under the Smith-Mundt bill and under the four-point program in improving the efficiency of their governments. In many of their governments, however, in fact in nearly all of them, one will find signs of hope, one will find men of confidence and character and liberal views coming into political importance and sometimes being the heads of the governments.

Mr. President, it is obvious that our plain duty is to try to help those ancient and great people in every possible way to help themselves. We should exchange more personnel with them, let their personnel be trained here in the United States, and send to them trained personnel when they would like to have it, to aid them in the administration of their governments. We should aid them in the development of their natural resources. We should assist them in extending their trade and in every possible way to encourage them to add new strength to the democratic world.

We were in India and Pakistan for a few days. In India one finds a strange and striking paradox. There are the very rich and the very poor. India, one of the great romantic countries of the world, is at the same time a country where probably in volume poverty is exceeded only by that which is to be found in China. The average per capita income in India is about $50 a year. They have, however, improved their condition a great deal. They have a truly democratic government now. Their people are proud of the liberty and independence they have gained. They feel that they have a great part to play in the future world. They are undertaking courageously their world responsibilities and, I believe, that taking into account their past, one can commend the part that India is playing in world affairs.

Having a tradition of nonviolence, it is not surprising that the great Hindu leader, Mr. Nehru, would desire in every possible way to settle disputes without violence. However, they have been realistic enough in their internal affairs to provide armed forces of considerable proportions which are quite burdensome to their economy, and as the threat to their own security has become more menacing by the recent invasions of the neighboring states, I think they are going to appreciate that we live in a world today, that we are dealing with enemies today who are not amenable to the persuasions of morality or the entreaty of reason, that they respect only force and superior force, and that if India is to save the independence she has won after so long and so glorious a struggle, she has got to have the courage and the conviction to associate herself with those who are trying to build the protection that will only make possible a free world.

Probably nowhere else is there better illustration of the significance of this collective security program than in India and Pakistan. India is spending 55 percent of her budget upon her military establishment. Pakistan is spending 65 percent of her budget upon the military establishment. Neither of these countries, relatively poor, can afford such expenditures. Tragically, each is arming principally against the other. It is to be regretted that they cannot reconcile peacefully their own fraternal differences and unite as sister states in building up the welfare of their people and contributing to the security of a free world. But, as I said many times, in that part of the world, to press conferences and to others, the collective security program that the United Nations offers today is the cheapest insurance which any nation can possibly obtain. If a nation takes an honorable course in the United Nations organization, if a nation does its part in that great association of peace-loving peoples, then it will not have to rely only upon its own strength for its own security; then it will have the assurance that men and women of good will in other parts of the world, men and women of peace-loving purpose, will come to its rescue if it is attacked. The cheapest insurance that any of the nations can possibly take out today is in an honorable and creditable way to do their own part in carrying out the objectives of the United Nations organization.

Mr. President, if I may in all humility offer a word of counsel to that great leader, Prime Minister Nehru, let it be that I hope he appreciates the danger to his own country and to the freedom of his own people and to the freedom of the peace-loving, independence-desiring world, and that he will do his full part—as I know his heart leads him to do—in the United Nations and in getting word to the Communist aggressors in Russia and in China that India will not give them aid or comfort, will not countenance their wrongs or appear indifferent to their crimes, but that India will stand with the peace-loving nations and, if need be, will fight and resist the aggressions that Russia and China are engaged in and the aggressions that they propose.

I wish to say, to the great credit of the people of India, that they did support us in the resolutions in the Security Council when the fateful decisions were made, in June, that the United Nations would resist the aggressions occurring in Korea.

In my conference with Prime Minister Nehru, he said that he felt that India was the window to the west, that India could play a great part in bringing the east and the west together, by trying to be the intermediary.

Mr. President, that view presupposes that Russia is disposed to have honorable differences, and to have them honorably reconciled; and it completely ignores the reality that Russia does not want any intermediary. In today's newspapers the headlines tell us that the Russians and Chinese Communists scorn efforts to get a cease-fire order into effect. They do not want reconciliation; they do not want mediation; they do not want conciliation; they do not want anyone to try to bring together themselves and their would-be victims, because they do not want to be arrested in the pursuit of their criminally aggressive aims.

So I hope that this great man, Prime Minister Nehru, who for nearly a lifetime has been devoted to obtaining the freedom of his people, will—now that he has such great power and confidence of his country and the admiration of a free world—be a great, eloquent voice in calling upon all the peace-loving peoples of Asia to arise against this danger, which now is apparent upon the borders of his own country, so that they will no longer try to appease it, so that they will no longer embrace it. I do not know of any man today who has an opportunity to make a greater contribution to the preservation of the freedom for which he fought so long, and which so recently has been obtained, for his country and for the peace-loving world, than the great leader of the Indian people, their honorable Prime Minister, Mr. Nehru.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPARKMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. It is an interesting contrast that when the Senator from Maine visited there a few years ago, it was impossible to see Mr. Nehru, because he was then confined in prison. There has certainly been a marvelous transformation.

The analogy he suggests—namely, that of India's being the window—suggests also that at this time the Russians would seem to be throwing a brick through the window.

Had the invasion of Tibet by the Chinese Communists occurred at the time when the Senator from Florida was in India?

Mr. PEPPER. No; it had not.

Mr. BREWSTER. So Mr. Nehru has been very much educated since then.

Mr. PEPPER. I think that event must have influenced Mr. Nehru greatly.

Mr. President, I still hope Mr. Nehru will rise to meet the challenge of today and will assume even a more bold leadership of the peace-loving peoples of Asia than he has asserted up to the present time.

Mr. President, I must commend Pakistan. Senators will recall the visit to this country of the Prime Minister of Pakistan. I think he made a favorable impression here. In the United Nations Pakistan has—with no deviation—supported the program of resisting aggression in Korea.

I found, on the part of the Prime Minister of Pakistan, every disposition to associate his country unqualifiedly with the peace-loving peoples of the world.

They were determined to continue to do their full duty in the United Nations. I commend very highly the attitude and the activity of the people of Pakistan in determinedly resisting aggression and associating themselves unqualifiedly with the rest of the peace-loving world.

In Siam we found an interesting example of another courageous government which had definitely alined itself with the rest of the peace-loving world, and was doing its part, not only in the United Nations, not only in its domestic program of strengthening democracy and extending the democratic base of its government, but in actually sending troops into Korea, where they have made a military contribution of meaningful significance.

Siam, famous for its friendliness, certainly engages one's warm feelings. While in Siam, I think I saw one of the most thrilling sights I ever beheld—when, one morning, we went in a small motorboat along one of the canals, which the Siamese call clongs, visiting what is called the floating market, where there are many boats and also shops and homes along the sides of the canal. What most caught the attention of Mrs. Pepper and myself was the unusual friendliness of the children. Hundreds of children in their enthusiastic and warm way waved very friendly greetings to our little group as we passed along in the motorboat. That brought to my mind one of the songs in the wonderful musical comedy, South Pacific: You Have To Be Taught To Hate. Those children did not know whether we belonged to one country or another or to one political party or another or to one religion or another. They simply saw some strangers passing along the canal in a boat, and they waved their friendly greetings.

Mr. President, Siam is a fascinating country. I know of nowhere that one would find a better confirmation of the wisdom of our course in extending aid and effective help under the Smith-Mundt program and under the military-aid program. We are giving Siam our help. Even though Siam is in an exposed position, that Nation is alining itself with the Western World, which is trying to serve the best interests of the peace of both the East and the West. Those people are courageously cooperating with us and deserve our continued help.

We spent a period of 3 or 4 days in Hong Kong, which, of course, is a very unique as well as a very attractive area. However, I must say that there are a great many persons there who did not seem to have any hesitation or any compunction against carrying on trade—even with materials which would be of war value—with Communist China.

Our own naval authorities told us that they consistently saw commercial craft going into Communist China, but they had no instructions or authority to stop it, because their duties related only to the performance of the function given to the Seventh Fleet by the President, to protect Formosa against attack from the mainland, and the mainland, of course, from attack by Formosa. But I regret very much that the disposition to carry on trade as usual has led some of the old firms in Hong Kong to continue to carry on trade with Communist China, as if Communist China were not dedicated as it is to its present course, a threat to the very security of Hong Kong. I am sorry that they have not felt that they, exposed as they are, cannot hope to survive, except, of course, by the possible temporary indulgence of the Chinese Communists, unless they associate themselves with the free world and we effectively stop the aggression of Russia and communism in the Far East.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. Is the Senator familiar with the reports, just received, of over $1,000,000,000 worth of trade done through Hong Kong with Communist China during the past year? It is a tragic revelation of the extent to which their profits have gone.

Mr. PEPPER. I understood the report. I saw the press account that their 1950 business was the best year that they have had.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. I should be interested in hearing the Senator's impression or opinion as to the possibility of Hong Kong, in the long run, really surviving as a British possession in the midst of Communist China.

Mr. PEPPER. Unless we can stop aggression by collective action, Hong Kong would have no hope of existing except through the temporary tolerance of Communist China.

Mr. MORSE. Does the Senator from Florida agree with the junior Senator from Oregon that the probabilities are that Great Britain is going to lose Hong Kong in the long run, and that she ought to face the realities of the situation and realize that Hong Kong is probably already a war casualty, at least a war prisoner, and certainly should not follow an economic course of action whereby Hong Kong can be used as a device by the Communist Chinese to do great damage to American forces in Korea?

Mr. PEPPER. The able Senator, in my opinion, is justified in his assertion. I think probably the best way to surmise what may happen to Hong Kong, if this determination and program of Russia, with and through Chinese communism, to occupy the whole of the Far East is carried out, as they are today carrying it on, is to surmise that the same thing will happen to Hong Kong under that aggression as happened to Hong Kong under the Japanese aggression, which was bent upon the same objective, namely, pushing all other influences out of the Far East, under what they called the doctrine of Asia for the Asiatics; and, just as certainly as did the Japanese occupy Hong Kong in that program of aggression, so would the Russians and the Communist Chinese take it, if their own program of aggression is permitted to be extended.

Mrs. Pepper and I went on to Japan, to Tokyo, and were there from November 1 to November 28. I must say I did not appreciate the magnificence of the job done in Japan by General MacArthur, until I got a chance to see something of it by personal inquiry and observation. I made a statement in Tokyo, which I am glad to repeat here in the Senate, that I had known before that General MacArthur was regarded as one of the great generals of history—and I have not changed my mind about it, by reason of recent reverses—but I had to discover in Japan that he was also entitled to be called one of the great statesmen of history; for, today, his work in Japan speaks for itself. In the first place, when the Korean attack occurred and our forces had to be thrown immediately into Korea, General MacArthur had practically to strip Japan of all our military forces there in order to send those forces at once to Korea. Yet there was never any threat of aggression or uprising, or in any sense of the word violence from the people or from the Government of Japan. On the contrary, we have not had the slightest feeling of insecurity of our administration there, however much we have found it necessary under the emergency to strip Japan of our occupying forces.

In addition to that, the people of Japan have been helping in the program that directly benefited our resistance to aggression in Korea, for they have, of course, helped load our ships, they have helped carry on the work of our agencies over there, where Japan has been an essential base in the conduct of our operations in Korea.

More than that, Japan has adopted a constitution which is democratic in character; and Japan, today, in my opinion, is entitled to be called a democratic country. Not only that, Mr. President; their people have learned to appreciate the blessings of democracy, and in my opinion they are not going to permit those blessings to be taken away from them in future years. The suffrage has been extended to the masses of the people, including the women. My wife and I visited a polling place late one afternoon in the course of an election, and the election officials were constituted, six women and four men. When we inquired of the election officials how many women had voted that day—women were not entitled previous to our occupation there to vote—they said more women had voted up to that time of the day than men.

In addition to that, Mr. President, in my opinion, the Japanese Government and people can be depended upon in the future to associate themselves with the western powers in resistance to Soviet aggression. They know that since we have been there we have not treated them with brutality or atrocity, but have treated them with fairness and consideration, and they have sense enough to know what sort of experience they would have under a Russian occupation.

So, Mr. President, my opinion is that the Japanese people have learned the error of their previous evil way, and in the future they are going to preserve basically a democracy for their country, and with appropriate help from us in arming and aiding them so that they can resist aggression, they will be found on the side of the western powers in resisting Soviet aggression.

I cannot too highly commend, as I said, the statesmanship exhibited by General MacArthur in the way he has handled the whole Japanese situation. At the time he advised the retention of the Emperor. I doubted the wisdom of it, but after I got a chance to make inquiry in Japan itself, I learned that the Emperor was of the greatest benefit to General MacArthur and to our country in bringing about the transition of the Japanese people to the occupation; and he has been a great force in aid of the democratic character of the Japanese Constitution and the country.

On the 20th of November I joined our great Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Matthews, with Admiral Joy, naval commander of our far-eastern forces, at Fukuoka, and, on the following day, the 20th, I flew with these gentlemen and their party to Wonsan. We went immediately aboard the Mount McKinley, which was the flagship of Admiral Doyle, who had the immediate responsibility for one of the greatest military operations in history—the Inchon landing. During that afternoon we saw the Consolation, a naval hospital ship Senators can be proud of and the country can be grateful for what is being done by all of our Armed Forces, in giving medical care to those who sustained injury in Korea.

The hospital ships, Mr. President, are simply floating hospitals containing the best of hospital equipment, and the personnel is competent and devoted to their humane tasks. By having these hospital ships afloat in an area such as that of Korea, a base hospital is available, in a very short time, to those who have sustained injury.

My wife and I visited many hospitals in Japan, and I visited others, on the ground as well as upon the sea, while in Korea. Mrs. Pepper and I spent some time with Maj. Gen. E. E. Hume, the very able Surgeon General of our Far East forces, in visiting hospitals in Yokohama, at our great naval base at Yosuoka, and at Tachichawa, our air base. At those hospitals in Japan and Korea it is unbelievable the way medical science and devoted men and women have saved the lives of the sorely wounded who have been brought to those hospitals. The percentage of recovery of casualties exceeds any that has ever been experienced in the past, including World War II. One of the reasons for that is the rapidity with which the injured personnel are brought under medical care. Too high praise cannot be paid the corpsmen. Those corpsmen, without weapons, are attached to companies in the front line of combat, and their first job and their dedicated task is to get out of danger a man who is hurt and give him treatment at the earliest possible moment. The result is that we find these devoted corpsmen when necessary giving blood plasma right where they find a wounded man, right where he fell, sometimes with bullets flying around them. I have seen some of the phenomenal cases of recovery of men who came in with gangrene in the brain, with part of the head shot away, with fungus in the brain, and other severe injuries which had been sustained.

I said, "It certainly must be a hazardous task for these corpsmen to get men out of the places where they are hit."

I was told that there were corpsmen all over the hospital, that there was one next door who had been shot all to pieces in trying to rescue men who had been wounded.

I was very proud of the fact, Mr. President, that I discovered, at one of the places, a Negro corpsman who had been in the Navy. I was at a marine base with my wife. One of the marines in the little group was a Negro corpsman who had won the Distinguished Service Cross for the valor which he had shown in going back three times, although injured, to get men who had been wounded, and bringing them back. So let me pay the warmest tribute to the medical service of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Air Force, for the magnificent job they have done in rescuing and in attending those who have fallen as casualties in battle.

Mr. President, on the evening of the 20th of November we of the Secretary's party went aboard the great battleship Missouri and spent the night aboard. Early next morning we saw the fueling of the Missouri, a system which has been developed by no other navy as effectively as by the American Navy. It is one of the remarkable improvements which make it possible for our fleet to stay at sea longer than can any other fleet in the world.

All praise to the ingenuity of the American naval service for having devised such a system.

We then went aboard the Philippine Sea, which is one of our great carriers, off the east coast of Korea. There we saw airmen going off the deck of that carrier in their dive bombers and in their jet planes, going right to the battle line to drop their bombs or to engage in combat protecting our planes which were dropping their bombs along the Yalu River. On that afternoon I saw one of the airplanes land on the deck, and a great many persons rushed around it to look at it. A little later it was brought to the hangar, and there was a great hole, at least 18 inches in diameter, which had been shot in the right wing of the plane which had been bombing the bridges over the Yalu River. But the shell which had torn that great hole through that wing and endangered the life of the flying American, did not come from the Korean side; it came from antiaircraft batteries on the Manchurian side, the China side, of the Yalu River. I heard some of our pilots tell the Secretary of the Navy, their superior officers, and me about having to fly along the river's edge, on the Korean side, and take the intensive flak from the other side, and take the fire from the other side, without any authority to cross the river either to pursue a plane that had tried to shoot them down or to silence a battery that had jeopardized their lives and their planes.

I cannot, for the life of me, Mr. President, believe it is wise policy or that it is fairness to our fighting personnel to deny them the right to resist those who are trying to destroy them, because of technicalities. If a bridge is the means over which the enemy is sending troops over on the Korean side to kill our men, I think our men have the same right to bomb that bridge on the China side as on the Korean side, and to stop those troops before they get within range of our men. If planes come over to shoot down our planes, our planes should have the right to pursue them across the border and probably impress upon them the hazard of their repeating any such attacks upon the Korean side.

Mr. President, on November 23 we saw some of the marines of the First Marine Division and had lunch with General Smith, the great commander of the First Marine Division which fought so valorously and with General Harris, his able air commander at Yonpo. All honor to those valiant marines. They paid a terrible price, but, Mr. President, I hope they impressed upon these evil forces that Americans and other peace-loving peoples in the United Nations are determined to resist aggression, even if some have to make the supreme sacrifice in order to do it.

I went over to Seoul and had dinner with our excellent and able Ambassador, Mr. Muccio, there, who has done such a splendid job and who is staying on so courageously, even in the face of the present danger.

I had Thanksgiving dinner with General Walker and his staff at Pyongyang. That afternoon we went in a plane to Anju, and then by jeep up to the regimental headquarters of the Nineteenth Regiment, and to some of the company headquarters.

I was very happy to see that the American soldiers had turkey which was roasted brown and which tasted and smelled very good. So far as I could observe, right up at the front, with the artillery shooting over our heads, the efficiency of the Quartermaster Corps was such that every American soldier was eating turkey and had on his messkit the same kind of food and the same little delicacies that I had enjoyed at the table of General Walker.

We also met the commander of the British brigade there, and General Walker complimented the British brigade for what it had done in the fighting. He said they were good fighters and had given a good account of themselves since.

The next day, the 24th, at 10 o'clock, the advance took place, and our troops began to move up. At 11:10 a. m. I took off in a small plane from Pyongyang and flew over the line for approximately 2 hours.

I saw our troops moving up, lines of tanks going forward, artillery at work, our B–26's shooting their rockets and dropping napalm. Also I watched our jet planes in action and fierce action it was against ground targets.

Let me pay highest praise to our Air Forces, to General Stratemeyer and the commander of the Fifth Air Force, General Partridge.

General Walker and other ground commanders told me of how intimate and effective was the cooperation between the Air and Ground Forces. Both in strategic bombing and in giving support to our Ground Forces, the Air Force is doing a magnificent job.

From the air, Mr. President, one could see the terrible nature of that Korean terrain. One could see how easy it was for the Chinese and North Koreans to conceal themselves, for we flew, I suppose, as far as 30 miles behind their lines, and in all that flight of 2 hours we did not observe one vehicle moving on the roads. The Communists have devised a devilishly dangerous and devastating technique of combining the characteristics of guerrilla warfare with the most proficient use of modern weapons, and they were able to carry those modern weapons largely upon the backs of men. Since then they have been using camels and pack animals, but at that time they largely used the backs of men. They principally had three types of weapons—rifle, machine gun, and light and heavy mortars. It can be seen from looking at the terrain what a terrible task our forces have had to face in meeting the aggression.

Mr. President, in fairness to those who have had charge of these operations, let me say that I think our command was justified in launching the offensive they did at the time they did after they had built up enough supplies to make the offensive possible. That is all that held up the offense—building up enough supplies to initiate the forward movement. Better to have found out what they were going to face, instead of sitting in a given place and suddenly finding themselves surrounded by overwhelming superior forces, without any previous knowledge of the nature of the enemy they had to face. So I think the offensive was justified when it was taken. I want to say one other thing in defense of our command over there. They knew that those four hundred or five hundred thousand Chinese Communists were on the other side of the Yalu River. General MacArthur told us that on the 4th of November, when Mrs. Pepper and I had lunch with him and Mrs. MacArthur. He said, "We know they are over there. We know how serious it is and how threatening it is."

Who knew that they were going to advance across the Yalu River in the volume that they later displayed?

I think that nothing we have done, except our entry into Korea, has provoked the Chinese aggression with which we are faced today.

They would have aggressed as they have done today if we had stopped at the thirty-eighth parallel unless they had determined as a matter of policy to let us stop, and by some kind of deceitful negotiation get us out, when they could resume their aggression with the probability that we would not return to resist them again, because the Soviet Union and the Chinese Communists are bent upon one single objective, and that is the complete conquest of the total Far East, and they will not stop, unless they are resisted by superior forces, until they achieve that objective. We may as well accept the fact that that is the kind of contest in which we are engaged and that that is their objective and determination. Nothing save effective resistance will prevent their carrying that purpose into effect.

Mr. President, I have before me Admiral Mahan's book, The Problem of Asia. This is what one reads on page 24 of that book, which was written a good many years ago. It was written in 1900, a half century ago. This is what Admiral Mahan said:

> Upon a glance at the map, one enormous fact immediately obtrudes itself upon the attention—the vast, uninterrupted mass of the Russian Empire, stretching without a break in territorial consecutiveness from the meridian of western Asia Minor until to the eastward it overpasses that of Japan. In this huge distance no political obstacles intervene to impede the concentrated action of the disposable strength. Within the dominion of Russia, only the distances themselves, and the hindrances—unquestionably great and manifold—imposed by natural conditions, place checks upon her freedom and fullness of movement. To this element of power—central position—is to be added the wedge-shaped outline of her territorial projection into central Asia, strongly supported as this is, on the one flank by the mountains of the Caucasus and the inland Caspian Sea—wholly under her control—and on the other by the ranges which extend from Afghanistan, northeasterly, along the western frontier of China. From the latter, moreover, she as yet has no serious danger to fear.
> The fact of her general advance up to the present time—

This was half a century ago—> most of which has been made within a generation, so that the point of the wedge is now inserted between Afghanistan and Persia, must be viewed in connection with the tempting relative facility of further progress through Persia to the Persian Gulf, and with the strictly analagous movement, on the other side of the continent, where long strides have been made through Manchuria to Port Arthur and the Gulf of Pe-chi-li. Thus, alike in the Far East and in the Far West, we find the same characteristic of remorseless energy, rather remittent than intermittent in its symptoms. Russia, in obedience to natural law and race instinct, is working, geographically, to the southward in Asia by both flanks, her center covered by the mountains of Afghanistan and the deserts of Eastern Turkestan and Mongolia.

It is therefore obvious, Mr. President, that they are carrying on today in the Far East southward, and in the Middle East northward, the same determined pressure forward, the same aggression, upon which Admiral Mahan commented half a century ago.

Mr. President, that is what we are facing. Let no one say that it was a tactical mistake to start an offensive on the 25th day of November, that had we not started that offensive, the Chinese Communists would have stopped at the 38th parallel, or never would have come in.

On the 26th of November I interviewed 43 Chinese prisoners, with our officers and with interpreters, as a part of the 6,000 prisoners of North Korea and the Communists we had in our compound in Pyongyang. Through the interpreters I asked some of these 43 Chinese Communist prisoners various questions.

First I said, "When did you come into North Korea?" The most recent arrival out of about 10 I questioned in that group, asking "When did you come over?", was 25 days prior to the 25th of November, in other words, the 1st of November. All the rest of them said "About 30 days ago." They had come over there 30 days before we started the offensive on the 25th day of November.

Then I said, "When you came over, did you know you were coming to Korea?"

They said, "No."

Of course, this was all through the interpreter. I said, "How did you get over here?"

They said, "They put us on trains and sent us over at night, and we did not know we were in Korea until we got there."

What does that show, Mr. President, about the claims of the Chinese Government that they are volunteers? A man does not volunteer and get in a train and be sent to a country to which he did not know he was going, and did not know where he was until he got there. That is just a part of the deliberate falsehood the Chinese Communists have tried to perpetrate upon the gullible world.

Not only that, but I said, "Did you want to fight the Americans?"

With enthusiasm they all shook their heads and said, "No; we did not want to fight the Americans."

Then I asked, "How many of you, if any, ever belonged to the Nationalist Army?" After the interpreter questioned them I asked all who had formerly belonged to the Nationalist Army to hold up their hands. Nearly every one of them held up his hand, to indicate that he had formerly been a member of Chiang Kai-shek's army.

I asked, "How did you happen to get into the Communist Army?" They said that they had surrendered, and that the Communists had coerced them into joining their own army. Most of them had been members of the Communist Army for 2 or 3 years.

Then I asked, "How many of the Chinese Communists who are fighting in North Korea, in your opinion, formerly belonged to the Nationalist Army?" Finally, after a good many consultations among them and among the interpreters, they said about 80 percent. That was interesting to me, because I had heard a story in Hong Kong to the effect that the Communists of China had a commitment to North Korea that they would come in if North Korea were attacked, that is, if the advance continued, and that in order technically to keep that commitment, they were sending over the troops in whom they did not have much confidence, because they had come over from Chiang Kai-shek's Nationalist Army.

There was one interesting corroboration of that. Up until that time, the 25th or 26th of November, there had been no instances of atrocities on the part of Chinese troops. On the contrary, there were many stories which indicated friendliness on their part toward American troops.

For example, I heard a story to the effect that some American prisoners were being carried back. One GI was injured so that he could not keep up. A North Korean soldier shot him through the foot, and when one of the Chinese Communist soldiers saw it he walked over, snatched the gun out of the North Korean's hand, knocked him down with it, and then picked up the GI and leaned him against a tree and gave him some water, and left him there so that he would be found by our forces coming through there later. I believe they were going backward at that time. It has only been since that time—in fact, only in the past few days—that we have read stories about the Chinese Communist troops attacking our wounded in trucks and setting fire to the trucks, shooting and dancing around like wild Indians. Only recently have we heard of instances of atrocities. So it may be that the first troops which the Chinese Government sent in were the former Nationalists. It is absolutely a falsehood to claim that they were volunteers. They were ordered in in military units. They were not volunteers at all. It may be that the fanatical Communists were sent over in the later stages of the operation.

I made another discovery. I have here a .22 rifle which has on the outside of it, in plain figures, "1950," and the place where it was made. That rifle was found in grease in a North Korean arsenal, by our American troops, and was given to me by one of General Walker's aides at Pyongyang, to refute another falsehood of the Russians, that they had not given the North Koreans or the Chinese any military aid or matériel since 1945. This rifle is not loaded. I should like to exhibit it to Senators. It is stamped on the outside "1950" as plain as figures can be written. There is another marking upon it. I did not know what it was, so I consulted a colonel from the Ordnance Department of the Army. He came to my office to look at it. He said, "That means that that rifle was made at a place called Talu, about 100 miles south of Moscow, and that the figures 1950 mean it was made in the year 1950." That rifle, as I say, was found in a North Korean armory in grease. Evidently it was used as a sharpshooter's rifle. It has a long barrel. It is heavy and well balanced. It was said that evidently it had been used as a sharpshooter's rifle.

Also members of our naval forces tell me that they found Russian newspapers dated in 1950 on mines which they took out of the harbor at Wonsan. In the packing of the mines were Russian newspapers dated in 1950. So it is obvious that it is nothing but a pack of lies for the Communists to claim that the Communist troops in Korea are volunteers, and for the Russians to claim that they have not given aid or matériel to the aggressive forces since 1945.

On the 26th of November I interviewed North Korean prisoners. One of them was a full colonel, and the other a lieutenant colonel. They told me, through our interpreters, that up until October 1 the Russians had had advisers down to the battalion level in the North Korean Army. Then they pulled them out and limited their advisers only to the headquarters of the North Korean Army, the chief of staff, and the defense minister of North Korea. So again it is obvious that they are lying when they say that they are not giving aid and comfort to the forces of aggression.

So, Mr. President, we see the difficulty of our soldiers in the terrain in which they must fight, and we see the nature of the enemy opposing them. We see also the hypocrisy and deceitfulness of the claim of Soviet Russia that she is not the principal factor behind this aggression and the principal criminal in the aggression which is in progress today in Korea.

Mr. President, I wish to pay tribute to our great forces in Korea, and to the valor of our men. I pay tribute to them for the sacrifices which they have had to experience. I wish to let the commanders who are fighting this great battle for decency and democracy know, that so far as I am concerned, I am backing them up and will continue to back them up in every way I possibly can. This is the time when they need to know that the American people are with them, and are not barking at them with captious criticism when they are literally fighting not only for their lives and the honor of their country, but for the preservation of the free world.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. In view of the fact that the Senator has exhibited this Russian rifle on the floor of the Senate in support of certain observations and conclusions, I should like to have the Senator tell the Senate what information he gathered in regard to the quality of the Russian armaments as he witnessed them in his world travels. I should like to ask the Senator whether or not it is generally agreed among the military officials with whom he conferred that this particular so-called sharpshooter's rifle is an excellently made weapon, comparable in workmanship and quality to rifles made by the United States and by our allies.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, it is not as good for long-range shooting, although I was told that it was very effective at shorter ranges. One of General Walker's aides gave me the rifle as I was leaving. We had talked about the hypocrisy on the part of the Russians. He had previously told me about this rifle. He said, "Perhaps you would like to have it to take back and show to your colleagues. There is one in the office." So he went and got it, and I brought it along with me.

This rifle is said to be very effective at the shorter ranges. When our ordnance man, a colonel from our ordnance department, came over and critically examined it, he said that it was not good beyond about 250 yards, but that for guerrilla fighting it was most effective. It is light. Evidently they used a cartridge with a high powder charge in it.

I was impressed, as I went through the hospitals, by seeing so many men who did not know exactly how they had been injured. I would ask, "How did you get hurt?" They would say, "It must have been a sniper." Evidently sniping was very effective. For guerrilla warfare a rifle like that would be very effective. It would be used at pretty short range, in any event.

The general quality of Russian rifles is excellent. Their planes are very speedy, even in relation to ours. As a matter of fact, I do not think it is any secret, but that it is a very well-known fact that their planes are faster than ours. But our pilots were superior. Their ability made it possible for them to win in every encounter they had with planes which came from beyond the Yalu River.

The mortars used by the Chinese Communists and the North Koreans are extremely effective, but the light and the heavy mortars. They have remarkable proficiency in using them. I asked the North Korean colonel, and other officers: "Where did you get the equipment with which you were fighting? Did you get your equipment from China?" They laughed. They said, "The Chinese did not let us have anything but some little medicine and some blankets." That is all they got from China, they said. In the early stages every bit of the rest of it was sent directly over the Russian border, and in the latter stages some of it was sent around Manchuria to give the pretense that it came from China. But they said the Chinese did not have such equipment as that. My opinion is that every mortar, probably every machine gun, probably every good rifle, certainly every airplane they used to kill our men has come from the arsenal of Russia.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I am glad the Senator from Florida has made these comments about the quality of the munitions being used by the North Koreans. He has made a statement which I also believe to be the fact, that these munitions and weapons have come directly from Russia. I am glad the Senator has made that statement, in view of the fact that the Senator from Oregon has expressed himself so many times that we Americans might as well face the ugly fact that we are at war right now with Russia.

I am particularly glad that the Senator commented upon the Russian munitions and weapons, because I am astounded at the frequency with which I run into the point of view on the part of fellow Americans indicating that they just cannot believe that Russia is capable, from an engineering standpoint, a scientific standpoint, and an industrial standpoint, to manufacture effective munitions and weapons of war. And here we have a Senator who has been there and seen, and who testifies—and I think he has rendered a great public service in doing so here today—testifies as a witness before the American people that these Russian weapons and Russian munitions are effective, and that when we meet them in war we are up against, so far as weapons are concerned, very effective opposition.

I want to thank the Senator from Florida for making that clear on the record today, because I think the American people have to wake up to the fact that in this struggle for freedom we are being opposed by an enemy who is demonstrating time and time again that she does have the industrial know-how and the industrial ability to manufacture very effective instruments of war.

Mr. PEPPER. The Senator from Oregon performs another in the many great public services he has rendered, by emphasizing that fact. There can be no more tragic folly on the part of the American people than even to assume that the Russians are just a bunch of ignoramuses wandering and stumbling around and that they are incapable of splendid production.

Not only have I heard stories from the fighting men themselves. Ask the men in the hospitals. I have seen them literally by the thousands. Ask those men what kind of weapons the enemy has. Ask their commanders what weapons they are having to face. They are having to face as good weapons as we ourselves have. The enemy is trained in the use of those weapons, too.

Senators will recall that I was in Moscow in 1945, at the same time the Colmer committee was there. We all together went to some Russian factories, one of which was an automobile factory. The assembly line moved as easily and efficiently in the making of good automobiles and good trucks in that Russian factory as I have seen it move in an American factory. They do not have as many such factories as we do, of course. But there are fine modern factory buildings in Moscow. They have all the attributes of factories producing the same products in this country. Their scientists are extremely capable scientists. I think the consensus is that they have not only a knowledge of the techniques of the atom bomb, but that they are making the atom bomb.

Everyone knows the excellence of the submarines they have today. We must remember that not only have they got their own technicians who made good artillery and good tanks and other war implements in World War II, even as against the Germans, but they have availed themselves since World War II of probably the cream of the German technicians in the making of weapons, because they took them by force. We must remember also that they took over the Skoda Works in Czechoslovakia, one of the greatest munitions works in the world, and that when they took over Manchuria they got, of course, the best the Japanese had built in Manchuria.

So I am glad the able Senator from Oregon emphasizes that we are not only up against a dastardly, devilish enemy, but a devilishly effective enemy in combat, and one that has an utter disregard for human life in combat as well.

Mr. President, one hears it said often here at home that it was a mistake ever to go into Korea. That we must have known that we might provoke the Chinese Communists. Mr. President, I do not believe those critics said that when the President made that courageous decision. I do not remember hearing Senators on the floor of the Senate condemning our carrying out the courageous action of the United Nations. There was remarkable unanimity on both sides of the aisle in both Houses of Congress. Encomiums were heaped upon the President for having taken that courageous action to throw our forces with other United Nations forces in Korea to stop the aggression. Why? Because we recognized that it was the Hitler technique all over again, and that if we let the aggressor have one country it would whet his appetite to take another, and that any kind of negotiations intended to lead him back to the paths of peace were as utterly hopeless with Stalin as they were with Hitler, that if we did not stop the aggression by force, and let the enemy know that aggression would be met with effective resistance, the sweep of his conquest would rush through all the Far East, and then into other areas of the world.

Some people retreat back again, as I said, and say, "We should not have crossed the thirty-eighth parallel. That maneuver provoked the Chinese Communists to come in. They are an easily frightened people. It was intimated that they are sort of dumb and cannot understand foreign soldiers being proximate to their border, and that in spite of all our declarations they became alarmed, and out of their deep concern they had to send in their volunteers.

Well, in the first place it is a little inconsistent to claim that they were provoked by our proximity to their shores or their border and then in the next breath to say that the Chinese Government did not send them over there at all; that it was just a sort of a mass volunteer movement; that people just rushed over there when they found there was some danger to their country.

Mr. President, if we had stopped at the thirty-eighth parallel it would not have made any difference, in my opinion. The Chinese troops were already in north China. They were waiting for their time to start. If we had stopped at the thirty-eighth parallel, it would not have accomplished anything except to have given them a chance to have regrouped and started their forces for another aggression south of the thirty-eighth parallel. Of course they, as a matter of deceitful strategy, have attempted to induce us to go away, so, with our departure, they would have no obstacle.

Mr. President, let our people not be deceived or confused. It was not our coming in that brought on the Chinese aggression. It was not our going beyond the thirty-eighth parallel; it was not the beginning of our offensive that brought on their aggression. The conflict in North Korea today is a part of an aggressive campaign and program conceived in Moscow, directed from Moscow, guided from Moscow, the objective of which is nothing less than the conquest of the whole of the Far East, involving substantially half of the human race. When I say the Far East I include Japan, for the aggressor is not going to stop, in my opinion, until he has occupied or conquered Japan, because he recognizes, as I have said, that today Japan has come to appreciate democracy and will resist aggression and will side with the peace-loving people of the world. So, Mr. President, that is what is responsible for the situation in Korea.

The next thing we hear is, "Let us pull out of Korea." Mr. President, I did not realize that it was a part of the American military tradition to pull out under fire unless we were thrown out. American soldiers have had to retreat at times, in the course of our history; but, thank God, American military tradition is free of the contamination of quitting in the face of an enemy.

If we voluntarily pull out of Korea, unless we can obtain some decent and honorable terms upon which to do so, that would mean that not only would we leave the aggressors free to take over all of Korea, but we would betray the men who died in order that we might give some kind of aid and assistance to the peace-loving forces of Korea. The South Koreans would be butchered by the millions if we were to pull out of Korea.

I do not know whether it is possible for us to stay in Korea; I am not a military expert. I know we are still there, and I know we are making the enemy pay dearly for his advances. I know we may have to leave, under compulsion. But we will cause every Asian who is on our side to give up hope of receiving our succor if we pull out of Korea now, and adopt the fallacious recommendations of some persons who evidently have not thought the thing through, and pull back to some line outside Korea, and let the aggressors go ahead with their devilish design and occupy all of Korea and butcher the democratic forces in Korea. Then the aggressors will go into Indochina; and when the forces of Indochina attempt to resist, the aggressors will say to them, "You cannot expect any help from the peace-loving nations. They have left Korea, and they will not come to your aid." Then the democratic forces of Indochina will retreat before they fire a shot, for they will know that there will be no use for them to hope that the freedom-loving, democratic nations will come to their aid.

So I say that we should fight, and fight to the best of our ability.

Of course, Mr. President, I defer to the superior judgment of our military commanders. Whenever General MacArthur and our other commanders say, "We can do no more good there without incurring losses far exceeding, in cost and value and importance, any good we may do by remaining," then I am willing to have that decision made. However, I do not want that decision to be made on a political level here in Washington or by persons who are not expert in military matters.

The British sent their troops into Greece during World War II, knowing they would be thrown out by the superior German forces; but the sending of the British troops into Greece heartened the resistance of the Yugoslavs and the Greeks and encouraged them to pour out their blood in resistance movements, in fighting against the aggressive Germans whom the British were not able to restrain.

So, Mr. President, if we want to tell every Asian who today is on the side of decency and democracy, "You cannot count on the United States to assist you," and if we simply pull out and take the foolish advice given by no less than a former President of the United States and a former Commander in Chief of the Army, Navy, and Air Force of our country; if we pull out and leave the Pacific Ocean between ourselves and the unrestrained and unresisted forces of aggression—if we do that—we shall hand over all that area of the world to the aggressors, without putting up any further struggle.

Mr. President, I never heard of a law-enforcement officer who refused to restrain a gang of murderers and robbers simply because when he counted them, he might discover that they were more numerous than the members of his police squad.

So, Mr. President, we are committed to resist and to fight to the best of our ability.

As a matter of fact, I wish to say that I was over there at the time, and I read in the newspapers the suggestions which came from London—so the newspapers said—that we should establish a corridor along the Yalu and should let it be a neutral corridor across which we would not go. I wish to say that suggestion gave encouragement to the forces of aggression, and led them to believe that if they pressed us hard enough and perhaps frightened us we would make concessions; and that if we would yield a neutral zone, perhaps we would yield a larger area, and then perhaps we would yield all of North Korea, and then perhaps we would leave Korea—if they made the situation so frightening if we attempted to stay there. Mr. President, the only effect of those suggestions, so far as the enemy was concerned, was to encourage them to fight harder in the hope of eventually achieving success in what they are doing.

One may ask, What can we do? Of course, Mr. President, as I have said, we must take into account what the aims of the enemy are. We are not deceived as to who the principal enemy is. It is Russia which is carrying out, with the aid of the devilish doctrine of communism, aggressive policies which have been the policies of that country for generations, if not for centuries.

Mr. President, probably I was one of the last to give up hope that we could find some honorable basis of reconciliation. I was terribly penalized by certain critics when I was talking about peace and when I had in mind the terrible conflict that would become more and more probable if we did not stop it in its earlier inception. As I have said, I was denounced by many persons. Yet even now there is talk of having a four-power conference in the next few days, in the early part of January. I proposed that in 1945 and in 1946 and in 1947—still hoping that it might not be too late to stop the rush toward war, in which all of us were being thrust along by evil forces.

Well, Mr. President, that policy, as I urged it, was not adopted; and the situation has become worse and worse. Today it is regrettable to have to say that I do not see any hope for any kind of immediate reconciliation of our differences, because the enemy would not negotiate with a view to keeping its promises, in the first place; and in the second place, it has made up its mind that it is going as far as it can go, and it is not going to stop voluntarily; it will stop only when it meets a superior force. So, Mr. President, when one has to deal with a criminal mind with such a criminal purpose, negotiations will not do any good, for such a mind recognizes nothing but superior force.

Mr. President, what are the objectives of Russia and the Chinese Communists? First, as I have said, their objective is to push all western influences out of the Far East. That is what they are engaged upon now, and that is what they are going to continue to do until they are stopped.

That area offers more, at less cost, in terms of territory and materials and people, than any other part of the world they can attack. Not only that, but they attack it at a place where we would resist at our greatest disadvantage—in short, half way around the world.

We hear a great deal of talk about the shrinking world, but it is still a rather large world, if we go around it. For instance, it is 2,000 miles from Tokyo to Wake Island, and 2,000 miles from Wake Island to Honolulu, and 2,400 miles from Honolulu to San Francisco—a total of 6,400 miles that far—and it is 3,000 miles across the American Continent. So it is more than 9,000 miles from where we are now to Tokyo, and Korea is on the other side of Tokyo. So, Mr. President, we see that Korea and the adjacent parts of Asia are an area where we would resist to the greatest disadvantage, so far as we are concerned.

Mr. President, if the advice of the short-sighted is taken, and if we abandon all of that area to the aggressors, what will they do and where will they go? First, they will move down into, and occupy, Korea, and immediately will convert, by force, the people of South Korea to communism, or will kill them and get rid of them.

Then the aggressors will move right down into Indochina, and will take over the people of Indochina. Meanwhile, they will be moving ahead into Burma. Siam, which courageously is standing on our side, would be powerless to resist; so it is to be expected that Siam would easily acquiesce in the aggressor's encroachment, as happened in the case of the Japanese aggression; and then the aggressors would occupy Siam and Singapore, and then move into the East Indies. And what after that? They would take over not only about half the human race, in people, but one of the reservoirs of most strategic importance of all the earth in critical and strategic materials; so that would be one of the greatest gains of history. That is what the Japanese went to war to get, that they had by surrender, if the counsel of short-sighted opinion should be believed and relied on at the present time. That is their first objective.

My next point is that the next area that offers the greatest hope for the least cost is the Middle East. If the Russians could get the critical and strategic materials of southeast Asia and the populations of Asia, and if they could get the oil reserves of the Middle East, largely in Iran, Iraq, and Saudi Arabia, all they would need then would be the Ruhr; and the able Senator from Oregon was speaking well about that yesterday. If they could get the industrial capacity and the materials which are found in the Ruhr, with all the others in southeast Asia, with the oil of the Middle East, with the Ruhr, and over half of the human race under their dominion and control, why, Mr. President, history has never imagined any such force as they would possess.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. If they got the territory just described by the able Senator from Florida, does the Senator from Florida agree with the ex-President of the United States, Mr. Hoover, that the Pacific and the Atlantic Oceans, plus the arming to the teeth of our Army, our Navy, and our Air Force, would be adequate protection to our security?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, that doctrine, promulgated by ex-President Hoover, is nothing in the world but a rehash of the old America-first doctrine, under which America was almost destroyed before we prepared to resist the aggression of Hitler. It completely ignores the power which a country that dominates the so-called heartland of the earth, and that left only to the Western Hemisphere the islands of the Atlantic and Pacific and part of Africa would possess, Mr. President, neither in manpower nor in strategic and critical materials, nor in bases, would we stand a chance against a power that possessed all that vast area with all of its contents, in materials and people.

So, Mr. President, that would be the most dangerous course that I could imagine. For, referring to the ex-President's address, he not only counseled us to give up Asia, but he practically counseled us to give up Europe, unless the Europeans, within the time that he allows and in the manner that he devises, build up their own forces. Of course, we expect Europe to defend itself, but when we are aiding in the defense of Europe, what are we doing? We are trying to move an enemy that many more miles away from America's shore.

Mr. President, neither in World War I nor in World War II could we afford to let an enemy power occupy Europe and have its bases around the North Atlantic; for England could not stand in the face of European occupation by such a power, in all probability, and the result would be that an enemy would be on the shores of Western Europe; and we have never been willing to countenance a strong enemy power taking possession of the shores of Western Europe without our fighting to prevent it; yet this gentleman speaks as if we are doing Europe a favor to advance the outpost of our friends to a point further removed from the shores of our own beloved country. No, Mr. President; that is the kind of selfish doctrine which would lead almost of necessity to the destruction of our country by the evil enemies who have their designs of aggression upon us.

Now, Mr. President, at a large dinner the other night, a certain very rich man walked up to me, and we chatted a little bit. He said, "If you want to gain politically in this country, go out and advocate America for the Americans." "Well," I said, "I confess that there is much sentiment here in this country which would subscribe to such a doctrine. But I do not want political preferment at the price of sacrificing my country's security." Any man who counsels that doctrine, whether he knows it or not, threatens the security of his country. And if any there should be of those now in public office, who subscribe to any such fallacy, it is the same kind of isolationism which led us to the brink of disaster, upon the verge of World War II. I just cannot believe that either tragedy, unforeseen and regrettable reverses, or the magnitude of the sacrifice we shall have to make, will lead responsible American opinion ever to embrace so dangerous a doctrine; and I hope, Mr. President, that those who counsel it will diminish in number. Yet I read a statement in the paper, by so celebrated an author as Mr. Walter Lippmann, that we are going back toward armed isolation in America. Mr. President, we cannot defend America upon the shores of America, or upon even the oceans which touch the shores of America. Today, with modern weapons and with the means of aggression from foreign continents, we have got to stop an enemy before he springs, or else we risk destruction in his grasp.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. McFARLAND. I ask the Senator whether he observed the result to those countries which have defended their own shores, instead of striking where they should, and when they should?

Mr. PEPPER. Exactly. We saw how far the security of France was preserved by the Maginot line. It is the same psychology which they want us to adopt—a strong fleet and a strong army. I do not know where they think we are going to put them, unless we put them in the islands of the Atlantic and the Pacific, or else we are going to let the war come to America.

Mr. President, it is tragic enough for American men to have to fall in battle anywhere, but if the ravages of war have to sweep anywhere, and if it be possible to spare our own homes and cities, I should think Americans at least would be anxious to do so. I have seen in Germany and in the European Continent, as my colleagues have, and I saw in Korea, what has happened to those cities and those countrysides over which the terrors of war have rolled, and they talk about defending America here upon our own shores, which completely ignores the nature of modern weapons and of modern war.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. McFARLAND. Even if the United States should be victorious in such a war, I ask whether the same terrors of war would not exist at least everywhere throughout the United States after the battle was over?

Mr. PEPPER. Yes. Why, certainly. Mr. President, in the face of this ordeal, what should be our policy? In the first place, we should be stalwart in our determination to support the United Nations, to work with those nations of good will and democratic character, to build up their own strength and the capacity of the free world to resist aggression. The United Nations is not a broken reed. It has done one of the most heroic acts in history by flinging its forces into the teeth of aggression and saying, "Stop." I hope we shall not now undo all that great deed by saying it was all a mistake to have undertaken it, that we are too weak to resist aggression, therefore, let us supinely accede to it and let it sweep over the free world.

No, Mr. President; the United Nations is still a great and powerful organization. It has established one of the greatest precedents in human history—that the free nations will fight aggression. That is the only thing that will stop it, showing them that we are determined to continue to fight until it stops. I admit that all the other nations have not done as much as we. I am not sure that all have done as much as they could have or should have done.

Maybe they have not appreciated as much as we have the importance of collective security. Surely the weaker nations of the world should recognize that if there is a nation on earth which might perhaps exist behind the policy of isolation it is the United States. We, of all the nations, are the nation whose soil is perhaps in the least danger. Yet we have sent American men to fight on the other side of the globe. Why? Because we think it is important to the security of America. We are willing to pay that premium to be insured that the free world will collectively resist aggression.

I would earnestly admonish other nations more liable to danger and less secure, less remote than we, not to dally with their own security, but to pay a premium that would give them the insurance of collective security in case they were attacked, by doing their own heroic part.

Next, Mr. President, we have got to let the peoples of the world know the truth, that we are not fighting, as these lying propagandists say, for aggression, imperialism, exploitation, or trade. We are fighting for principle, for the right of an Asian to be free as well as for the right of an American to be free, to show that America does not associate itself with any form of exploitation of the people of Asia or of any other part of the world. Whatever may have been the sins of the past, we are trying to chart a course for the future that will respect the dignity and the well-being of every other man in the world, as we ask that our own citizens be respected. We are trying to be a good neighbor. We run into many embarrassing situations, and sometimes we have to make a choice between what appears to be the immediate course of expediency and the long-range course of policy or principle.

Mr. President, whenever I held a press conference in Asia, question after question was thrown at me. I was asked, "Why is the United States supporting the French in Indochina? Why have you got there, as the western champion, a man who has never been in sympathy with democracy? Why are you identifying yourselves with the most hated form of exploitation so far as the Asiatic peoples are concerned, namely, western colonialism?"

One can go through a tedious explanation of why we are doing it—to keep the vacuum from being occupied by sinister Communist forces while democratic forces can be built up. But I am convinced, Mr. President, that since this is a long-range war which we shall have to fight, a long-range struggle upon which we are engaged, we have got to do certain definite things to let the peoples of Asia and all the rest of the world know that they cannot fairly charge us with being allied with the old colonialism or any other form of imperialism. That leads me to believe that, much as we appreciate the friendship of the French, the time has come when in the larger interest the United Nations should do with respect to Indochina what it did with respect to Indonesia. It should ask the French and the other forces to come together to the bar of the United Nations and take appropriate steps to see to it that those peoples have their own country to run in their own way. Then the United States as well as the United Nations would properly support the democratic forces that might be recognized, and then we would be free of the charge that we were alining ourselves with the hated imperialism of the past.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I should like to say to the Senator that the statement he just made with regard to his position on the Indochina question is most gratifying to the junior Senator from Oregon. To have one of the ability of the Senator from Florida and with the knowledge of foreign affairs possessed by him take that position is exceedingly satisfying to the junior Senator from Oregon, because during my recent campaign in the State of Oregon the question of Indochina came up in open-forum meeting after open-forum meeting, and I would be asked, "What is your position on Indochina?"

I want to say that I took the identical position which has just been expressed on the floor of the Senate, namely, that I think the United States should make clear to the United Nations that we feel that Indochina should receive the same procedural treatment that we insisted upon in connection with Indonesia. I think it is important that we make it perfectly clear to the French. They are not going to like it any better than the Dutch liked the position we took on Indonesia. But, after all, if we are going to chart a system of international justice through law, they too must submit these great questions to the processes of adjudication. I think the Indochina question ought to be answered by way of adjudication. They are going to have to face the fact that there should be an honorable negotiation worked out through the same kind of an international arbitration tribunal as we insisted upon in connection with Indochina.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I appreciate more than I can express the concurrence of the able and respected Senator from Oregon. I feel that we must say to our friends as well as to others that we have got to go before the people of the world with clean hands if we are going to expect the people of the world to follow our leadership.

Mr. President, the next thing is that I think we have got to support the democratic forces of the world wherever there are areas of controversy and question. I think that sometimes we have been too dilatory in helping the liberal forces. In a certain country there was a Prime Minister in office, and our Ambassador said he was the best man that had ever headed the government there, that he was trying to carry out reforms for the benefit of the people and trying to aline that country with the democratic forces of the world. He has his own problems of internal politics, and always the sinister, scheming, slimy opposition of the Communists to sow discord and build up dissensions. When there are cases such as that, we need to help the liberal forces to help the people to broaden and strengthen the democratic base of government.

I think the time has come, Mr. President, for us not to be too timid about it and not to be too niggardly or too shortsighted. I know of one country in which the government may fall in a short time because of waiting for an Export-Import Bank loan, in spite of the entreaty of our Ambassador that in the interest of supporting a peace-loving government, the loan should be expedited.

We must act with more effectiveness and acceleration than that.

Mr. President, we, of course, must not allow any doctrine of either isolation or appeasement to weaken this great fight we have been carrying on to build a better world. After all, Mr. President, there has never in human history been anything so dramatic as the program which we started shortly after 1945, and which the United Nations has recently carried out. I am proud to have been part of a Government which had a part in the establishment of the United Nations Organization. I think history will record that the American part has not been an ignoble one in the setting up of that great institution. I am proud to have been a part of a Government which brought the Western Hemisphere nations into a closer fraternity, as we did by the Rio pact in 1945, when we agreed upon the principle of collective defense and collective resistance to aggression. I am proud, Mr. President, that our Government had a part, through the United Nations in resisting Soviet threats to Iran, without which, probably, that rich area of the world might long ago have been occupied.

Mr. President, I opposed the Truman doctrine in 1947 when it was first proposed, on the ground that we should not go unilaterally into Greece. I thought we should have gone as we have gone into this war in Korea, collectively, with members of the United Nations, or at least with those who would go with us. In going into Korea several nations did not go along, but the majority of nations did. I believe the majority of nations would have gone with us into Greece. Maybe I was right. Maybe I was wrong. As it turned out, we faced no real violent resistance as undoubtedly we can see now in retrospect, although we can see and observe the dangers which it entailed. However, when that decision was made, I supported the appropriations for it, and ever since that time I have supported every program that has been proposed by this Government which would stop aggression and strengthen the democratic and peace-loving forces of the world.

Mr. President, I am glad, therefore, to see that the nations in Europe with whom we were associated in the war have established a western union and a nucleus for cooperation more effective than it ever previously existed among the democratic nations of Europe.

Mr. President, I am proud to have been a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations which recommended, and a Member of the Senate that approved, the North Atlantic Pact, under which the nations assumed a reciprocal obligation to resist aggression and to stand up for peace and decency in the world.

Mr. President, I am proud to have been a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations which recommended, and of the Senate that adopted, a military aid program for Europe, parts of the Middle East, and areas in Asia.

I am glad, Mr. President, to have seen in my service in the Senate and to have had some part in the adoption of all that flowed from the North Atlantic Pact and the military aid program, namely, the council which was set up by the North Atlantic Pact nations and the military organization which was set up by those states, and to have seen the recent appointment by the President as the supreme commander of the forces of the Atlantic Pact nations of that great general, Gen. Dwight Eisenhower. He gives new hope to the democratic forces of the world that he will lead them in resistance to modern totalitariansim as effectively as he did against that initiated by the devilish Hitler.

Mr. President, I am glad that today's and yesterday's papers tell about the new spirit of cooperation and determination in Europe which our Secretary of State brings back, and the heartening message of the President to the effect that there is a new courage displayed in Europe today and grounds upon which we may base a more confident belief that they will do their full and great part than we have entertained heretofore.

Mr. President, what shall we do? We shall simply go ahead with that program, not retreating, not stopping, not shrinking. Mr. President, let us expand it and carry it ahead so long as the necessity exists.

Mr. President, I am also proud to have been part of a Congress which has met every request of the Executive to mobilize this country and which in its last hours has poured out twenty billion more dollars and is prepared to provide whatever funds are necessary to strengthen America. In fact, Congress, instead of being laggard, has been far ahead of the Executive in demanding more effective mobilization than we have thus far achieved, appreciating the deadly necessity that faces us, and the urgency of effective action, before again we shall have heard uttered the lament: "Too little and too late." What we have done since 1945 and the aims to which we have dedicated ourselves are the right course, Mr. President. All we need to do is to be strong in our faith, unfailing in our courage, and to go ahead in the way Americans are expected to go.

Mr. President, I mention last the most important thing. None of these things are possible, no hope of survival, let alone of victory over these evil forces of national aggression and communistic conquest, unless we have in America a united people bent upon a single purpose, standing for a decent and free world. Mr. President, this is no time for back biting. This is no time to profiteer politically with the peril of America. This is no time for a back-seat driver, Mr. President, to seek to direct where he is not in a position for the best of observation and responsibility.

What do these criticisms do? I will read from the New York Times of December 21, yesterday, at page 14:

ATLANTIC PARLEY ACCORDS VIEWED SKEPTICALLY BY SOME

Despite President Truman's reassertion of his intention to retain both Secretary Acheson and Defense Secretary George C. Marshall in his Cabinet, the continual rumors of their eventual departure worry those governments that have hitched their fate to the destiny of the United States. Although Mr. Truman's reiteration of faith in Mr. Acheson was received with pleasure, some delegates still talked of the Secretary's own desire to resign "at a date convenient to American and allied interests."

Mr. President, would any American think that General Eisenhower could do his job with constant demand in the United States Congress that he be fired?

Mr. President, I have not always been a great admirer of General MacArthur. I confess that I changed my mind after I got to know the man briefly, particularly when I saw the character of his work in Japan. While in the opinion of some soapbox orators, stove strategists, and armchair generals General MacArthur ought to be kicked out, on the 12th of December I sent this telegram to Gen. Douglas MacArthur:

DECEMBER 12, 1950.

Gen. DOUGLAS MACARTHUR,
Supreme Commander, Allied Powers,
Tokyo, Japan:

All of us deeply gratified your statement. We have undiminished confidence and faith in you and our magnificent Armed Forces in Korea, and will support you to the limit. All regards.

CLAUDE PEPPER,
United States Senator.

To which General MacArthur replied as follows, "Thanks and deepest appreciation paid."

When he is being sorely pressed by the enemy is no time to stab him in the back at home.

I said the same thing to the other great generals who are commanding over there. I sent a telegram to Gen. Walton H. Walker, in which I said:

DECEMBER 12, 1950.

Lt. Gen. WALTON H. WALKER,
Commanding General, Eighth Army, Korea:

The gratitude and acclaim of the country go out to you and your heroic command for the wisdom, the valor, and the sacrifices with which you have emerged, still a glorious fighting force, from your unprecedented ordeal. You know my thoughts have been with you all and you have our continuing confidence.

CLAUDE PEPPER,
United States Senator.

General Walker replied:

Your message is deeply appreciated. My command is heartened, encouraged, and sustained by the knowledge that their efforts have the confidence and support of our people at home, whose stake in this war is as great as that of the soldiers who fight.

WALTON H. WALKER.

I knew I spoke not only for myself but for the American people.

I also sent a telegram to Gen. Edward M. Almond, in which I said:

Your country is grateful your splendid leadership and magnificent performance of your heroic forces in the ordeal from which they have emerged.

General Almond replied:

The officers and the men of the X corps deeply appreciate your inspiring message on their performance in combat during recent operations here in Korea. I am personally most grateful for your expression in my behalf. Maj. Gen. E. M. Almond.

I also sent a telegram to Gen. Oliver P. Smith, heroic commander of the valorous First Marine Division:

The heart of the Nation goes out to you in understanding praise for the magnificent courage and intrepid valor with which the First Division has emerged triumphant from its ordeal.

I have not heard from General Smith.

Mr. President, I would rather go on record as telling our leaders in time of adversity, "We are supporting you," than to be sniping at them or saying, "We never liked that fellow. Let us get rid of him." Critics write to me and say, "I read in the newspaper that you stated that you thought General MacArthur was a great general. We think he is a flop. Why do they not get rid of him?"

Mr. President, I have not followed the practice of running under fire. I still believe that General MacArthur is a great general. He has done everything that human direction could have done in the face of a very desperate situation. At least I am going to support him to the best of my ability in his herculean efforts.

It is not too much to say that our Secretary of State, Mr. Acheson, and our Secretary of Defense, General Marshall, are entitled to the same kind of support. General Marshall needs no defense. The record of the Secretary of State is a great record. Who equals that record as Secretary of State? It is said that he did not defend Formosa. I heard his speech at the Press Club in January 1950. If one reads that speech he finds that he did not say that we would not defend Korea as a member of the United Nations if it were attacked by the forces of aggression. He was speaking of a perimeter which was essential to the United States, and which the United States would defend whether anyone helped us or not—such as the Philippines, Okinawa, the Aleutian Islands, the Kuriles, and other places which we regarded as of necessity outposts of our own national defense. We do not have to ask the United Nations whether or not to defend the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. Acheson has not been an appeaser. He made the first speech for the Marshall plan at the Mississippi Delta Cotton Council, ahead of Marshall's Harvard address in 1947. Why? To stop economically the forces of aggression. I know of no man who has held more stalwartly to his course, that we could not rely upon the Russian word. When he first began to say that I did not believe him. I still thought it might be possible to come to some honorable accord with the Russians, until I abandoned hope entirely. They did not want an accord. They wanted conquest, or supine yielding to their aggressive force.

I respectfully say that the greatest shield of American strength is the unity of our people in their determination to continue to fight aggression, to continue to resist the devilish doctrine of communism in every way within our power, by trying to build a stronger and more noble edifice of democracy in every part of the world.

Some ask, "How long is it going to last? Where is it going to stop?" I do not know, and no one else does. In my opinion, this is the darkest period of American history, if not human history. It is the first time that, through the dark, impenetrable veil of the future, there is no glimmer of the light of hope, save the confidence that is in our faith, that God is still in his heaven, and that, just as right has prevailed in the long and tortuous past, it will again emerge triumphant under the banners of the just, the valorous, and the courageous. It will, of course, require sacrifice. The mobilization upon which we are now embarked is but the foothills of the mountains which we must ascend, the mountains of struggle and sacrifice, before we finally come to the eventual glorious dawn of victory.

Mr. President, there have been other periods in history when men who were on the side of God and good have struggled against darkness and superior forces, and have won. If that were not true, we would not have this grand world which is our inheritance today. We shall win, too. Have no doubt about that.

I saw Hitler in 1938, swaggering in his arrogance of Nuremberg, with Goering, Hess, and others about him. I saw most of them at Nuremberg again in 1945 at the prisoners' dock; and a little while later, most of them, in the very cold dawn in a forlorn jailyard, were hanged by the neck until they were dead.

I saw the swaggering braggart Mussolini in the streets of Rome taking the acclaim of the populace as he reviewed his troops. Seven years later he was dead, hanged ignobly by the heels by his own irate people, to the beams of a filling station.

Let Stalin read the lessons of history. They certainly should be sufficient to deter him from the evil course upon which he has embarked. But without unity here at home we shall be divided, and in division will come defeat for ourselves and all that we hold dear.

Mr. President, I have heard it said that in the Scandinavian countries it was the practice at one time for the priest, when the fishermen were about to go off to the sea in ships, to meet with them at the seaside, and, as their families were gathered around, to give what is called the fishermen's benediction. At this time, for the benefit of my beloved country and my colleagues, who have such fearful responsibility, may I, with no irreverence, repeat that benediction:

May the Lord bless thee and keep thee, grant thee favoring wind, a prosperous voyage, safe harbors, and stout hearts for the storms.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I hope all Senators who are not present will read the able, courageous, and instructive speech of the distinguished Senator from Florida. I hope that many others throughout the United States will also read it. I have heard him deliver many, many able speeches on the floor of the Senate. I am not so sure but that his last speech has been his best. I have certainly been rewarded for remaining here and listening to his speech. I know that if other Senators could have known what was in store for them, they would have remained to listen.

I regret very much that the Senator from Florida had to speak at such a late hour. His willingness to wait showed the magnanimous attitude which he has evidenced throughout his career in the United States Senate. I wish him well, and I hope that this will be the happiest and best Christmas ever for him.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield for a moment?

Mr. McFARLAND. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I join the Senator from Arizona in his commendation of the great speech just delivered by the Senator from Florida. I have heard the Senator from Florida make a number of historic speeches in the Senate. I would that every American could have heard the speech which he delivered here today. I feel that I am greatly indebted to him for the inspiration which he has given to me in his great speech, a speech of penetrating foresight and keen analysis, a courageous speech with regard to the great obligations and duties which confront the American people in the crisis which is ours.

I join with the Senator from Arizona in wishing the Senator from Florida Godspeed. I believe that he has made a great contribution to American history through his service in the Senate. I am sure I speak for my colleagues in the Senate when I say he will always find a warm welcome when he returns among us, which I hope will be often.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I thank my distinguished friends who have spoken so generously, and say that from no mouths could I have heard words that would have made me happier.

Mr. McFARLAND. I am sure we speak the sentiments of the entire United States Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCHOEPPEL in the chair). Let the present occupant of the chair, without he hopes violating any of the dignities of this position, join and say, "Godspeed" to the Senator from Florida who has just concluded a great speech. I wish him good luck.

Mr. PEPPER. I thank the Senator from Kansas very much.

AMENDMENT OF SECTION 22 (d) (6) OF THE INTERNAL REVENUE CODE

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, on behalf of the distinguished senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], from the Committee on Finance, I ask unanimous consent to report favorably, with amendments, House bill 9794 to amend section 22 (d) (6) of the Internal Revenue Code, and I request its immediate consideration.

Mr. President, I understand there is no objection to the bill. However, if there should be later, I am informed by the Parliamentarian that on the days on which the Senate meets next week a motion to reconsider could not be made. Such a motion could be made, however, on the following Tuesday, January 2. The meetings to be held next week will not be in the sense of the word actual sessions of the Senate as provided for in the rules limiting the time for reconsideration. That is, there will be no actual sessions held next week under Rule 13.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the bill by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H. R. 9794) to amend section 22 (d) (6) of the Internal Revenue Code.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McFARLAND. I yield

Mr. MORSE. I have discussed this bill with the minority leader, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY]. I am advised that the bill meets with the approval of the Republican members of the committee which reported the bill to the Senate. Therefore, the Republican side of the aisle offers no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9794) to amend section 22 (d) (6) of the Internal Revenue Code, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments, on page 2, line 6, after the word "Years", to strike out "Beginning after December 31, 1949", and insert "Ending after June 30, 1950"; on page 2, line 12, after the word "Years", to strike out "Beginning after December 1, 1949", and insert "Ending after June 30, 1950"; on page 2, line 15, after the word "year", to strike out "beginning after December 31, 1949", and insert "ending after June 30, 1950", and on page 5, line 16, after the word "years", to strike out "beginning after December 31, 1949", and insert "ending after June 30, 1950."

The amendments were agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read the third time.

The bill (H. R. 9794) was read the third time and passed.

NOMINATION OF ANNA M. ROSENBERG—STATEMENT BY BRIG. GEN. JULIUS KLEIN

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, recently the Armed Services Committee of the United States Senate held intensive hearings on the nomination of Mrs. Anna M. Rosenberg for the position of Assistant Secretary of Defense. We received much help from a great many people in this country who recognized that the attack on Mrs. Rosenberg was unwarranted, was unfair, and, unfortunately, represented a spirit of intolerance, which if it becomes widespread in America, will endanger the great principles of democracy. Among those who were of great help to the junior Senator from Oregon in connection with his work on the Armed Services Committee in respect to the nomination was the consultant on national defense to the Republican National Committee, Gen. Julius Klein. I think it is only fitting and proper that I pay him this tribute of thanks and commendation on the floor of the Senate so that acknowledgement of his fine work may be a matter of record.

I want to say that he was a great help to me in supplying me information in answer to certain questions raised by the unfair and false charges against Anna Rosenberg, questions which I thought needed to be answered as we proceeded with those hearings.

Following the nomination a press release was issued in regard to Mr. Klein's position on the Rosenberg nomination, and I ask unanimous consent that the press release may be incorporated in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"A group of open and notorious anti-Semites who sought to make Anna M. Rosenberg the victim of an American Dreyfus case has succeeded only in crippling this country's defense effort in an hour of immediate national peril," Brig. Gen. Julius Klein, of Chicago, asserted here today.

General Klein is the consultant on national defense to the Republican National Committee and a past national commander of the Jewish War Veterans of the United States of America.

Along with a group of national leaders, including Bernard M. Baruch, Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower, former Secretary of War Robert P. Patterson, Gen. Walter Bedell Smith and others, he urged full Republican support for Mrs. Rosenberg's confirmation when her appointment was first recommended by Secretary of Defense Marshall. He charged that "precious weeks have been lost at a time when minutes are essential to preparations for the Nation's defense."

He added: "The Senate should proceed at once to a unanimous confirmation of Mrs. Rosenberg. By so doing it will indicate that those who are charged with the responsibility of making the Nation's laws will not tolerate the use of anti-Semitism and bigotry as political weapons."

General Klein noted that he had urged Republican Members of the Senate to endorse Mrs. Rosenberg's appointment because "As a woman she would have a special appreciation of the problems confronting American wives and mothers who twice in this decade are suffering the impact of a war emergency."

Exposure of "the clumsy plot to smear an able public servant," he said, "will prove of little value if the Senate does not speed action to determine whether Mrs. Rosenberg was the victim of calculated perjury, so that if guilt is properly assessed, prompt prosecution can be instituted."

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I now wish to take 4 or 5 minutes to make very brief comment on a great issue which I think confronts America, the issue of what kind of a foreign policy America will follow in the critical months ahead. It is an issue which raises the question as to whether or not the people of this country are going to continue to give support to a very much needed bipartisan foreign policy based upon a recognition that America cannot stand alone in the world without friends, that America cannot isolate herself from the rest of the world and survive in the great struggle between freedom and totalitarianism. That conflict is bound, I think, to be the struggle of our generation.

This afternoon my good friend, the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. WATKINS] presented his point of view, and he did it ably and sincerely. He commented on the speech of the ex-President of the United States, Mr. Hoover. The point of view which the able Senator from Utah presented this afternoon was almost diametrically opposed to the point of view the junior Senator from Oregon presented to the Senate at length yesterday. In the course of his remarks this afternoon the Senator from Utah pointed out that it was much to be desired that there be full and frank discussion of this great question of foreign policy. I completely agree with him, and undoubtedly in the weeks ahead, as we come into a new session of Congress, that issue is going to be the issue that will perhaps receive greater attention of the Congress than any other issue.

The Senator from Utah this afternoon raised a series of questions, and said he thought it was very important that the American people be informed of the administration's stand on the questions he raised. I agree with him. I feel that to the extent the administration can make available to the American people the information called for by those questions, it should do so, keeping in mind the fact, of course, that for security reasons certain information sometimes cannot be given to the American people when we would like to have it given.

On the other hand, I think it is very important that the administration does not use the matter of security and military secrecy as an alibi for denying to the American people information that it is in fact safe to give to them.

In the course of his remarks this afternoon the distinguished Senator from Utah pointed out that the ex-President of the United States, Mr. Hoover, was really a citizen of the world—and he is quite right about that. But I want to say here tonight, Mr. President, in taking a position somewhat different from that of the Senator from Utah with regard to the speech of the ex-President, that the ex-President of the United States, Mr. Hoover, is not a military expert. I think that in his speech to the American people he demonstrated very clearly that he is not a military expert. I think one of the most unfortunate results of that speech, as is evidenced today by the newspaper stories and by the types of telegrams which Members of the Senate are receiving from people all over the United States, is that the speech of the ex-President has tended to give millions of American people a sense of security that is not supported by the facts. It seems to me that it is most unfortunate that one of the impressions formed by millions of Americans from the speech of the ex-President is that it is militarily safe for us to withdraw unto ourselves and to assume that the Atlantic and the Pacific Oceans, together with the building up of our Navy and our Air Force, will be adequate to protect our security. The Hoover speech gave the impression to many Americans that we can walk out of Europe with safety.

Mr. President, there is no question but that at least until this hour the reaction of many Americans to the speech of the ex-President has been one which has satisfied a psychological yearning of every American for an escape from the realities of the world situation. Each and every one of us must constantly be on guard, in connection with our own thinking on these problems, to make certain that we are not victimizing ourselves by exposing ourselves to the constant danger of a psychological escape mechanism, more commonly called wishful thinking—the psychological delight of imagining facts, when facts do not exist.

Mr. President, I was so disturbed about the implications of that part of the speech of the ex-President, which I think stirred up those feelings of false security on the part of many people, that today I took advantage of the opportunity to cross-examine one of the highest military officials in our Government. He is a general upon whose shoulders rest great responsibilities for the safety of our Nation. The replies I received from that high military official leave no room for doubt that the ex-President of the United States should have consulted with military officials of our Government before he, with his great prestige and great influence in this country, made a speech which had the effect of giving to the American people by the millions a false sense of security that is unwarranted by the military facts. For the RECORD, Mr. President, I wish to mention some of the questions I asked that high military official this afternoon, and I wish to give for the RECORD my best recollection of his answers.

I asked this high military official what his opinion was in regard to the following question:

General, if Western Europe, with all its industrial, war-making power, should fall into the hands of Communist Russia, and if we found ourselves in all-out war with Russia, would the fact that Russia controlled Western Europe make it more difficult for us to defeat Russia?

Mr. President, I think the Senate should ponder the answer that general gave to the question. He said, in effect:

It not only would make it more difficult for us to defeat Russia, but I think it is doubtful whether we would defeat her, whether we would survive that struggle.

Mr. President, I do not quote him verbatim, because I do not have the record before me; but I assure the Senate that is the import of his answer to my question.

Let us ponder the significance of that answer, Mr. President. Here we have a high military authority in our country, fully familiar with the great military problems that confront our country and the world; and in his answer to that question, he bore out the major premise of the speech I made yesterday on the floor of the Senate, namely, that if we walk out of Europe and permit Russia to obtain control of the Ruhr, there is a great danger and a great question whether in the years ahead America will survive an all-out war with Russia.

I think that military point of view needs to be made clear to those Americans who tonight are tending to victimize themselves by means of a psychological escape mechanism of wishful thinking about our security, and who wish to accept the false assumption made by the ex-President in his speech, namely, that it is safe for us to withdraw unto ourselves on this continent, and to assume that the Pacific and the Atlantic Oceans, along with a Navy and an Air Force, will protect us adequately in an all-out war with Russia.

Mr. President, there is no basis in fact for that assumption; but, to the contrary, the best military advice available to us is that our survival itself would be seriously threatened if we followed the philosophy set forth in that part of the speech of the ex-President.

I wanted to be sure that I thoroughly understood the position of this high-ranking American military authority, so I put the question in a somewhat different way, and asked him in effect this:

General, do you think it would be correct to say that if Western Europe should fall to Soviet Russia the resulting industrial war-making power of Western Europe in the hands of Russia would prolong for several years a war with Russia?

His reply, in effect, was:

It would not prolong it for several years; it would prolong it for many years.

Mr. President, that is one of the points I tried to drive home yesterday in my major speech on this question—namely, that we Americans must face the ugly reality, which in my opinion was not properly emphasized in the speech of the ex-President the other night, that if we lose Western Europe to Russia, we are going to be in a death struggle with Russia for a great many years, and it is doubtful whether we will survive that struggle.

I then asked the general if he thought that Russia would be able to use the industrial war-making power of Europe if she overran Europe by putting into effect with any degree of success her policy of slave labor or enforced labor of conquered people?

He replied in effect that he had little doubt about it judging from the success Russia has had in other conquered countries in respect to enforcing her slave-labor program.

Mr. President, I think the general is absolutely right. The people of Western Europe would have no choice. They would either have to produce war goods for Russia or be shot. That is the police-state method.

That is why I say, Mr. President, we must make clear to the American people in these days that, after all, Western Europe constitutes the front line of American defense, and if we walk out on our allies in Western Europe and adopt the isolationist philosophy which characterizes much of the speech of the ex-President of the United States, we shall threaten the security of America and the destiny of our country.

As far as I am concerned, I am going to continue to stand up against this flood of isolationism that is sweeping America in these days, because I think that flood of isolationism threatens to engulf and drown the security of the American people. The American people must be told, I think, that this hour is so critical that they must recognize that the psychologically comforting feeling of wishful thinking is one of their greatest enemies. They must face coldly and objectively the ugly facts of the world in which we live; and the ugliest fact of all is the fact that Soviet Russia gives every indication that she is proceeding to prepare herself as rapidly as possible to make war on the United States.

That is why I protest, Mr. President, the particular emphasis which the ex-President of the United States gave to his speech the other night, when I think unfortunately he gave the American people the impression that we could walk out on Europe and be secure in the United States. Mr. President, today I attended a conference of two Senate committees at which appeared the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Army, and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. I am not privileged to discuss the information which was given us at that committee meeting in respect to the Brussels Conference. Incidentally, I think that much of the information which was given to us in regard to that conference should be given to all the American people. There were some things said of such a top-secret nature that I think it would be a great mistake to make them public; because to make them public would be of great assistance to our enemies. But much of the discussion could be given to the American people, and I think should be. I hope that at an early date the President of the United States will, either himself or through the Secretary of State, give the American people as much of a detailed report about the Brussels Conference as possible. I interpreted some of the remarks of my good friend from Utah this afternoon to be a plea for the same sort of information and on that, I think he is right. But what I do want to say about the joint committee meeting this afternoon, Mr. President, is that I wish the American people could have heard the Secretary of State give his report on the Brussels Conference. If they could have heard it, they would have found in his factual analysis much greater reassurance for the security of America than they can possibly find in the speech of the ex-President of the United States given the other night. As I listened to the Secretary of State this afternoon and to the Secretary of the Army, and to the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, I had a better understanding, a much clearer understanding of the great significance of the North Atlantic Pact and of the military implementation of it to the security of 160,000,000 American people. If the American people could have heard the report we received this afternoon, they would have a much clearer conception of the fact that the North Atlantic Pact and the military implementation of it constitute our front line of defense in this great struggle of freedom against totalitarianism. They would also have heard a report, in my judgment, which constituted a complete answer to the false assumptions contained in the ex-President's speech the other night.

I am satisfied from the information I received at the joint committee meeting this afternoon, and from the answers that I received from a high American military authority today, as I questioned him, that the major objections and reservations that I made to the ex-President's speech, on the floor of the Senate yesterday afternoon, in connection with the military implications of that speech were absolutely and completely correct. I repeat, I think it most unfortunate that the ex-President of the United States did not consult with the high military authorities of this country in regard to the military problems which confront our country, before he made a speech that gave the American people the impression that we could withdraw unto ourselves on the American Continent and take refuge on this side of the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans, stick our heads in the sand, and wishfully think ourselves into a security which does not exist, and will not exist for us, if we walk out on our allies in Europe.

I want to say, here and now, as a member of the Armed Services Committee of the United States Senate, that I do not believe there is any basis in fact for the assumption that our allies in Europe are not going to fulfill their full share of obligation in carrying out the objectives of the North Atlantic Pact. But let us keep in mind the fact that this fight for freedom is ours as well as theirs. Let us keep in mind the fact that Russia is as great a threat to us as she is to Western Europe. In fact, I happen to be one who believes that we in the United States, that our capitalistic system is the No. 1 target of Soviet Russia. If we are going to be able to stop Russia from gaining the great industrial war-making power that she would have if she got possession of the Ruhr and Western Europe, we must help make the North Atlantic Pact a success.

I close, Mr. President, by saying that in the historic debate which is going to be conducted in this country for the weeks ahead, the American people are going to face and answer the issue as to whether we are going to hold fast to that great philosophy of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], based upon the sound concept that we must in our generation seek to establish a system of international justice under law, or whether we are going to withdraw unto ourselves and prepare to face the Russian threat alone after Russia takes Europe which she will do if we walk out of Europe. Are we going to get our heads out of the sand too late to save ourselves? Are we going to wipe the myopia of isolationism away from our eyes too late, only to discover that we stand alone in the world? Mr. President, as I said yesterday if we follow the false assumptions of the Hoover speech we will stand as an isolated island of freedom surrounded by the raging seas of communism that will engulf and drown both our security and our freedom.

That is the issue between an isolationist philosophy that is rearing its head in this country and a philosophy of sound internationalism that recognizes that mankind has entered into an era in which freemen of the world must stand together. We must follow the principle of "United we stand for freedom, or divided we fall into the slave state of Russian communism."

EXPRESSION OF APPRECIATION—RECESS

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, before moving a recess, I wish to take this opportunity of again expressing my appreciation to those who have waited on the Senate during the past year, and who have worked with us tirelessly and have remained in attendance when many other Senators have gone home on evenings such as this. I wish each and every one of them the best and the happiest Christmas ever.

Now, Mr. President, in accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement previously entered into, I move that the Senate stand in recess until Tuesday next, at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 8 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.), the recess being under the unanimous consent agreement, the Senate took a recess to Tuesday, December 26, 1950, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1950

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou great God of all love and mercy, we thank Thee for this hallowed and joyous Christmas season, commemorating the birth of our blessed Lord.

We are again calling to mind and pondering the oft-repeated beautiful story of the shepherds bowing in adoration and humility at the manger of the Christ Child and the story of the wise men following in the wake of natural piety and worshiping at the same shrine.

We rejoice that when there was no eye to pity and no arm to save them in the fullness of time Thou didst send Thy Son to be the Saviour of the world.

Grant that the Christ of prophecy and of history may become the Christ of experience. May there be in us and in the hearts of all mankind a new nativity of His spirit of peace and good will.

May this Christmas not only be a time of commemoration but of consecration when we shall pledge ourselves anew to every righteous endeavor to hasten that glorious day of prediction when every knee shall bow and every tongue shall confess that the Christ is the Lord to the glory of God.

Bless our beloved country, our homes, and all who are near and dear unto us. Wilt Thou give some special blessing and revelation of Thy sustaining presence and peace to our fellow citizens who are out on the fields of battle. May we daily send them our thoughts of love through the Christ of Christmas.

Hear us in the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

H. R. 4653. An act for the relief of the New York Quinine & Chemical Works, Inc., Merck & Co., Inc., and Mallinckrodt Chemical Works; and

H. R. 9893. An act to authorize certain construction at military and naval installations, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 4266. An act to amend and extend title II of the First War Powers Act, 1941.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 9920. An act making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the foregoing bill; requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. HAYDEN, Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma, Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. MCCARRAN, Mr. O'MAHONEY, Mr. BRIDGES, Mr. GURNEY, Mr. WHERRY, and Mr. CORDON to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

NATIONAL HISTORICAL PUBLICATIONS COMMISSION

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to the provisions of title V, Public Law 754, Eighty-first Congress, the Chair appoints as a member of the National Historical Publications Commission the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH].

TEMPORARY APPROPRIATIONS FOR 1951

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 555) making temporary appropriations for the fiscal year 1951, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there are hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the several departments, agencies, corporations, and other organizational units in each branch of the Government, such amounts as may be necessary for the carrying out of projects or activities for which appropriations, funds, or other authority (subject to limitations, restrictions, and permissive provisions) would be made available by the Second Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1951 (H. R. 9920, 81st Cong., 2d sess.), to the extent and in the manner provided for by said act as passed by the House of Representatives on December 15, 1950, or as passed by the Senate on December 21, 1950, whichever is lower: Provided, That no funds are appropriated by this joint resolution for any project or activity not provided for by both Houses in said bill.

SEC. 2. Appropriations and funds made available, and authority granted, pursuant to this joint resolution, shall remain available until (a) enactment into law of an appropriation for any project or activity provided for herein, or (b) enactment of the applicable appropriation act by both Houses without any provision for such project or activity, or (c) January 3, 1951, whichever first occurs.

SEC. 3. Expenditures from appropriations or funds made available pursuant to this joint resolution shall be charged to any applicable appropriation or fund whenever a bill in which such applicable appropriation or fund is contained is enacted into law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. TABER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the chairman of the committee to explain this resolution?

Mr. CANNON. This is a continuing resolution. It is couched largely in routine language. It makes available the money provided in the pending bill upon which both Houses have agreed. If there is a difference as to the amount, the lower of the two is appropriated by this resolution. Any item which is not in either version of the bill is suspended pending action in conference. The resolution expires on January 3, 1951.

Mr. TABER. The idea would be that we would go to conference and clean it up before that time?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. TABER. On top of that, the provision that is made here would take care of all needed defense activities until that date?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; that is correct, Mr. Speaker. We expect to go to conference on the pending bill as soon as a quorum is available, which is expected to be January 1. In the meantime, there are funds included in the bill for necessary defense expenditures which should be made available immediately. This takes care of all items on which there is complete agreement.

Mr. TABER. I withdraw my reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RETIRING MEMBERS OF CONGRESS

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, with the conclusion of this session of the Eighty-first Congress, which will certainly come not later than Tuesday, January 2, there will be a number of distinguished Members of the House who will conclude their public services to the people of the United States. The Nation is fortunate in having had the services of these men. They will leave these legislative halls, Mr. Speaker, and return to private life bearing with them the gratitude and the appreciation of their colleagues and of the Nation for work well done. With them will also go the best wishes of all of us for their health, happiness, and prosperity in the years ahead.

I have asked for this time, Mr. Speaker, to especially pay tribute in my humble way to two Members of this House who have served on our side of the aisle, with the Republican minority. They have not only served their party, but in a broader sense, their country, with exceptional ability and with patriotic fervor.

These two men to whom I refer are legislative veterans—although young in spirit and in vision—who have served for 30 years in the Congress of the United States. I refer to the Honorable JAMES W. WADSWORTH, of New York, who has served 8 years in this body and 12 years as a Member of the United States Senate with great credit to himself and added honor to his family name; and to EARL C. MICHENER, of Michigan, who has been a leading Member of this body for 30 years. Both of these distinguished gentlemen are retiring voluntarily to private life. Both of them have been repeatedly urged by their constituents, of both political parties, to continue their public service. Yet they have been so diligent, contributed so much, and worked so zealously in behalf of the people they represent, that none of us can gainsay the fact that they have earned the right to the rest from their labors they seek. Both of these men served their country in its time of need. Both are veterans of our Armed Forces. Both fought beneath Old Glory in the war with Spain. Certainly they have set before all of us an example of public service and patriotic devotion that we can well follow.

They go forth from these halls into private life with the full knowledge in their own hearts and souls that they have lived good lives; that they have never done that of which they need be ashamed; that they have acted only as they believed was in the best interests of their beloved country. They take with them the love and affection of all who have known them.

It has been my privilege to have worked closely with both of these gentlemen as a member of the Committee on Rules. I know something of the stuff of which they are made, and of their strength of character which typifies the best in American manhood. Of each of them it can be truthfully said, "Well done, my good and faithful servant," for they have kept the faith.

Personally, and on behalf of each Member of this House, I wish them Godspeed.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I gladly yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CANNON. I thank the gentleman for his consideration and appreciate the opportunity to join in the richly merited tribute he pays our colleagues who are leaving us.

One of the many compensations for service in the House of Representatives is association with the exceptional class of men who serve with us. As the years pass we are prone to forget on which side of the aisle they sit. While we must at times disagree with them on political and economic questions, that does not mean personal disagreement. After the debatable issue has been settled as it properly should be settled, the friendship and comradeship and mutual regard between those who battle on the proposition is all the stronger.

May I especially concur in the tribute which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] has paid the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER]. I regret, both personally and because of my interest in the House, the retirement of Mr. MICHENER. He has rendered not only distinguished service throughout these critical 30 years, but he is one of the ablest and most accomplished parliamentarians who has served in the House. On that account, as well as for many other invaluable services, he will be missed in the coming Congress.

And AL ENGEL is leaving. He probably has a wider and more comprehensive first-hand knowledge of the United States Military Establishment than any man who has ever sat in either House. To him in no small part is due much of the credit of modernizing and motorizing land branches of the military service.

We have on this side, too, Mr. Speaker, men whose retirement will leave vacancies which it will be difficult to fill.

It is going to be especially difficult to fill STEVE PACE'S place. He has served in a broad field including every interest of the Nation, but his comprehensive knowledge of all questions affecting agriculture and his wise and patriotic contribution to the solution of agricultural problems is perhaps unsurpassed by that of any man who has served in the American Congress in the last half century.

It is going to be hard to find a man to carry on adequately WILL WHITTINGTON'S work. In his service he has written one of the important chapters in the development of the Mississippi Valley.

HARDIN PETERSON also is leaving us, to the general regret of the House. No one leaves more or warmer friends. We tried in vain to dissuade him. When I was in his State recently I found a strong sentiment in favor of drafting him for the governorship of the State. No better selection could be made for that high position. But he will never serve in any official capacity more effectively than he has served here in this body.

SAM HOBBS is retiring in spite of every effort on the part of his colleagues to persuade him to remain. He has long been one of the outstanding members of his committee and the House. We can ill afford to lose him at this critical time.

And our beloved MARY NORTON is retiring after one of the longest and most distinguished services in the history of the House. She has broken many records while here. The first woman to serve as chairman of a standing committee of either House and one of the most useful Members of the House and the Congress.

There are many others who could be named if time permitted who like these are retiring voluntarily although they could have remained here indefinitely. Our hearts go with them. In their retirement we are losing not only useful and experienced legislators and statesmen but warm and valued personal friends.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I am happy to yield to our distinguished Speaker.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, in the going of EARL MICHENER and JIM WADSWORTH, the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from New York, I feel a deep personal loss, because since they have been Members of this House they and I have been warm personal friends. I regret it not only on my own account but also because they are leaving the service of their country and I regret it deeply for our common country. I do not know of two men who have served more faithfully and with greater ability than these two.

The gentleman from Missouri remarked about the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] being a parliamentarian. I have seen him many times preside over the House and over the Committee of the Whole. He did it with great dignity, with great fairness, and with a regard for the rules of the House of Representatives. I think that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER], is one of the most perfect legislators I have ever had the privilege of serving with. He is gentle, he is fine, he is kind; and into his retirement he takes with him my every good wish.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] is the same type—maybe a little different, but I always knew that when the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] took the floor the Speaker would have no trouble keeping order because the gentleman from New York always brings a message from the heart and mind that appeals to every Member of this House and would appeal to every patriot throughout the length and breadth of this country if they knew him as we do.

I must say, of course, in the matter of the fine qualities he attained early in life that build the strong physical man and the strong character, that he got some of that out on the bounding prairies of west Texas where he was the manager of a great empire for, I think, 5 years. He carries back with him to his valley in northern New York my deep affection and kindest regards, and my hope that his useful life may be spared for many years to come.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have permission to revise and extend their remarks relative to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] at this point in the RECORD.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I want to express my agreement with everything that has been said today relative to the public service of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. I cannot add anything to the eloquent tributes which have just been paid them. I cannot forego however this opportunity to pay both of them a personal tribute and to express my appreciation of the splendid public service which they have rendered as Members of Congress.

EARL MICHENER was one of the first Members with whom I became acquainted when I came to Congress 24 years ago. I was impressed from the beginning with his knowledge of parliamentary procedure and his ability as a legislator. I made it a point as a new Member to question him on matters of legislation and procedure and found his suggestions, advice, and example most helpful. As the years went by my admiration for his ability and knowledge has increased. I can say without qualification that I have known of no better legislator during my time in Congress than EARL MICHENER. He not only has a thorough understanding of the mechanics of legislation but even more important he has the understanding of human nature and the ability to make wise compromises which are so important in the enactment of legislation.

His influence as a member of such important committees as Rules and Judiciary has been reflected in the provisions of many important laws now on the statute books.

EARL MICHENER has been a hard working Member of Congress but he was never too busy to make himself available for counsel and advice to Members of less experience. I shall always be appreciative of the sound advice and wise counsel which he has given me on many occasions and of the kindly spirit in which it was given. I have frequently referred new Members of Congress to EARL MICHENER as a man who had the correct answers to their questions.

The major part of EARL MICHENER'S life has been devoted to public service. This Congress and the Nation can ill afford to lose him but all of us who know him and have served with him know that he has earned the right to retire from the strenuous life of a Member of Congress. I hope that he may enjoy many happy years as a private citizen secure and serene in the knowledge that his public service constituted a great contribution to his country and that he left the Halls of Congress with the respect and best wishes of every Member with whom he had been associated.

JAMES W. WADSWORTH had a distinguished public career before he entered the House of Representatives. Had he never been a Member of this body his name would have gone down in history as a great legislator and political leader in his own State and as a most able and distinguished Member of the United States Senate.

After such a record there are some perhaps who would have hesitated about starting a new career in the House of Representatives. I am sure that in doing so JIM WADSWORTH had but a single idea in mind—that of serving his country.

During my time in Congress I have known no man who commanded closer attention when he took the floor or whose counsel was more highly regarded by his colleagues. Whenever he spoke he clarified the issues and contributed to the knowledge of the House on the subject under discussion. His course has been characterized by the highest ideals of public service and patriotism. His colleagues know him as a man of wisdom and one to whom the appellation of statesman in its true sense can be given with propriety.

JIM WADSWORTH will be greatly missed in this body. There are none who can take his place. His departure from Congress is a serious loss to the Nation. But I doubt if his leaving means the end of JIM WADSWORTH'S public service. His wisdom and experience are so preeminent and well known that whether he is in public or private life his advice and counsel on public matters will be sought from near and far.

Mr. FERNANDEZ. Mr. Speaker, everyone in this House joins with the Speaker in the sentiments expressed by him with respect to our esteemed colleagues, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER]. It is a great tribute to them that all of us, Republicans and Democrats alike, so wholeheartedly join in our expressions of admiration and tribute to both of them.

Working together for years in the public service we learn to love and appreciate men of that character. This is true also in my case with respect to my colleague the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. MILES], who likewise is leaving the Congress voluntarily and will not be with us after January 1. I, therefore, take this opportunity to say a few words about him as well.

I have known the gentleman from New Mexico, JOHN E. MILES, for many years. He has faithfully served my State in nearly every capacity of public trust. As a pioneer from the State of Tennessee, he settled in New Mexico close to 50 years ago and has been in the public life of the State since 1918, with a short digression into the newspaper field as an associate editor of two newspapers back in the twenties. As one of our most trusted party leaders, he helped to solidify and place the Democratic Party in a dominant position that lasted unbroken for two decades. As its chairman he gained the trust and confidence of the people throughout the State, and as the result he was elected as governor for two consecutive terms. It is characteristic of his down-to-earth humility that when he was first taking that office he declared he did not expect to be a great governor, but that he would try to be a good governor. That he was. The people appreciated his honesty, his sincerity, and his patience—qualities which have endeared him to his colleagues here in the House.

The people of the State rewarded him by sending him to Congress to which he could have been renominated without opposition and reelected without question had he chosen to stay. That he chose otherwise is a tribute to his devotion and loyalty to lifelong friends for whom he stepped aside from a virtually unopposed reelection to Congress, to accept a third nomination for Governor in an uncertain and bitterly contested election.

The members of the Public Lands Committee, where he chose to serve during his term of office, will remember him for his quiet, common-sense, and steadying influence. His pioneering experiences and instinct led him to take a special interest in the West and in our new frontiers. With a subcommittee of the House he made an arduous journey last year to visit the Pacific Islands, including Guam and Samoa, and took a special interest in their problems and aspirations.

During his term as Governor, and during his service in Congress, I have been closely associated with him and have learned to love and admire him as a man among men, free from all affectation or pretense, candid, sincere, and dependable as a rock. We will miss him in the House, where he leaves many friends. As for me, I hope I may have the opportunity of serving closely with him again either here or back in our beloved State.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, on January 3, 1951, when the curtain is drawn on the Eighty-first Congress, this Nation will lose a truly great public servant in our colleague, Representative EARL MICHENER. EARL MICHENER'S long record with his countless achievements as a legislator for his district, State, and Nation, will forever be the envy of those who serve in the House in the future.

EARL MICHENER has been a personal friend for only 2 years, but in that relatively short period of time I have learned to admire and respect him. His friendly and helpful advice were of great aid and assistance and I will miss his wise words of counsel in the crucial months ahead.

EARL MICHENER, a great American, has left an indelible mark on the pages of history. His colleagues on both sides of the aisle have spoken glowingly of his record which will shine even brighter in the future.

We all wish EARL our very best in health and happiness as he leaves the House, but we want him to know that his good influence will be long felt in the Chambers of this body.

Mr. AUCHINCLOSS. Mr. Speaker, there are many Members of the House of Representatives who, as real patriotic citizens, contribute much to the welfare of our country especially during these difficult times, but I seriously doubt that there are any in our membership who are held in higher esteem by their colleagues than the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH.]

They have served their country faithfully and well, and have always executed their responsibilities with zeal and fidelity. Honor is a word which is too frequently abused, but when one speaks of honor in connection with Mr. MICHENER and Mr. WADSWORTH, he speaks of that rare quality in the highest sense of the word. When I refer to these men as men of honor I mean that they both have that delicate sense of what is right and are uncompromising in their stand for truth.

The House of Representatives, and through it, the Nation can ill afford to lose the services of these outstanding members who are retiring voluntarily, but they have earned their rest and they leave us with the gratitude and affectionate regard of their colleagues who will ever remember them as friends never lacking in warm affection. I venture to suggest that they will not be able to dismiss public service lightly from their minds but will always be ready to come to the aid of their country. I wish them all the good things of life bound up in the happiness and contentment of many years of devoted service.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, as we approach the close of this Eighty-first Congress, I should like to say a few words about the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] who are concluding their long and distinguished careers in Congress. I do not believe two finer and abler men have served in the Congress of the United States. They rank among the great legislators of all time.

I selfishly wish they had not decided to retire to private life. We will miss them in many, many ways. I do not know where we could possibly find a substitute for the parliamentary skill of the gentleman from Michigan and the persuasive oratory of the gentleman from New York. I can recall the many occasions when I first came to Congress that I solicited the advice of the gentleman from Michigan on some parliamentary rule. He was always patient and understanding with me, and always helpful. I can also recall the many times the gentleman from New York has taken the floor on some major issue to command the complete attention of the House. He always knew his subject. He spoke only when he really had something to say, and he always spoke with clarity and conviction.

Both EARL MICHENER and JIM WADSWORTH are personal friends of mine. Their retirement is a personal loss. I have made several trips with JIM to our international livestock expositions, of which he is a director. He probably knows more about cattle raising than any man in this country. I certainly learned a great deal from JIM.

The more I associated with JIM the greater my affection and respect for him. He always impressed me as the quality of man I should like to see in the White House. He never stooped to conquer. He has always been a man of principle who would never sacrifice principle for expediency. He has always been a man of convictions with the courage of his convictions. There are few like him. There are few with his intellectual, physical, and spiritual stature.

To my good friends, EARL MICHENER and JIM WADSWORTH, I extend my sincerest best wishes. You take with you my highest regards and deepest affection. It is a privilege to call you my friends. You have served your country well. In wishing for you every joy and contentment in the years ahead I know I am expressing the wishes of every Member of this House.

HON. HERBERT HOOVER AND GOV. THOMAS E. DEWEY

Mr. AUCHINCLOSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remorks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. AUCHINCLOSS. Mr. Speaker, I think that Americans everywhere are very much heartened by two recent addresses given by prominent Republicans. I refer to the speech made before the New York County Lawyers Association by Gov. Thomas E. Dewey, and the more recent speech given by the only living ex-President of the United States, Honorable Herbert Hoover.

The one outstanding feature of both of these remarkable addresses was that they were definite, and set forth concrete proposals for the planning of the future. It is immaterial whether we agree with the details suggested by either of these great citizens but their definite proposals indicate far-sighted thinking and the kind of leadership which the country is sorely in need of.

I feel sure that the views of these men will be present in our thoughts in the days ahead because the truth of what they said is inescapable; it is logical; and, it appeals to the liberty-loving people of this great Nation.

I am moved to quote from another great American who was also a Republican, and whose loyalty and fearless courage will always be an inspiration to citizens of the United States. Theodore Roosevelt, in a speech which he made in Chicago in 1899 on the subject, The Strenuous Life, said:

> Our country calls not for the life of ease, but for the life of strenuous endeavor. The twentieth century looms before us big with the fate of many nations. If we stand idly by, if we seek merely swollen, slothful ease, and ignoble peace, if we shrink from the hard contests where men must win at hazard of their lives and at the risk of all they hold dear, then the bolder and stronger peoples will pass us by and will win for themselves the domination of the world. Let us therefore boldly face the life of strife, resolute to do our duty well and manfully; resolute to uphold righteousness by deed and by word; resolute to be both honest and brave, to serve high ideals, yet to use practical methods. Above all, let us shrink from no strife, moral or physical, within or without the Nation, provided we are certain that the strife is justified; for it is only through strife, through hard and dangerous endeavor, that we shall ultimately win the goal of true national greatness.

Theodore Roosevelt might well have said the same things today as we face, at this turn of the half-century, the tremendous responsibilities and problems involving the destiny of mankind. The high moral tone, the straight-forward inspiration, and the will to risk all for the right, can be found in the words of all three of these men. They are the words and the thoughts of true Americans everywhere and it is inspiring for us to know that this spirit of righteousness and strength and clear thinking is still to be found among our great men.

COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks and include tabulations.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a House Resolution No. 889 which has been referred to the Committee on Rules.

It would authorize and direct the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, or any directly authorized subcommittee thereof, to make a full, complete, and continuing study and investigation of the administration, execution, and enforcement by Government departments and agencies of the export policies and control regulations of the United States.

It provides for a continuing oversight into the effectiveness of measures and efforts instituted for the Federal agencies to prevent the shipment or transshipment of exported materials to countries unfriendly to the United States or to the lack of such measures or efforts.

The resolution also directs the committee to ascertain to what extent, if any, American carriers have been and are authorized in such transportation.

Finally, the committee would be directed to ascertain the names of all those engaged in making such shipments or transshipments.

I have now received a report, which I understand contains all of the criminal cases arising out of violations of these laws and regulations. I have had a partial analysis made in order to outline the facts as to the effectiveness, or lack of effectiveness, in the prosecution and disposition of these cases. I am not prepared to draw any firm conclusions as yet from this analysis, but I think it is necessary to state now that the resolution as drafted should undoubtedly contain a specific direction that the committee should inquire into the effectiveness of any criminal prosecution and into the question of whether existing penalties should be increased. It seems clear to me that procedures in effect prior to June 27, 1950, will be completely inadequate now.

Mr. Speaker, I am including the detailed report with reference to these criminal cases. It is obvious that in some instances, there are very substantial delays between the date when the case was referred and the dates of indictment and sentence. There also seem to be quite a variation in the disposition of the cases. Of course, after a fuller investigation of the entire facts, it would be impossible to make any sound determinations in this field but I am sure the outline indicates the wisdom of action by a congressional committee.

First, I include the covering letter from Nathan Ostroff, general counsel, Office of International Trade:

> DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
> OFFICE OF INTERNATIONAL TRADE,
> Washington, D. C., December 15, 1950.
> Hon. JOHN W. HESELTON,
> House of Representatives,
> Washington, D. C.
> DEAR MR. HESELTON: Pursuant to our telephone conversation today I am enclosing a list of the export control violations that have been disposed of by administrative action, together with a list of the more serious cases which have been disposed of by way of criminal prosecution.
>
> Since mid-1948, we have instituted 76 administrative proceedings against over 200 United States and foreign individuals and firms for various violations of export controls, including about 20 instances of transshipment or diversion of strategic goods. License revocation and denial orders have now been issued in most of these cases; some are still pending awaiting hearing or decision. These orders have barred United States exporters from shipping, foreign buyers from receiving, and United States and foreign freight forwarders from handling United States goods for various periods of time extending up to the entire future in which United States export controls may remain in effect.
>
> Thirty-seven highly serious cases of violations of export controls have been sent to the Department of Justice. Of these, 23 cases have reached the stages of indictment or conviction; while 14 cases are being reviewed by the United States attorneys for criminal action. Sentences have been handed down including prison terms ranging from 3 months to 10 years, and including fines ranging from $300 to $10,000. The Customs Bureau, which aids in the enforcement of export controls, has also brought over 400 seizure cases since the summer of 1948, involving approximately $1,000,000 of United States goods attempted to be exported in violation of export controls.
>
> You may feel free to use any of this information as you may desire.
>
> Sincerely yours,
>
> NATHAN OSTROFF,
> General Counsel.

Finally, I wish to include three recent press dispatches from Hong Kong with reference to the action taken to prevent strategic materials reaching Communist China and Russia and its satellites.

I do not know whether any billion-dollar lobby has made any effort to make itself heard at Washington quickly, but I suggest that if there is any such effort made, it points up the wisdom of having this suggested investigation by our House committee.

I want to call particular attention to the third of these dispatches with reference to the value of the shipments of strategic materials and to the accounts of materials which have been shipped.

I requested today as full a report as possible in connection with the advice that the Danish ship Henrich Jessen was scheduled to sail today for Communist China with aluminum ingots and scrap rubber, among other items.

UNITED STATES EXPORT BAN DEALS BIG BLOW TO HONG KONG—SOME BUSINESSMEN THERE FEAR GHOST CITY WILL ARISE; DOLLAR DECLINES

HONG KONG, December 10.—This British crown colony has virtually stopped functioning economically as the result of the American ban on critical exports which might find their way into the hands of Communists. Some observers held the view today that Great Britain's last foothold in China may become a "ghost city" of the Far East.

Two factors, they said, should determine whether Hong Kong will change, perhaps overnight, from one of the British Empire's biggest dollar earners to one of its biggest white elephants:

1. How far the American Government will go in enforcing its embargo, announced Friday, on "strategic" exports to Hong Kong;

2. How closely the line will be drawn between strategic and nonstrategic goods.

When news of the ban hit Hong Kong Saturday, the American dollar dropped in the exchange market from 6.45 Hong Kong dollars to 6.17, the lowest rate in nearly 9 months. Businessmen predict that in the next few days it may drop to the official rate, 5.79.

BANKS HARD HIT

American banks and Chinese banks with branches in the United States are refusing to issue letters of credit for would-be exporters.

It is perhaps ironic that American bankers should be so seriously hit by their own Government's action to stop movement of strategic goods into Communist China. This, in broad terms, is how the ban works:

A Chinese merchant in Hong Kong wants to buy $3,000 worth of goods in the United States for resale to Red China. He purchases a letter of credit from an American bank in Hong Kong, paying, say, $1,000 (U. S.) in cash and promising to pay the other $2,000 when the goods are delivered and resold.

MERCHANTS LOSE

Then the United States imposes a ban on exports to Hong Kong, and the already purchased and paid-for merchandise cannot be delivered. The bank in Hong Kong has lost its $2,000. The Hong Kong merchant has lost his $1,000 in cash.

Fifteen percent of Hong Kong's imports are purchased in the United States. With this in mind, it should be easy to see how Hong Kong's future could be affected by rigid enforcement of the American export restrictions.

However, some American banking sources here predict that the United States will be forced to relax the order. They say the "billion-dollar lobby" of American banking, shipping, and insurance interests is bound to make itself heard at Washington quickly.

HONG KONG URGES PROTEST OF UNITED STATES BLOCKADE OF COLONY

HONG KONG.—The Hong Kong Government has called on British Colonial Secretary James Griffiths to make the strongest representations to Washington on the "American blockade" of this colony.

A government spokesman said that the blockade was likely to have serious repercussions in the colony and would halt its trade and industry.

The American ban announced this month bars United States ships and planes from carrying "strategic materials" destined for Communist China and Russia and its European satellites. The ban included Hong Kong and the neighboring Portuguese colony of Macao, to make sure that goods would not be forwarded from these ports to China.

The Hong Kong spokesman pointed out that this colony "has already banned the export to China of a whole variety of strategic materials, of which the most important are oil and petroleum products."

Official and private sources here estimate that the colony will lose millions of pounds sterling if the United States does not relax its ban on imports to the colony.

They also are concerned over the possibility of widespread unemployment and labor trouble.

The ban, in its present form, will affect most of the 87,000 Chinese workers in Hong Kong's registered industries, as well as tens of thousands in small firms, according to industrial sources.

They say it already has jeopardized the future of 13 cotton mills and many enamelware, flashlight, match, and other industries using American raw materials.

The ban is also reported to be affecting Hong Kong's huge warehouse trade, by which it breaks down and distributes shipments of many goods to other countries.

STRATEGIC GOODS ARE HIGH ON HONG KONG EXPORT LIST

HONG KONG, December 21.—Shipments of strategic materials from Hong Kong to Communist China made up nearly one-half of Hong Kong exports during November, official figures showed today.

The Chinese Reds bought rubber, pharmaceutical products, dyestuffs, tanning materials, iron, and steel in large quantities.

Total exports for November were 442,000,000 Hong Kong dollars ($77,350,000), of which 214,000,000 ($37,350,000) went to China and Portuguese Macao, off the coast.

Raw rubber was the largest single export item to China and Macao.

The trade figures also indicated that Nationalist China—now Formosa Island—and Communist China still were exchanging products, with Formosan sugar being traded for north Chinese soybeans.

The Danish ship Henrich Jessen is lying here with more than 27,000 aluminum ingots destined for Communist China, scheduled to sail Friday.

Aluminum is on the United States export blacklist, but not on that of Hong Kong. The cargo also includes dyestuffs, scrap rubber, and gunny sacks.

MRS. ROBERT P. HORRELL

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 1139) for the relief of Mrs. Robert P. Horrell.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish the gentleman would explain this bill to the membership of the House.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, this is a private bill for the relief of Mrs. Robert P. Horrell, widow of Robert P. Horrell, in the amount of $4,344.13. It involves an insurance claim. The deceased served in the Armed Forces, and through a certain amount of confusion was not permitted to take out the insurance to which he would otherwise have been entitled in the amount of $10,000. The Committee on Claims and the Committee on the Judiciary felt that it was improper to allow him the $10,000, but this lesser figure is based upon the present amortized value of $25 a month for 240 months. This bill has passed the Senate and comes to us from that body.

The gentleman from Florida [Mr. BENNETT] is interested in the bill, and I am only acting by direction of the Committee on the Judiciary, and would therefore be happy to yield to the gentleman from Florida for any further explanation regarding the bill.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. BENNETT of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I am acting on behalf of my colleague, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HERLONG], whose constituent is involved in this legislation. As I understand the situation the serviceman involved requested permission to get the insurance in a formal manner, and the only reason he did not fill out the insurance papers was because they did not have the form to let him do it in the way they thought it ought to be done. In the meantime the young man lost his life. It was felt by the committee, as I understand, that the man should have some compensation for it. They reduced the claim, but they have allowed the approximate amount which was requested. In my opinion it is a fair bill, and I do not think it is a type of legislation that could be expanded very greatly where a great many other people could come in; in other words, I do not think it opens the door very wide, because in this particular instance the evidence is clear and conclusive that he requested permission to take out the insurance, and the only reason he did not actually fill in the form was because they did not have the proper type of form for him to fill out.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Florida, and I am in hearty sympathy with the principle of the bill, would it apply to a Navy man who intended to fill out his insurance papers and then was killed in an accident at sea? What I mean by that is, this particular case looks to me as though it was somewhat analogous to the case of a widow who was attempting to recover insurance in maintaining that she was named as the beneficiary of her husband, and yet he never signed the papers. I wonder whether this would be analogous to the gentleman's case.

Mr. KEATING. If I may be permitted, I suggest to the gentleman from New York that he introduce a private bill if he feels it is meritorious, and it will be considered in due course.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I am for the gentleman's bill in principle, because I have had the same situation arise. But if that would set a precedent for the type of bill I have in mind, I would certainly be in favor of it. I think it is very fair.

Mr. KEATING. Has the gentleman introduced a bill on this matter?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I introduced one a year ago. They have just been fussing along with it, to be honest with the gentleman about it.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman's particular bill has not come to the attention of the gentleman now speaking to the House. If the gentleman will reintroduce his bill in the next Congress, I feel he will be granted a hearing before the Committee on Claims if he requests it. There may be and may not be any difference between that and the bill we have before us.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I cannot object to the bill. I am glad to see the gentleman bring it up, but I think if this sets a precedent there are others that should be allowed to come under that category. I know I have one such case, and I imagine other Members have.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. SMATHERS. The only difference is that in this particular case the young man actually evidenced his intention by going originally to the officer and attempting to get insurance. He was turned down. There is a record of that having happened.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. May I say to the gentleman that mine is exactly the same sort of case. Mine is the case of a widow whose husband had declared his intention, but he was killed the very next day and did not have the opportunity to sign his insurance. Therefore, if we are going to start passing bills like this, I can bring in at least one, and I hope others will, too. I hope this bill passes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Mrs. Robert P. Horrell, of Orlando, Fla., the sum of $4,344.13 as a gratuity for the death of her husband, Lt. Robert P. Howell, United States Naval Reserve, who died on December 25, 1942, as the result of an illness contracted in active naval service: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof hall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I should like to inquire if there will be an opportunity to offer an amendment which would make the application of the exception to the Recreation Board of the District of Columbia similar to that of the Board of Education.

Mr. McCARTHY. I certainly have no objection to that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That unless otherwise specifically authorized by law, any person receiving compensation from any office or position, appointive or elective, under the United States or any department or agency thereof, including Government-owned or controlled corporations, or under the government of the District of Columbia, shall not be eligible to receive compensation from any other such office or position except to such extent as will not cause the combined amounts actually received for any period of time to exceed the rate of $5,000 per annum: Provided, That when the compensation of either office or position amounts to or exceeds the rate of $5,000 per annum such person shall be eligible to receive the compensation of either office or position, as he may elect.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HARRIS: At the end of section 3 insert the following: "(E) The compensation of any employee of the United States or any department or agency thereof, including Government owned or controlled corporations, or of the government of the District of Columbia for services rendered in connection with activities of the District Recreation Board under the provisions of the act of April 29, 1942, 56 Statutes 261, District of Columbia Code, 1940 edition, Supplement 7, title 8, chapter 2."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. Speaker, the enactment of this legislation, S. 2351, has been urgently requested by the executive branch because it is a measure related to the present national emergency.

For several years the executive branch and the House and Senate Committees on Post Office and Civil Service have given careful study to the revision of the laws relating to the receipt of compensation from dual employments under the Federal Government. The purpose of the legislation is to simplify and consolidate existing laws relating to this subject. Under the several statutes which presently apply, the annual salary limitation from dual Federal employments varies between $2,000 and $3,000 per annum. These laws were enacted on a piecemeal basis and their conflicting provisions have caused great confusion in connection with their administration. In addition, the present dual employment statutes prevent, in some cases, retired officers from the Armed Forces from taking civilian positions related to the national defense where either the retired pay or the salary of the civilian position amounts to or exceeds $2,500 per annum.

The legislation, which was approved unanimously by the committee, provides that any person receiving compensation from any Federal office or position may be employed in a dual capacity, provided the combined amounts of annual compensation received for any period of time does not exceed the rate of $5,000 annually. Further, the bill provides in section 1 that when the compensation of either office or position amounts to or exceeds $5,000 per annum, such person may be eligible to receive the compensation of either office or position as he may elect. This change of existing law regarding the holding of dual offices will permit the Federal Government to utilize the service of many retired officers from the Armed Forces who are particularly qualified to render invaluable assistance in strategic and highly confidential activities in the National Defense Establishment and the Central Intelligence Agency.

The committee believed that the dual-compensation limitation of $5,000 annually is more realistic at the present time because since the enactment of the dual-compensation statutes, between 1894 and 1932, salaries and living costs have been raised considerably. Consequently, the committee feels that raising the limitations of $2,000, $2,500, and $3,000 to $5,000 is not unjustified in the light of present-day conditions.

Based upon full and complete hearings conducted by the committee, it was believed that the pay or compensation for certain offices and positions should be excluded from the limitations imposed by the general policy of the legislation. These exclusions which are contained in present law are as follows:

First. Retired pay of enlisted men, warrant officers, and flight officers in any branch of the armed services.

Second. Retired pay of Regular, Reserve, or temporary commissioned officers retired for disability incurred in combat with an enemy of the United States or for disability resulting from an explosion of an instrumentality of war in line of duty during an enlistment.

Third. Retired pay of any commissioned officer, warrant officer, flight officer, or enlisted person retired under title III of the act of June 29, 1948.

Fourth. Compensation of teachers, school officers, and custodial employees of the Board of Education of the District of Columbia for services rendered in connection with the operation of night or vacation schools in the public schools of the District of Columbia.

Fifth. Compensation of employees in the field service of the Post Office Department who serve in a dual capacity or who are temporarily assigned other duties in the postal service when such work is performed at the direction of the Postmaster General.

Sixth. The compensation of custodial employees of the Board of Education of the District of Columbia when such employees are performing work in school buildings when such buildings are used by any Federal department or agency or by any Department of the District of Columbia Government — except the Board of Education—for nonrecreational official purposes.

Seventh. Compensation received by joint officers and employees who are employed in corporations under the supervision of the Farm Credit Administration.

Also, the legislation retains existing law with respect to the exemption from the criminal statutes of employees of the Library of Congress when such employees perform special functions for the performance of which funds have been entrusted to the Library of Congress Trust Fund Board or the Librarian, or in connection with cooperative undertakings in which the Library of Congress is engaged.

The amendments which were made to S. 2351 by the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee, with a few exceptions, are largely technical, perfecting, and clarifying in nature. The only amendments made by our committee which relate to the general policy of the legislation concern maintaining status quo or retaining existing law with respect to: First, the postal service; second, the corporations under the supervision of the Farm Credit Administration; third, teachers in the District of Columbia school system; fourth, custodial employees under the Board of Education of the District of Columbia; and fifth, employees of the Library of Congress. In each case it was necessary to amend S. 2351 in order to maintain existing administrative policy with respect to the use of employees in dual capacities or on temporary assignments in these agencies who were necessarily required to be exempt from the general provisions of the bill.

The distinguished chairman of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee, who has devoted a great deal of time to this subject, has conferred with the chairman of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee of the other body, and I am advised that the other body will accept the amendments which have been approved by our committee. Consequently, the necessity for a conference regarding this bill will be obviated, and full operation under its provisions within the immediate future is assured.

As chairman of the subcommittee of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee which considered this measure, I can assure the Members that much time and diligent study has been made of this subject, and it is a vast improvement over existing law. In the judgment of the committee, economy in government operations will result because the present laws relating to dual compensation are so complicated and confused that the departments and agencies spend much useless time in solving problems and difficulties which arise in connection with their administration. The lack of uniformity among dual compensation statutes requires the executive departments and agencies to encounter needless difficulties in making certain that the several varied dual compensation limitations and restrictions are being observed.

It appears that the laws are in such a state that the average department or agency administrator feels required to consult with the Comptroller General and his own legal department before he is certain as to how a decision should be made in any given case.

The committee believes this legislation is most desirable, and in view of the national emergency which confronts our country at this time we believe it is important that this measure be approved without delay.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. SASSCER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

Mr. SASSCER. Mr. Speaker, the House has just passed defense authorizations for tremendous appropriations for our national defense. Since World War II I have voted for similar authorizations and appropriations in the hope that they were not war measures but war preventives; and in an effort to avert war we have passed the Marshall plan, North Atlantic Pact, mutual-aid-assistance program, and many other measures which I have consistently supported.

In view of the events since the last war, many of them beyond our control, it is becoming more graphically apparent that this country cannot approach the problems of world peace, liberty, and the preservation of democratic forms of government among our allies, in the vein of what would be the most perfect or what we would like to see. As laudable as these objectives might be we must approach these problems from the angle of what we can accomplish within the limits of our own abilities and the abilities of our allies.

I therefore suggest that we immediately appraise our own present and potential military, industrial, and economic capacities, the strength and willingness of our allies to rearm and assist in this fight for survival, and then after we have determined from that appraisal what frontiers we and our allies can defend—whether that be Korea, Japan, Hawaii, the Pacific coast, Western Europe, or the Atlantic coast—defend that perimeter firmly and resolutely to the fullest extent of our joint military might and industrial capacity.

This is a conflict of survival and not of saving face. History has proven that it is better to lose a battle and win a war than to lose a war attempting to win a battle.

The line must be established past which the diabolical march of communistic progression shall stop. We must place that line not where we would like to have it but where we can hold it not with just words but with might.

I believe that if we establish a defense policy within the limits of our ability to carry out, and let our allies know that we are determined that they too must help to their full capacity, both in armament and in manpower, we can then have force enough to back up the policy that we have established to stop Russia, prevent aggression beyond that line, and work out the survival of our own country. Russia would be far less disposed to attack a line she felt we could defend, whereas, on the other hand, if more or less single-handledly we issue proclamations and statements that we are going to defend the far-flung corners of the earth—which anyone, whether military strategist or not, knows that we cannot defend, we will weaken this country through successive setbacks down to a point where it might be difficult to defend our own Nation.

We maintained military police guards in the countries where we are given trusteeships. These troops were placed there not as military defenders but as guardians. Since the outbreak in Korea we know that in the face of aggression such a force is futile. We will never be the ones to make the attack and Russia knows that, and she, as the aggressor, calls the shots in any spot in the world which we would be required to defend with the guard force authorized under the United Nations.

No one can question the bravery of our troops, the skill of our workmen, or the patriotism of our people, but Korea has taught us that Russia's aims are to attempt to frustrate our efforts for world peace and eventually undermine our own national security.

The hour is more grave than at any time in our history but our difficulties are not insurmountable if we make an all-out effort encompassing that effort within the limits of our ability. The liberties and freedom of this great Nation must be preserved by positive and strong action—not weakened by far-fldng commitments that we and our allies in their present effort and capacity cannot or will not carry out; not weakened by continuing aid to any nation that does not continue to help itself or supply troops for what must be a collective effort.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan asked and was given permission to address the House today for 5 minutes, following the legislative business of the day and any other special orders heretofore entered.

CHRISTMAS

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I have asked this time for the purpose of reading into the RECORD a brief letter just received from my good friend, President John W. Davis, of West Virginia State College, on the present-day application of the meaning of Christmas.

The letter follows:

WEST VIRGINIA STATE COLLEGE,
Office of the President,
Institute, W. Va., December 25, 1950.

Hon. CLEVELAND M. BAILEY,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BAILEY: The Christmas season is upon us.

The pronouncement, "Behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people," is the essense of our faith and hope. It is applicable to the present threat to the survival of free nations. It is the overtone to life's grim reality. It is the new birth of confidence in life and in the God of life. It is Christmas functionally alive.

This Christmas is one of dedication to the affirmation of man's high destiny—to the cause of human freedom, to the ethical imperatives of world peace, to the supremacy of love in the world dilemma now facing mankind, to a right standard of living for all peoples. Christmas warns men of good will never to accept tyranny as natural, defeat as inevitable, and society as irredeemable. Christmas bespeaks the deep longings in the hearts of men.

This is my Christmas offering to you. It is to be added to the flow of love and joy which I hope will be yours in this holy season.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN W. DAVIS,
President.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] is recognized for 5 minutes.

A FREE PRESS—FREE SPEECH

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, a great principle is threatened, a real peril is imminent, writes Doris Fleeson in last night's Evening Star.

Apparently unconvinced that the American people are fully occupied by their efforts to follow sound principles which will enable them to minimize or avoid the perils of world war III, she argues that the demand of a Member of the other body, if such a demand was made, that the public boycott the products of Mr. Pearson's radio sponsor and thus cause Mr. Pearson to lose his job, endangers a free press, the free speech.

Miss Fleeson apparently attempts to arouse her fellow writers with the argument that their jobs, their opportunity for work, might be curtailed if some Member of Congress criticizes their production, protests to a sponsor.

Would she have everyone who disagrees with what a reporter, an editor, a columnist or a radio commentator may write or say remain silent, deprive them of their right of free speech, of a free press, just so professional writers and speakers may have their utterances unquestioned? Her argument, if adopted, would have that result.

True, the Member of the other body has no right to demand of Pearson's sponsor that Pearson be fired. That is the sponsor's business. On the other hand, has he not the right to purchase the kind of a hat he wants from the store he desires to patronize? Does he not have the right to call the attention of the manufacturer to the kind of advertising that he is doing? Has he not the right to call upon his friends, those who believe as he does, to refuse to increase the business revenue of a concern which hires a man to vilify individuals the writer or commentator does not like?

Must a man confine his criticism to the product, in this case the hat—keep quiet as to the package in which it is delivered or the line of thought which goes with it?

Doris Fleeson in this article is following the same line followed by so many who attempt to influence public opinion. Apparently she is all for free speech—a free press—for one school of thought, but resents any disagreement. That is her right.

Pearson, each week, announces that Adam is the first name in hats. Adam may make, for all I know, the best hat ever produced and sell it at a price less than that fixed by any other manufacturer.

But, as Pearson speaks over the radio, announcing time after time that Adam is the first name in hats, memory takes me back to my boyhood reading. I recall another Adam—the Adam who was the first man on earth, so Holy Writ tells us. That Adam was not only the first man—he was the only man in the Garden of Eden. Unfortunately, at least we are so told, he listened to the advice of a snake and shortly found himself on the outside of what has been pictured to us as a paradise.

It may be true that the story carried in today's Star to the effect that Adam has decided not to renew Drew Pearson's contract when it expired, is due, in part to the action of the Member of the other body, who called attention to some of the characteristics of the man who was advertising their wares over the radio. It may also be that Adam does not appreciate Mr. Pearson. But is the principle of free speech involved in this little incident? Is the Member of the other body doing other than handing back to Drew Pearson some of the left-handed compliments that Pearson has been paying him?

Nor can I see how the discussion, or perhaps more accurately, the exchange of compliments between these two gentlemen to whom she makes reference is a real peril to any great principle.

Perhaps she overrates the importance of the controversy—that few people are very greatly interested in it; that most of us are concerned with what is happening abroad, with what our foreign policy is to be.

But enough on that subject. Permit me to proceed on another topic.

AN AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. Speaker, using the methods of a sound builder who starts at the foundation, places block on block until the building is finished, Wednesday night, December 20, former President Herbert Hoover, placing fact upon fact, blueprinted a plan for an American foreign policy. That outline if followed through the years will not only promote the welfare of our country, but make secure through the centuries the existence of our Republic.

True, because the proposed policy parallels the principles carried in the advice of our first President, he may be, he already has been—as he was last night by Lief Eid—characterized through inuendo as a reactionary, an isolationist.

Fortunately, the American people, especially those who have not been, shall I say, completely educated at some of the so-called higher institutions of learning, are capable of weighing the facts which now confront them, of forming a sound judgment based on those facts.

That you may have the conclusions reached by Mr. Hoover and the facts upon which they were based, I will read what he said and then add an editorial from this morning's Times-Herald.

I read:

Mr. HOOVER. I have received hundreds of requests that I appraise the present situation and give my conclusions as to our national policies.

I speak with a deep sense of responsibility. And I speak tonight under the anxieties of every American for the Nation's sons who are fighting and dying on a mission of peace and the honor of our country.

No appraisal of the world situation can be final in an unstable world. However, to find our national path we must constantly reexamine where we have arrived and at times revise our direction.

I do not propose to traverse the disastrous road by which we reached this point.

THE GLOBAL MILITARY SITUATION

We may first survey the global military situation. There is today only one center of aggression on earth. That is the Communist-controlled Asian-European land mass of 800,000,000 people. They have probably over 300 trained and equipped combat divisions with over 30,000 tanks, 10,000 tactical planes and further large reserves they can put in action in 90 days. But they are not a great sea power. Their long-range air power is limited. These congeries of over 30 different races will some day go to pieces. But in the meantime they are cannon fodder.

Facing this menace on the eastern front there are about 100,000,000 non-Communist island peoples in Japan, Formosa, the Philippines, and Korea. Aside from Korea, which I will discuss later, they have probably 12 effective combat divisions with practically no tanks, air, or navy.

Facing this land mass on the south are the Indies and the Middle East of about 600,000,000 non-Communist peoples. There are about 150,000,000 non-Communist peoples in north Africa and Latin America. Except Turkey and Formosa, these 850,000,000 people have little military force which they would or could spare. But they could contribute vital economic and moral strength.

Facing this menace on the continental European front there are about 160,000,000 non-Communist people who, excluding Spain, have less than 20 combat divisions now available, few tanks, and little air or naval force. But their will to defend themselves is feeble and their disunities are manifest.

Of importance in military weight at this moment there is the British commonwealth of 150,000,000 people, with probably 30 combat divisions under arms, a superior navy, considerable air force, and a few tanks.

And there are 150,000,000 people in the United States preparing 3,500,000 men into a gigantic Air Force and Navy, with about 30 equipped combat divisions.

SOME MILITARY CONCLUSIONS

If we weigh these military forces as they stand today we must arrive at certain basic conclusions.

(a) We must face the fact that to commit the sparse ground forces of the non-Communist nations into a land war against this Communist land mass would be a war without victory, a war without a successful political terminal. Any attempt to make war on the Communist mass by land invasion, through the quicksands of China, India, or Western Europe is sheer folly. That would be the graveyard of millions of American boys and would end in the exhaustion of this Gibraltar of western civilization.

Even were Western Europe armed far beyond any contemplated program, we could never reach Moscow. The Germans failed with a magnificent army of 240 combat divisions and with powerful air and tank forces.

(b) Equally, we Americans alone with sea and air power can so control the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans that there can be no possible invasion of the Western Hemisphere by Communist armies. They can no more reach Washington in force than we can reach Moscow.

(c) In this military connection we must realize the fact that the atomic bomb is a far less dominant weapon than it was once thought to be.

(d) It is obvious that the United Nations have been defeated in Korea by the aggression of Communist China. There are no adequate forces in the world to repel them.

Even if we sacrifice more American boys to hold a bridgehead, we know we shall not succeed at the present time in the mission given to us by the 50 members of the United Nations.

OUR ECONOMIC STRENGTH

We may explore the American situation still further. The 150,000,000 American people are already economically strained by Government expenditures. It must not be forgotten that we are carrying huge burdens from previous wars, including obligations to veterans and $260,000,000,000 of bond and currency issues from those wars. In the fiscal year 1952, Federal and local expenditures are likely to exceed $90,000,000,000. That is more than our total savings. We must finance huge deficits by further Government issues. Inflation is already moving but we might with stern measures avoid the economic disintegration of such a load for a very few years. If we continued long on this road the one center of resistance in the world will collapse in economic disaster.

THE DIPLOMATIC FRONT

We may appraise the diplomatic front. Our great hope was in the United Nations. We have witnessed the sabotage of its primary purpose of preserving peace. It has been down to last week, a forum for continuous smear on our honor, our ideals and our purposes.

It did stiffen up against raw aggression last July in Korea. But in its call for that military action, America had to furnish over 90 percent of the foreign forces and suffer over 90 percent of their dead and injured. The effort now comes at least to a measurable military defeat by the aggression of Communist heroes.

Whether or not the United Nations is to have a moral defeat and suffer the collapse of its whole moral stature now depends on whether it has the courage to:

(a) Declare Communist China an aggressor.

(b) Refuse admission of this aggressor to its membership.

(c) Demand that each member of the United Nations cease to furnish or transport supplies of any kind to Communist China that can aid in their military operations. Such a course honestly carried out by the non-Communist nations is not economic sanctions nor does it require military actions. But it would constitute a great pressure for rectitude.

(d) For once, pass a resolution condemning the infamous lies about the United States.

Any course short of this is appeasement.

What should our policies be?

And now I come to where we should go from here.

Two months ago I suggested a tentative alternate policy for the United States. It received a favorable reception from the large majority of our press.

Since then the crisis in the world has become even more acute. It is clear that the United Nations are defeated in Korea. It is also clear that other non-Communist nations did not or could not substantially respond to the United Nations call for arms to Korea. It is clear the United Nations cannot mobilize substantial military forces. It is clear continental Europe has not in the 3 years of our aid developed that unity of purpose, and that will power necessary for its own defense. It is clear that our British friends are flirting with appeasement of Communist China. It is clear that the United Nations is in a fog of debate and indecision on whether to appease or not to appease.

In expansion of my proposals of 2 months ago, I now propose certain principles and action.

First. The foundation of our national policies must be to preserve for the world this Western Hemisphere Gibraltar of western civilization.

Second. We can, without any measure of doubt, with our own air and naval forces, hold the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans with one frontier on Britain (if she wishes to cooperate); the other, on Japan, Formosa and the Philippines. We can hold open the sea lanes for our supplies.

I devoutly hope that a maximum of cooperation can be established between the British commonwealth and ourselves.

Third. To do this we should arm our air and naval forces to the teeth. We have little need for large armies unless we are going to Europe or China. We should give Japan her independence and aid her in arms to defend herself. We should stiffen the defenses of our Pacific frontier in Formosa and the Philippines. We can protect this island chain by our sea and air power.

Fourth. We could, after initial outlays for more air and Navy equipment, greatly reduce our expenditures, balance our budget and free ourselves from the dangers of inflation and economic degeneration.

Fifth. If we toil and sacrifice as the President has asked, we can continue aid to the hungry of the world. Out of our productivity we can give aid to other nations when they have already displayed spirit and strength in defense against communism. We have the stern duty to work and sacrifice to do it.

Sixth. We should have none of appeasement. Morally there is no appeasement of communism. Appeasement contains more dangers than Dunkerques. We want no more Tehrans and Yaltas. We can retrieve a battle but we cannot retrieve an appeasement. We are grateful that President Truman has denounced such a course.

Seventh. We are not blind to the need to preserve western civilization on the continent of Europe or to our cultural and religious ties to it. But the prime obligation of defense of western continental Europe rests upon the nations of Europe. The test is whether they have the spiritual force, the will and acceptance of unity among them by their own volition. America cannot create their spiritual forces; we cannot buy them with money.

You can search all the history of mankind and there is no parallel to the effort and sacrifice we have made to elevate their spirit and to achieve their unity. To this date it has failed. Their minds are confused with fears and disunities. They exclude Spain, although she has the will and means to fight. They haggle with Germany, although she is their frontier. They vacillate in the belief that they are in little danger and the hope to avoid again being a theater of war. And Karl Marx has added to their confusions. They still suffer from battle shock. Their highly organized Communist parties are a menace we must not ignore.

In both World War I and World War II (including West Germany) they placed more than 250 trained and equipped combat divisions in the field within 60 days with strong air and naval forces. They have more manpower and more productive capacity today than in either one of those wars. To warrant our further aid they should show they have spiritual strength and unity to avail themselves of their own resources. But it must be far more than pacts, conferences, paper promises, and declarations. Today it must express itself in organized and equipped combat divisions of such large numbers as would erect a sure dam against the Red flood. And that before we land another man or another dollar on their shores. Otherwise we shall be inviting another Korea. That would be a calamity to Europe as well as to us.

Our policy in this quarter of the world should be confined to a period of watchful waiting.

NATIONAL UNITY

There is a proper urge in all Americans for unity in troubled times. But unless unity is based on right principles and right action it is a vain and dangerous thing.

Honest difference of views and honest debate are not disunity. They are the vital process of policy making among freemen.

A right, a specific, an open foreign policy must be formulated which gives confidence in our own security before we can get behind it.

CONCLUSIONS

American eyes should now be opened to these hordes in Asia.

These policies I have suggested would be no isolationism. Indeed, they are the opposite. They would avoid rash involvement of our military forces in hopeless campaigns. They do not relieve us of working to our utmost. They would preserve a stronghold of Christian civilization in the world against any peradventure.

With the policies I have outlined, even without Europe, Americans have no reason for hysteria or loss of confidence in our security or our future. And in American security rests the future security of all mankind.

It would be an uneasy peace but we could carry it on with these policies indefinitely even if the Communists should attack our lines on the seas.

We can hope that in time the millions of other non-Communist peoples of the world will rise to their dangers.

We can hope that sometime the evils of communism and the disintegration of their racial controls will bring their own disintegration. It is a remote consolation, but twice before in world history Asiatic hordes have swept over a large part of the world and their racial dissensions dissolved their empires.

Our people have braved difficult and distressing situations in these three centuries we have been on this continent. We have faced our troubles without fear and we have not failed.

We shall not fail in this, even if we have to stand alone. But we need to realize the whole truth and gird ourselves for troubled times. The truth is ugly. We face it with prayer and courage.

The editorial reads as follows:

MR. HOOVER SPEAKS FOR THE NATION

Mr. Hoover made the most important speech of his life on Wednesday night.

Nominally he was speaking to the American people. In fact, he was speaking for the American people to their new Congress. He was telling the new Congress that the Truman-Acheson foreign policy was a failure in Korea and will be a failure in Europe; that the number of lives squandered for nothing in Korea is negligible compared with the number that would be sacrificed in a vain attempt to hold Europe against a Russian attack.

This the American people know and this, we are confident, the great majority of their Congressmen know even better. The question today is whether the new Congress will yield to the hysteria of a discredited Administration led by a President whose recent letters cast doubt on his mental and emotional stability.

There is no doubt that the hystericals have made progress. The eastern internationalist press is screaming in terror. Self-appointed committees are pleading for conscription of all boys and girls on their eighteenth birthdays even though there are no camps in which to house them, and, most important of all, far from enough experienced officers and noncommissioned officers to train them. Governor Dewey, of New York, who pretends to speak for the Republican Party, demands 100 divisions without explaining what may be the need for even one.

Mr. Hoover has clarified the issues with which the Eighty-second Congress must deal. Those who acknowledge the force of his argument will conclude that:

1. Our Army in Europe should not be reinforced. Under the North Atlantic Pact we are obliged to consult with the European powers if any of them is attacked and to assist in the defense with such means as we deem necessary. We are under no obligations to keep an army in Europe of any size.

2. As we do not intend to reinforce our garrison in Europe, there is no need to amend the draft law to take younger boys, to conscript girls, or to do anything else which would create a huge land army to tempt our administration into military adventures. Far from drafting more men, we should draft fewer or suspend the draft entirely. The volunteer system would give us all the men we need to defend our own possessions.

3. As we do not intend to fight on land in Europe, General Eisenhower should be ordered by Congress to stay home. His presence in Europe as the head of an allied military force is intended as a symbol or pledge of unlimited American support for the countries of Europe.

As Mr. Hoover said, and everybody ought to know, the nations of Western Europe lack the willingness to defend themselves. The symbol or pledge of unlimited help for those who won't help themselves should be withdrawn by any means that Congress can find for making the Nation's will manifest.

4. The Navy and the Air Force should be strengthened if there is any doubt that at their present strength they cannot safeguard the Western Hemisphere. Likewise, the northern approaches to this country, in Alaska and Canada, should be made secure.

A Congress which would support such a program would be the most popular Congress this country has known in our lifetime. This Congress would save not only billions of dollars but the lives of a million American boys who have been condemned to futile sacrifice under the Truman-Acheson-Dewey-Eisenhower program.

Mr. Hoover's speech sought to rally common sense against hysteria. The people are with him. If Congress does not adopt his ideas, it will be because some Democrats put loyalty to Truman and Acheson above loyalty to their country and because some Republicans imagine that it is to their advantage to follow a wayward little fool like Dewey.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 26, 1950

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our hearts are filled with an increasing sense of wonder and gratitude as we continue to meditate upon the glad tidings of the birth of the Saviour for whom the ages had been waiting and in whom we have the answer to our deepest needs.

Grant that the salvation and joy which He came to bring may be the blessed experience of all mankind. May men and nations everywhere accept and respond to those great ideals and principles of love and mercy, of truth and righteousness, which were realized completely in the life of our Lord.

When we are tempted to feel that the struggle for peace on earth and good will among men is futile may we find our courage and hope in the conquering love and power of the Christ of Christmas, whose name is Immanuel, God with us.

May the glory and praise be Thine for ever and ever. Amen.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 9798. An act to authorize a Federal civil defense program, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendment to the foregoing bill, requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. KEFAUVER, Mr. CHAPMAN, and Mr. SALTONSTALL to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to a concurrent resolution of the Senate of the following title:

S. Con. Res. 108. Concurrent resolution favoring the suspension of deportation of aliens.

The message also announced that the bill (H. R. 5051) entitled "An act for the relief of Mrs. Juan Antonia Rivera, Mrs. Paul Valle Antelo, Mrs. Jorge Diaz Romero, Mrs. Otto Resse, and Mrs. Hugo Soria," was passed, with amendments, by the Senate on December 15, 1950, and the concurrence of the House in said amendments is requested.

There was no objection.

CIVIL DEFENSE

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 9798) to authorize a Federal civil-defense program, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, may I inquire of the gentleman if he can give us some general review of the amendments that are in the bill?

Mr. VINSON. I regret very much I cannot, due to the fact this bill was handled by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DURHAM], who is chairman of the subcommittee and who is more conversant with the Senate amendments than I am; but from reading the RECORD the main difference between the House bill and the Senate bill, it seems, is in reference to self-liquidating shelters. The House rejected that line of thought. Something of that character is in the bill.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. The Senate does provide that it shall be legal to spend some of this huge sum on projects that may be of some value to the people after the emergency is over?

Mr. VINSON. There is something of that character in the bill, giving discretion to the Administrator to make loans to self-liquidating shelters.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I believe there is also a restriction written in the Senate measure with reference to the use of authority by the Administrator, confining that authority only to cases of real emergency?

Mr. VINSON. Yes.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. After an attack has been made?

Mr. VINSON. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. DURHAM, KILDAY, PRICE, COLE of New York, and ELSTON.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art the same yesterday, today, and forever and unchanging in Thy love and goodness, hitherto Thou hast blessed us and daily we have been the beneficiaries of Thy bountiful providence.

May we now render unto Thee the tribute of our heartfelt praise for Thou hast been our ever-present guide and companion and hast not withheld from us anything that was needful for our journey.

Grant that when we come to the closing hour of the old year we may be worthy of receiving the benediction which Thou dost bestow upon all who do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with the Lord.

Hear us in Christ's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, December 26, 1950, was read and approved.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House Resolution 894.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That when the House adjourns Thursday, December 28, 1950, it adjourn to meet on Monday, January 1, 1951, at 12 o'clock meridian in the Hall of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MILLS). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. ARENDS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman explain the resolution to the House? I am sure we are interested in it.

Mr. THOMAS. This resolution simply makes it legal for the House to move back into the Hall of the House, in the Capitol. It will be ready Monday.

Mr. ARENDS. I think that will be a pleasure. Does not the gentleman think so?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, indeed.

Mr. RANKIN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Texas if he is sure the House Chamber will be ready for us Monday?

Mr. THOMAS. I am so advised, I may say to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. Suppose it is not ready; then will we meet at all?

Mr. THOMAS. I think we can trust the workmen and the Architect. They say it will be ready.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman evidently has not seen the inside of the Chamber, or he would not be so enthusiastic.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Permit the Chair to advise that the Chair will not recognize any Member to proceed for 1 minute.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. In view of the statement of the Speaker that he would not recognize Members to address the House for 1 minute, may I ask if that is because of the world situation, the great emergency, or is it just a "gentleman's agreement"?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair is carrying out an agreement made by the leaders before the adjournment on Friday of last week, that no one would be recognized for a 1-minute speech.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. That does not prohibit me from putting in the RECORD what the New Deal bipartisan representative, Mr. Dulles, may say tonight, does it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By unanimous consent, the gentleman may extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I do not want to do it, but I was just wondering whether I might, if I did.

THE LATE LT. GEN. WALTON H. WALKER—COMMUNICATION FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Armed Services:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, December 29, 1950.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I recommend the enactment of legislation which would permit the posthumous appointment of the late Lt. Gen. Walton H. Walker to the grade of general in the Army of the United States. I believe that General Walker's outstanding accomplishments as commanding general of the Eighth United States Army in Korea fully entitle him to this recognition. There he proved himself to be a brilliant military commander, and his indomitable courage was an inspiration to all the troops under his command.

Attached is a draft of a joint resolution which would authorize this appointment. I hope that it may receive prompt consideration by the Congress.

Sincerely yours,

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
The Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a resolution (H. J. Res. 556) which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That, notwithstanding any other provisions of law, the President is authorized to issue posthumously to the late Walton Harris Walker, late a lieutenant general, Army of the United States, a commission as general, Army of the United States, as of December 20, 1950.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Army is authorized and directed to amend the records of the Department of the Army so as to carry the late Walton Harris Walker as a general, Army of the United States, to rank from December 20, 1950.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD in support of the resolution.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, but I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that we should pay the same honor to Gen. George S. Patton, one of the greatest individual soldiers and the greatest military leader America has developed since the War Between the States, who was mysteriously killed in Europe after being persecuted as no leader in the armed services has ever been persecuted in this country before.

I am just wondering if there is any possibility of treating General Patton likewise and giving him that honor to which he is entitled.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, in response to the gentleman's inquiry, I state that as far as I am concerned personally I think the same recognition should be given General Patton.

Mr. RANKIN. Then I will prepare and introduce a resolution to give General Patton the same recognition—with five stars instead of four.

He stands out as the greatest military genius of this generation, and I feel that this recognition should have been given him long ago.

I am going to ask that General Patton be given five stars—the largest number ever given a general in this country.

Let us not wait for future generations to recognize the great services of this matchless military leader who, by his wonderful tactics, probably saved the lives of a million American boys in Europe alone during the crucial days of World War II.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, the President of the United States, in letters to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House, dated December 29, 1950, has asked for immediate consideration by the Congress of a joint resolution which would permit the posthumous appointment of the late Lt. Gen. Walton H. Walker to the grade of general in the Army of the United States. I am sending a copy of such a resolution to the Speaker's desk, and I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of this joint resolution, which I have just introduced.

Mr. Speaker, this promotion is recommended by the President and the Department of Defense in recognition of General Walker's outstanding abilities as a leader of Armed Forces in actual combat. In his service in World War II and more especially in the present Korean conflict, in which unusual circumstances of combat necessitated the greatest of skill in attack as well as withdrawal, he had proven himself a brilliant military commander and displayed a great talent for generalship. His superb fighting spirit and unquenchable courage have been an inspiration to all the Army and to the Nation.

Let me explain why special legislation is necessary to accomplish this promotion. Public Law 680 of the Seventy-seventh Congress, an act to provide for the posthumous appointment to commissioned or noncommissioned grade of certain enlisted men and the posthumous promotion of certain commissioned officers and enlisted men, does not apply to this very meritorious case. That law requires that the individual concerned shall have been duly appointed to a commissioned grade and shall have been unable to accept the appointment to such a grade by reason of his death in line of duty. The law also specifies that the individual concerned shall have been officially recommended for appointment or promotion to a commissioned grade, which recommendation shall have been duly approved by the Secretary of War—now the Secretary of the Army—or the Secretary of the Navy, and who shall have been unable to receive or accept such appointment or promotion by reason of his death in line of duty. Neither of these requirements have been fulfilled in the case of General Walker.

I would like to make it clear that the Army had decided to recommend the promotion of General Walker to the grade of general prior to the time of his tragic death and had started the preparation of such a recommendation. As a matter of fact, General Collins, the Chief of Staff of the Army, had mentioned to me the Army's plans regarding General Walker about 2 months ago. The recommendation, however, had not been officially processed to the point where it was duly approved by the Secretary of the Army at the time of his death.

There is a very recent precedent for this action by the Congress. Just last year we passed a joint resolution authorizing the President to issue posthumously to the late John Sidney McCain a commission as Admiral, United States Navy, as of September 6, 1945, and authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to amend the records of the Navy Department accordingly. This joint resolution, adopted by the Congress in recognition of the late Admiral McCain's distinguished services to our country in World War II, became Private Law 251, Eighty-first Congress, on September 3, 1949.

As a measure of appreciation for General Walker's exceptional qualities of leadership and his highly meritorious services to our Nation, I strongly urge the adoption of the joint resolution for his posthumous promotion by the House of Representatives this afternoon.

Under unanimous consent, I insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this point in my remarks a summary of General Walker's distinguished military career.

LT. GEN. WALTON HARRIS WALKER, UNITED STATES ARMY

Walton Harris Walker was born in Belton, Tex., on December 3, 1889, son of Mr. and Mrs. Sam S. Walker, and grandson of two Confederate Army officers. He attended the Wedemyer Military Academy in Belton, and for 1 year studied at Virginia Military Institute, which he left to accept an appointment to the United States Military Academy at West Point, N. Y. Upon graduation from the Military Academy he was appointed a second lieutenant of Infantry on June 12, 1912, and was assigned to the Nineteenth Infantry at Fort Sheridan, Ill.

He was a member of the Vera Cruz expedition under General Funston in 1914 and later on performed border patrol duty in the vicinity of Del Rio, Tex. In 1917, as a captain, he organized the Second Battalion of the Fifty-seventh Infantry, and also Company A of the Thirteenth Machine Gun Battalion, and accompanied the latter unit to France in April 1918.

In France, as a major commanding the Thirteenth Machine Gun Battalion, he served at St. Mihiel and in the Meuse-Argonne, where he was twice cited for gallantry in action, receiving the Silver Star with Oak Leaf Cluster. Upon termination of hostilities he served with the Army of Occupation in Germany until July 1919, when he returned to the United States. After attending courses at both the Field Artillery and Infantry Schools, he was detailed as a tactical officer at the United States Military Academy, West Point, serving there from August 1923 to August 1925; at the Command and General Staff School, Fort Leavenworth, Kans., as a student, graduating in June 1926; and was assigned as instructor at the Coast Artillery School, Fort Monroe, Va.

In 1930, he again was ordered overseas, this time to Tientsin, China, where he served as a member of the Fifteenth Infantry Regiment on international railroad patrol until March 1933.

After promotion to lieutenant colonel he was ordered to Washington, D. C., in 1937, for duty as member of the War Plans Division of the War Department General Staff, where he served for 3 years, becoming executive officer of that Division.

On February 14, 1941, he was promoted to colonel, and in April of the same year was assigned to the Thirty-sixth Infantry, Camp Polk, La., as commanding officer. On July 10, 1941, he was promoted to brigadier general and was given command of the Third Armored Brigade at Camp Polk.

In January 1942 he assumed command of the Third Armored Division and was advanced to major general. In August 1942 he became commanding general of the Fourth Armored Corps, Camp Young, Calif., and in October 1942 was given the coordinate mission of organizing and commanding the vast desert training center. On March 29, 1943, he relinquished command of the center and proceed to Camp Campbell, Ky., with his corps, later designated the Twentieth Corps. In February 1944 he went with the Twentieth Corps to the European theater of operations, where he commanded it until the end of hostilities.

General Walker's success in coordinating infantry and armor was praised by the War Department, and his tactics in the early fighting in France led to praise by Prime Minister Churchill in the House of Commons in England. For extraordinary heroism near Melun, where he directed establishment of a bridgehead across the Seine in the face of heavy fire, he received the Distinguished Service Cross. For gallantry in action while commanding the Twentieth Army Corps in France, June 1944, he was awarded a second Oak Leaf Cluster to his Silver Star.

On April 27, 1945, General Walker was promoted to lieutenant general, which was effective April 15. General Patton presented to him the three stars, which he, in turn, had inherited from Gen. Dwight Eisenhower.

Upon his return to the United States on June 23, 1945, General Walker was named to command the Eighth Service Command, with headquarters at Dallas, Tex.

On June 11, 1946, he assumed command of the Fifth Army area, with headquarters at Chicago, Ill.

On July 20, 1948, General Walker was assigned as commanding general, Eighth Army, Japan, and he assumed command on September 24.

In July 1950 General Walker took the Eighth Army to Korea to fight with the United Nations forces in the defense of South Korea against the Communist forces of aggression. Under his able and dynamic leadership this Army courageously and successfully defended the Pusan beachhead, rapidly and skillfully advanced well into North Korea after the Inchon landing, and only withdrew to positions along the thirty-eighth parallel when it was attacked by overwhelming numbers of a new enemy. While in active direction of further military operations in the field, General Walker was killed in line of duty at about 11 a. m., December 23, 1950—Korean time—near Uijongbu, Korea, in an accident involving his jeep and a truck of the United Nations forces. For continual acts of extraordinary heroism in the Korean campaign, General Walker was awarded an Oak Leaf Cluster to his Distinguished Service Cross on October 1, 1950. He was also awarded an Air Medal with 10 Oak Leaf Clusters for meritorious achievement in sustained flights against the enemy during this campaign.

SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATION ACT, 1951

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 9920) making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments, disagree to the amendments of the Senate and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the Senate has included $75,000,000 additional for hospital construction. I am a little confused at this time as to the parliamentary procedure and am wondering if there is any way we can get a record vote in the House on this $75,000,000 that the Senate has added for hospital construction?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, in response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Rhode Island, the item is in disagreement between the two Houses. If the conferees are unable to agree we will bring the amendment back for action by the House.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania, whose voluntary departure from the House is a matter of general regret.

Mr. RICH. Is there anything in this legislation for the arming of the North Atlantic Fact countries?

Mr. CANNON. There is no provision to that effect in the bill.

Mr. RICH. No moneys whatever?

Mr. CANNON. There is no money for that purpose in the bill.

Mr. RICH. I think the Congress should be very careful in what they do by way of spending for the arming of foreign countries; I think that is one thing that ought to be considered very, very carefully by the membership of the House before it is too late.

Mr. CANNON. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman that the Congress should be very careful about all spending at this critical time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [After a pause.] The Chair hears none and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. CANNON, MAHON, KIRWAN, TABER, and WIGGLESWORTH.

EXCESS PROFITS TAX ACT OF 1950

consent that the statement of the managers be read in lieu of the report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9827) to provide revenue by imposing a corporate excess profits tax, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

Amendment No. 1: This amendment provides that the excess profits tax imposed by the bill shall not apply to taxable years beginning on or after January 1, 1953. The House recedes with an amendment providing that the tax shall not apply to taxable years beginning on or after July 1, 1953.

Amendments Nos. 2 and 3: These amendments are clerical. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 4: The House bill provided that the excess profits tax shall not exceed an amount which when added to the normal tax and surtax for the taxable year is equal to 67 percent of the corporation's surtax net income. The Senate amendment provides that the tax shall not exceed an amount equal to the excess of 60 percent of the excess profits net income for the taxable year over the normal tax and surtaxes which would be imposed for the taxable year if the tax base applicable to the normal tax and surtax were the amount of the excess profits net income. The House recedes with an amendment substituting 62 percent for the 60 percent provided in the Senate amendment.

Amendment No. 5: This amendment is clerical. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 6: The Senate amendment provided for computation of the tax in the case of a fiscal year beginning before January 1, 1953, and ending after December 31, 1952. The House recedes with an amendment conforming to the action taken on amendment No. 1.

Amendment No. 7: This amendment is clerical. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 8: This amendment strikes out the provision in the House bill which provided certain rules with respect to payment of the tax in the case of taxpayers claiming the benefits of certain relief provisions contained in the House bill. The rules to be applied in such case are contained in the provisions inserted by Senate amendment No. 144. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 9: This amendment provides a number of cross references. The House recedes.

Amendments Nos. 10 and 11: These amendments are clerical. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 13: This amendment provides that the unused excess profits credit for any taxable year shall be computed without regard to the deduction allowed for the year under section 23 (s) of the Internal Revenue Code, relating to net operating losses. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 14: This amendment provides for the computation of the unused excess profits credit for a taxable year beginning before January 1, 1953, and ending after December 31, 1952. The House recedes with an amendment conforming to the action taken on amendment No. 1.

Amendment No. 15: This is a technical amendment. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 16: This amendment provides, in effect, that there shall not be an unused excess profits credit carry-back for any period during which the taxpayer has distributed substantially all of its assets in liquidation or for any period during which the taxpayer has converted substantially of its assets into assets not held in good faith for the purposes of the business. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 17: This amendment strikes the provision of the House bill which excluded, for purposes of computing excess-profits net income for taxable years ending after June 30, 1950, certain gains and losses to which section 117 (j) of the Internal Revenue Code is applicable. Under the House bill, there would be excluded losses, as well as gains, from the voluntary sale of property used in the trade or business, but losses resulting from fire, theft, flood, and similar casualties would be allowed. The effect of the Senate amendment is to allow certain losses from the voluntary sale of business properties as ordinary losses, which the House provision would have disallowed. The House recedes. The conferees, however, have agreed that the treatment for excess-profits tax purposes of section 117 (j) losses is a subject matter which must have further study.

Amendment No. 18: This amendment makes a clarifying change in the provision of the House bill dealing with exclusions of income attributable to the recovery of bad debts. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 19: This amendment provides for the amount of the adjustment to be made of the normal-tax net income in the case of an insurance company computing the excess-profits credit based upon invested capital. The House recedes.

Amendments Nos. 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, and 27: These are clerical amendments. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 28: The House bill provided an adjustment, in computing excess profits net income, for the net operating loss adjustment. The Senate amendment (1) strikes out this provision of the House bill, (2) makes appropriate amendments in the adjustment to reflect the changes made by the Senate with respect to borrowed capital, and (3) provides, at the election of any taxpayer using the base period credit, for the carry forward to the years 1950 and 1951 of losses during the base period which have not otherwise been offset against the income of other years.

The House recedes with an amendment to allow any taxpayer computing invested capital by means of the historical credit also to carry forward to 1950 and 1951 losses during the base period which have not otherwise been offset in other years.

Amendment No. 29: The House bill provides that in the case of long-term leases, where the lessee is obligated to pay taxes imposed upon the lessor with respect to the rentals thereunder, such taxes shall be excluded by the lessor, and shall not be deducted by the lessee, in computing excess profits net income. The Senate amendment provides that the term of a lease of railroad properties entered into prior to December 1, 1950, shall include the years for which such lease may be renewed or continued. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 30: This is a clerical amendment. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 44: This amendment strikes out a provision of the House bill, the principle of which is set forth in section 441 (h), as added by Senate amendment 128.

Amendment No. 45: This is a clarifying amendment. The House recedes with an amendment relating to the treatment of abnormal deductions arising in different taxable years from the same extraordinary event (such as claims and awards arising in different taxable years from a single fire).

Amendment No. 46: This is a clarifying amendment. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 47: This is a technical amendment striking out as unnecessary a House provision. The principle expressed in this provision, of not treating as an abnormal deduction increased payrolls in the case of a growing corporation, is covered by other provisions of the same section of the bill with respect to all types of deductions which may be the cause or consequence of increased income. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 48: The House bill provides that in the case of long-term leases, where the lessee is obligated to pay taxes imposed upon the lessor with respect to the rentals thereunder, such taxes shall be excluded by the lessor, and shall not be deducted by the lessee, in the computation of average base period net income. The Senate amendment provides that the term of a lease of railroad properties entered into prior to December 1, 1950, shall include the years for which such lease may be renewed or continued. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 49: This amendment provides that with respect to banks the deduction for FDIC assessments in the taxpayer's base period years will be reduced proportionally with the credit allowed, pursuant to Public Law 797 of the 81st Congress, against the FDIC assessment in the excess profits tax year. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 50: This amendment adds to section 433 (b) of the bill as it passed the House a new paragraph (14) which provides, for purposes of computing average base period net income in the case of a life insurance company, that there be deducted from the normal-tax net income an amount equal to the excess of (1) the product of (A) the figure determined and proclaimed under section 202 (b) of the Internal Revenue Code and (B) the excess profits net income computed without regard to the paragraph, over (2) the adjustment for certain reserves provided in section 202 (c) of the code. This provision is comparable to section 433 (a) (1) (H) (applicable to excess profits tax taxable years) of the bill as it passed the House. The House recedes.

Amendments Nos. 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, and 56: These amendments are of a technical and clerical nature and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 57: This amendment relates to the action on Amendment No. 219 (adding a new paragraph (8) to section 141 (e) of the code) and Amendment No. 221 (adding a new subsection (j) to section 141 of the code) relating to the filing of consolidated returns. It provides that in the case of a regulated public utility which has made and filed a consent described in section 141 (e) (8) or (j) applicable to the taxable year, the excess profits credit is, for purposes of filing a consolidated return, to be determined in accordance with such consent. The House recedes.

Amendment Nos. 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, and 64: These amendments are clerical or clarifying in nature. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 65: This amendment corresponds to Amendment No. 29 and Amendment No. 48. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 66: This amendment added a provision under which the excess profits credit based on income would be computed under section 713 (but without the benefit of subsection (f) or section 722) of the code for the last taxable year of the taxpayer beginning prior to January 1, 1946, if the amount so computed is greater than 85 percent of the average base period net income computed as provided in the bill. There was no comparable provision in the House bill. The Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 67: This is a technical conforming amendment. The House recedes with a clarifying amendment.

Amendment Nos. 68, 69, 70, 71, and 72: These are technical conforming amendments. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 73: This amendment provides for cross references. The House recedes with a conforming amendment.

Amendment No. 74: This is a technical drafting amendment. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 75: This amendment affects section 435 (e) which is to be added to the Code and which provides for an alternative average base period net income for growing corporations. Under the House bill this provision was available only to corporations which commenced business before the beginning of the base period. The Senate amendment made the provision applicable if the taxpayer commenced business before May 1, 1946.

The House bill also made the growth provision available only if (1) the taxpayer had total assets of not more than $20,000,000 at the beginning of its base period and if (2) the total payroll of the taxpayer for the last half of its base period was 130 percent or more of its total payroll for the first half of its base period or its gross receipts for the last half of its base period were 150 percent or more of its gross receipts for the first half of its base period.

The Senate amendment retains the above gross receipts and payrolls tests, and modifies the $20,000,000 asset test by requiring that there be added to the assets of the taxpayer, for the purposes of this test, the assets of other affiliated corporations with which the taxpayer has the privilege of filing consolidated returns for its first excess profits tax taxable year under the new law.

The Senate amendment also added a second set of tests (as an alternative to the $20,000,000 assets, payrolls and gross receipts tests) which if met qualify the taxpayer for relief under this section. These tests are based on growth as evidenced primarily by increased sales of a product or class of products of a kind not generally available to the public at any time prior to 1946. Television sets are an example of such a product. A product which is a modification of an old product, such as an improvement or change in style, is not a product of the type referred to. A product which was generally available prior to 1946, although not available at all times prior thereto, is also not intended to be covered.

The House recedes with amendments reinstating the requirement that the taxpayer must have commenced business prior to the beginning of its base period and reducing somewhat the qualifications for growth corporations based on sales of a new product.

Amendment Nos. 76 and 77: These amendments relate to the relief provided corporations which qualify as "growth" corporations.

The House bill provided that in the case of a corporation qualifying for relief under the growth provision, its average base period net income under this provision might be based on its income for the last 12 months of its base period or the average for the last 24 months of its base period, whichever is higher. Amendment No. 76 strikes out the provision for taking the higher of these two alternatives and amendment No. 77 provides for two additional alternatives, making four in all under this provision. The third alternative, as added by the Senate amendment, is based on the taxpayer's excess profits net income for the last six months of 1949 and 80 percent of the taxpayer's excess profits net income for the first six months of 1950 (or in the case of a taxpayer on a fiscal year basis, a weighted part of the taxpayer's excess profits net income for the first six months of 1950). The fourth alternative, as added by the Senate amendment, is based on the excess profits net income for the last six months of 1948 and the first six months of 1950 (weighted as above described).

The House recedes as to amendment No. 76, and also recedes as to amendment No. 77 with an amendment restricting the use of the fourth method as an alternative for computing average base period net income under this provision to only those corporations which qualify as growth corporations under the provision relating to a new product and whose excess profits net income for 1949 is 25 percent or less than the excess profits net income for 1948.

Amendment No. 78: This amendment relates to the definition of "total assets" for the purposes of the growth provision test based on $20,000,000 of total assets. Under the House bill only such assets were counted as were "used in the taxpayer's business". The Senate amendment substitutes for this expression the requirement that the assets be "held by such taxpayer for the purposes of the business." The House recedes.

Amendment No. 79: This amendment is made necessary by the provisions of Senate amendment No. 75 under which the $20,000,000 asset test for purposes of the growth formula is to be determined with reference to the assets of an affiliated group. The House recedes.

Amendments No. 80, 81, 82, and 83: These are clerical amendments. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 84: Under the House bill the base period capital addition was determined by treating borrowed capital in a manner similar to its treatment in determining the invested capital credit. This amendment strikes out the provisions of the House bill and substitutes provisions which, in the treatment of borrowed capital, correspond to the treatment of borrowed capital for the purpose of determining the net capital addition or reduction under the Senate bill. The House recedes with amendments conforming to the 75 percent limitation on the inclusion of borrowed capital (see amendment No. 124).

Amendments No. 85 to 95, inclusive: These amendments relate to the determination of the net capital addition or reduction applicable in determining the excess profits credit based on income. Amendments No. 85 and 91 are clerical amendments. Amendments No. 86, 87, 90, and 93 relate to the adjustment for an increase or decrease in inadmissible assets. Under the House bill, this adjustment was made on a daily basis. Under the Senate bill, amendment No. 95 provides rules for determining such increase or decrease for the taxable year, amendments 86 and 87 provide for the adjustment based on such determination, and amendments 90 and 93 strike out the provisions for a daily adjustment. Amendment 88 strikes out a provision in the House bill for the determination of the amount of property paid in as a capital addition, a similar rule being included in section 441 of the Senate bill (see amendment No. 128), and amendment 94 strikes out a cross-reference which appears in the provisions inserted by amendment No. 95. Amendments No. 89 and 92 provide for the inclusion of borrowed capital in determining the net capital addition or reduction. Amendments No. 92 and 95 also provide special rules in the case of an increase in inadmissible assets by, or loans to, a member of a controlled group. The House recedes with amendments necessary to reflect the inclusion of only 75 percent of the borrowed capital.

Amendment No. 96: This amendment is made necessary by amendments 85–95, inclusive, which include borrowed capital in determining net capital addition or reduction. Under the House bill, borrowed capital was not so included, but subsection (h) of section 435 provided special rules for additions and reductions in borrowed capital. Amendment No. 96 strikes out subsection (h), borrowed capital being included under amendments 85–95 in computing net capital addition or reduction. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 97: This amendment provides the general rule for determining the excess profits credit based on invested capital. Under the House bill, the invested capital credit is the sum of the basic equity capital credit, the new capital credit, and the borrowed capital credit, adjusted for inadmissible assets. The Senate bill provides that the invested capital credit shall be the sum of (1) the invested capital credit, reduced by the inadmissible asset adjustment, and (2) the new capital credit. These changes are made necessary by the change made in the treatment of borrowed capital and by the provision in section 437 (b) relating to the election of the historical invested capital method. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 98: This amendment provides rules for the computation of the excess profits credit based on invested capital in the case of foreign corporations engaged in a trade or business in the United States and corporations entitled to the benefits of section 251. The House recedes, with a clarifying amendment to section 436 (b) (1) (A) and technical amendments to section 436 (b) (1) (A) and 436 (b) (1) (B) to conform with the 75 per centum inclusion for borrowed capital.

Amendments Nos. 99, 100, 101, 102, and 103: These are technical amendments made necessary by amendment 104. Under these amendments, the rates for determining the invested capital credit apply to the invested capital determined for the taxpayer; under the House bill these rates applied only to the adjusted equity capital. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 104: This amendment relates to section 437 (b), which in the House bill defined adjusted equity capital. Under the House bill, the rates provided in section 437 (a) applied to the amount so determined under section 437 (b). Amendment No. 104 strikes out section 437 (b) of the House bill and inserts a new section 437 (b), paragraph (1) of which provides that the invested capital shall be, except in the case of a mutual insurance company (other than life or marine), the adjusted invested capital determined under paragraph (2) of section 437 (b), or at the election of the taxpayer in its return for the taxable year the historical invested capital determined under section 458 (see amendment No. 206), paragraph (2) of which provides that the adjusted invested capital is determined in a manner similar to that used in determining adjusted equity capital under section 437 (b) of the House bill, but with the addition thereto of the average borrowed capital for the taxable year, and paragraph (3) of which provides the manner for determining the invested capital in the case of a mutual insurance company (other than life or marine). The House recedes with an amendment providing for the inclusion, in determining adjusted invested capital, of only 75 percent of the average borrowed capital for the taxable year, and with an amendment conforming to the action on amendment No. 205.

Amendment No. 105: This amendment clarifies the provisions of section 437 (c) of the House bill, defining equity capital as the excess of the adjusted basis of the total assets held by the taxpayer over the total of its liabilities, by providing that such assets should include only those held in good faith for the purposes of the taxpayer's business. The purpose of this limitation is to disallow in computing invested capital those assets which are not required in the business and which have the principal effect of reducing excess profits tax. Similar provisions are contained elsewhere in the bill with respect to the other determinations made in computing the excess profits credit. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 106: This amendment provides special rules for determining the equity capital of an insurance company (other than mutual and other than life or marine). The House recedes with a clarifying amendment.

Amendment No. 107: This amendment excludes from the definition of "liabilities" for purposes of determining equity capital of a bank, as defined in section 104, the reserves for bad debts. The House recedes.

Amendments Nos. 108 and 109: These are clerical amendments to conform to amendment No. 128. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 110: This is a clerical amendment. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 111: This amendment conforms to amendment No. 104, and provides that the new capital credit shall not be allowed in the case of a taxpayer using the historical invested capital determined under section 458 (see amendment No. 206), or in the case of a mutual insurance company (other than life or marine). The House recedes.

Amendment No. 112: This amendment relates to the determination of the net new capital addition under section 437 (b). Under the House bill, the daily capital reduction used in determining the net new capital addition was determined under section 437 (e) and there was no adjustment in such determination for any increase in inadmissible assets. The amendment by the Senate provides for such adjustment, and further provides that the daily capital reduction used for purposes of section 438 (b) shall be determined under section 438 (d) (see amendment No. 119). The House recedes with an amendment made necessary by the amendment to amendment No. 104 with respect to the inclusion of only 75 per centum of the average borrowed capital.

Amendments Nos. 113 and 114: These are clerical amendments. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 115: This is a clerical amendment to conform to amendment No. 128. The House recedes.

Amendments Nos. 116 and 117: These are clerical amendments. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 118: This is a technical amendment to conform to the change in the treatment of borrowed capital provided by amendment No. 124. It further provides for treatment of excluded borrowed capital similar to that accorded excluded equity capital in determining the daily new capital reduction. The House recedes, with an amendment reducing the amount of the excess in the increase in daily borrowed capital to be taken into account to 75 per centum.

Amendment No. 119: This amendment inserts a new subsection (d) in section 438 to provide the rules for determining the daily capital reduction for purposes of section 438. The House recedes with an amendment conforming to the change to amendment No. 104 with respect to average borrowed capital.

Amendment No. 120: This amendment is a change in the designation of a subsection. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 121: This is a clerical amendment. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 122: This is a conforming amendment (see amendment No. 128). The House recedes.

Amendment No. 123: This is a conforming amendment made necessary by amendment No. 118, and provides, for borrowed capital, a definition of excluded borrowed capital. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 124: This amendment strikes out section 439 of the House bill, which related to the determination of the borrowed capital credit, and inserts a new section 439, relating to borrowed capital. Under the House bill, the borrowed capital credit generally was an amount equal to one-third of the amount of interest paid or incurred with respect to borrowed capital for the current taxable year, with certain maximum and minimum limitations and with certain special provisions relating to insurance companies. Under the Senate amendment, section 439 defines average borrowed capital for the taxable year and daily borrowed capital for any day. Under other Senate amendments, 100 percent of the indebtedness constituting borrowed capital is includible in the same manner as equity capital in computing the borrowed capital credit, and provision is made for the disallowance of the interest deduction attributable to such borrowed capital (see, for example, amendments Nos. 33 and 34, and 104). Under section 439 (b) (1) of the bill as amended by the Senate, the definition of borrowed capital includes only indebtedness incurred in good faith for the purposes of the business. The Senate amendment includes in borrowed capital the amount of the taxpayer's indebtedness to a bank which is evidenced by a bank loan agreement. It also contains special provisions for a 50 percent inclusion with respect to unearned premiums of insurance companies, certain reserves of life insurance companies, and certain reserves of face-amount certificate companies. In the case of the other Senate amendments with respect to borrowed capital, the House has, in general, receded with amendments providing for only a 75 percent inclusion with respect to borrowed capital. The House recedes with respect to Amendment No. 124, with amendments providing for an increase from 50 percent to 66⅔ percent with respect to insurance company unearned premiums, life insurance company reserves, and face-amount certificate company reserves. The effect of these amendments is to retain as borrowed capital taken into account in computing the excess profits credit in such cases the original 50 percent amount (75 percent of 66⅔ percent).

Amendment No. 125: This is a technical amendment. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 126: This is a clarifying amendment. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 127: Under the House bill, section 441 contained the provisions with respect to the computation of the invested capital credit in the case of foreign corporations and corporations entitled to the benefits of section 251. Under the Senate amendment, provisions with respect to such corporations are contained in section 436 (b) (see amendment No. 98). Amendment No. 127 strikes out section 441 of the House bill. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 128: This amendment is a new section containing definitions and rules applicable to section 435, relating to the excess profits credit based on income; section 437, relating to the invested capital credit; section 438, relating to the new capital credit; and section 440, relating to admissible and inadmissible assets. Subsection (a) provides a definition of equity capital as the equity capital defined in section 437 (c). Subsection (b) corresponds to a portion of section 437 (d) of the House bill, stricken by Amendment No. 108. Subsection (c) is designed to prevent tax avoidance by including only money and property paid-in in good faith for the purposes of the taxpayer's business. Subsections (d), (e), (f), and (g), respectively, correspond to section 437 (g) of the House bill, stricken by Amendment No. 109. Subsection (i) modifies the general rule for valuation of certain intangible assets, and subsection (j) provides a special rule for certain railroad properties acquired upon rejection of a lease. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 129: The House bill provided that in the case of certain abnormalities in net income during base period years, the year affected by a substantial abnormality might be reconstructed by applying to the taxpayers net income in normal years in the base period the ratio of the industry rate of return for the abnormal years to the industry rate of return for the taxpayer's normal years. The Senate amendment (1) strikes out these provisions of the House bill and (2) provides, in general, for relief in the case of abnormalities by applying the industry rate of return for the period of abnormality to the taxpayer's total assets. In the event that no more than 12 months are affected by an abnormality (other than the period eliminated under section 435 (d)) a substitute excess profits net income is determined for the period of the abnormality by the use of the applicable industry rate of return. In the event that more than 12 months in the taxpayer's base period (other than the period eliminated under section 435 (d)) are affected by an abnormality, the average base period net income is determined by applying the base period rate of return for the 4 years 1946 though 1949 to the taxpayer's average assets during the base period. The provision is intended to be applicable only to periods in which the excess profits net income of the taxpayer is affected by an abnormality. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 130: The House bill provided that taxpayers which introduced a different product or service during the last three years of the base period might compute an alternative credit on the basis of the industry rate of return as applied to their assets. The Senate amendment (1) strikes out the provisions of the House bill and (2) substitutes provisions designed, in general, to provide similar relief. The application of the provisions has been clarified in order to permit a taxpayer who introduces more than one new product or service to aggregate the income from all such products or services for the purpose of qualifying under the section. Other changes have been made in the qualification requirements, in the method of computing average base period net income, and in provisions relating to capital additions and reductions. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 131: This amendment, for which there is no corresponding provision in the House bill, in general permits a taxpayer which has effected a substantial increase in its capacity for production or operation during the last 36 months of the base period to compute an average base period net income by applying the industry base period rate of return to its assets as of the end of the base period. The House recedes with an amendment eliminating a provision relating to a change in operations and management.

Amendment No. 132: This is a clerical amendment. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 133: This is a technical amendment.

Amendment No. 134: This amendment strikes out certain provisions of section 444 of the House bill relating to the method of computing average base period net income for new corporations, and inserts new rules for the computation. The House recedes.

Amendments Nos. 135, 136, 137, 138, and 139: These are technical amendments to the provisions relating to rules for application of the new corporation section. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 140: This amendment, for which there is no corresponding provision in the House bill, provides that certain corporations, under certain circumstances, are not eligible for the benefits of the new corporation provision. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 141: This amendment adds cross-references. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 142: This amendment strikes out section 445 of the House bill, relating to industry base period rates of return, for which provision is made in Senate Amendment No. 144. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 143: This amendment adds a new section providing relief for depressed industry subgroups. Under the Senate amendment a depressed industry subgroup is one in which the average rate of return on total assets during the years 1946 through 1949 is less than 60 percent of the average rate of return of the industry subgroup over the period 1936 through 1949. The Senate amendment would permit a taxpayer in such an industry subgroup to use an average base period net income computed by multiplying its average total assets during the base period by 80 percent of the depressed industry subgroup's average rate of return during the period 1936 through 1949. There was no corresponding provision in the House bill. The House recedes with amendments having the following effect. The comparative periods for determining whether the industry subgroup was depressed and the rate of return to be allowed in computing the average based period net income are limited to the periods 1938 through 1948 (instead of 1936 through 1949) and 1946 through 1948 (instead of 1946 through 1949). Under the Senate amendment the industry rate of return for the short period was required to be less than 60 percent of the rate of return for the long period. This is changed to 63 percent. A clarifying amendment is also made with respect to the effect of renegotiation in connection with the statistics to be used.

Amendment No. 144: This amendment replaces section 445 of the House bill, relating to industry rates of return and industry classifications. The amendment clarifies the method of rate determination and prescribes the industry classifications to be used in providing relief for abnormalities in the base period, change in product, increase in capacity, and new corporations. The industry classifications are the same (to the extent available statistical data will permit) as the Standard Industrial classifications developed by the Bureau of the Budget. The classification of individual corporations is to be made in accordance with the specifications shown in the Standard Industrial Classification Manual (prepared by the Division of Statistical Standards, Bureau of the Budget). The amendment requires the taxpayer to make application with his return, or within a prescribed period, for the benefits of sections 442 to 446. The House recedes with an amendment with respect to the effect of renegotiation in connection with the statistics to be used.

Amendment No. 145: This amendment relates to the minimum excess profits credit for regulated public utilities. The amendment applies to all utilities covered by the House bill and also to regulated public utilities engaged in the furnishing or sale of (1) sewerage disposal services, (2) transportation by motor vehicle, and (3) transportation by common carrier by water, subject to the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission or Federal Maritime Board.

Under the House bill the percentage used in computing the credit for common carriers by railroad, and for common carriers by air, was 5 percent. Under the Senate amendment this was increased to 7 percent in the case of air carriers and 6 percent in the case of railroads. Under the House bill the percentage for telephone and telegraph companies was 6 percent, which is increased to 7 percent by the Senate amendment. The utilities added by the Senate amendment use the 6 percent rate.

Under the House bill adjusted equity capital was computed in the manner provided in section 437 (b) of the House bill. Under the Senate amendment, in certain cases where corporate books of account are maintained in accordance with systems of accounts prescribed by an appropriate regulatory body, the adjusted invested capital is the sum of the average outstanding common and preferred stock accounts and the capital surplus and earned surplus accounts as recorded on the corporate books of account.

The amendment also (1) made technical and clarifying changes, (2) expanded and clarified the definition of the term "regulated public utility", and (3) included provisions relating to consolidated returns of regulated public utilities.

The House recedes with clarifying amendments.

Amendments Nos. 146 and 147: These amendments change section numbers. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 148: This amendment comforms to amendment No. 152. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 149: This amendment includes "perlite" as a strategic mineral. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 150: This amendment includes molybdenum and beryllium as strategic minerals. The House recedes with an amendment limiting the inclusion to molybdenum.

Amendment No. 151: This amendment includes trona as a strategic mineral. The Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 152: The House bill extended the benefits of section 448 of the House bill (section 450 of the Senate bill) to corporations engaged in mining critical minerals as defined in subsection (b) (2). This amendment strikes out subsection (b) (2), and conforming changes are made by amendments Nos. 148 and 154. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 153: This is a clerical amendment. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 154: This amendment conforms to the change made by Amendment No. 152. The House recedes.

Amendments Nos. 155, 156, and 157: These are clerical amendments. The House recedes.

Amendments Nos. 158 to 185, inclusive: These are amendments to section 451 of the House bill, relating to nontaxable income from certain mining and timber operations, and from natural gas properties. Amendment No. 158 changes the section number. Amendments Nos. 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 168, 169, 170, 179, 182, 183, and 185 are clarifying amendments. Under the House bill the taxable years beginning after December 31, 1945, and not ending after June 30, 1950, are referred to as the "base period" for the purposes of this section. Under these amendments, such period is referred to as the "normal period". Amendment No. 167 adds "shell" to the list of nonmetallic substances designated as "minerals" for the purposes of this section. Amendments Nos. 172, 173, 174, and 180 are clerical amendments. Amendment No. 171 permits a taxpayer with more than one mineral property to elect to treat its properties as one mineral property. Amendments Nos. 175, 176, 177, 178, and 181 apply to a metal or coal mining property the rule, applicable under the House bill in the case of a coal mining or iron mining property, for the determination by reference to unit net income of the nontaxable income from exempt excess output. Amendment No. 184 relates to nontaxable income from exempt excess output in the case of a property not in operation during the normal period. Under the House bill, such nontaxable income was one-sixth of the net income (computed with the allowance for depletion) in the case of a coal mining or iron mining property or from a timber block. Under the Senate amendment, it is one-third of such net income in the case of a metal or coal mining property or a timber block or a natural gas property, and a special rule is provided for considering certain metal mining properties as not having been in operation during the normal period. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 185: This is a clerical amendment. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 187: This is a clarifying amendment. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 188: This amendment exempts from the excess profits tax any corporation subject to certain provisions of the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938 if, after excluding from gross income the amount of certain compensation for the transportation of mail by aircraft, its adjusted excess profits net income for the year is zero or less. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 189: This is a clerical amendment. The House recedes.

Amendments Nos. 190, 191, 192, and 193: These amendments extend the scope of section 455 (a) (section 453 (a) of the House bill) so as to permit dealers in installment sales obligations the same election with respect to reporting income on the accrual basis for excess profits tax purposes as is afforded other taxpayers computing income on the installment basis. The House recedes.

Amendments Nos. 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, and 200: These are clerical amendments. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 201: This amendment relates to classes of abnormal income attributable to other taxable years. The Senate recedes.

Amendments Nos. 202, 203, and 204: These are clerical amendments. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 205: This amendment provides for adjustments in the determination of excess profits credits with respect to deposits under the Merchant Marine Act of 1936. The Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 206: This amendment makes available an historical invested capital credit similar to that provided for under the World War II excess profits tax law. Section 458 (a), (b), and (c) corresponds to sections 715, 716, and 717, respectively. Section 458 (d), providing for the addition to equity invested capital, corresponds to section 718 (a) of prior law and section 458 (e), describing the reductions in equity invested capital, is the counterpart of section 718 (b). Rules for the application of the section, comparable to section 718 (c) of prior law, are set forth in section 458 (f). The House recedes, with an amendment reducing the daily borrowed capital to 75 per centum in conformity with the amendment to section 437 (b) (2).

Amendment No. 207: This amendment substitutes a new Part II for Part II (of subchapter D of chapter I of the Internal Revenue Code) contained in the House bill, dealing with excess profits credit based on income in connection with certain exchanges. The Senate amendment revises the provisions of the House part, with additions made necessary by other Senate amendments. The Senate amendment also makes a number of technical and clarifying changes. The House recedes with technical and clarifying amendments.

Amendments Nos. 208, 209, and 210: These are technical amendments. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 211: This amendment adds to the bill two new sections (sections 471 and 472) relating to exchanges and to the invested capital adjustment at the time of tax-free intercorporate liquidations, respectively. These sections relate to the historical invested capital provisions, and correspond to the provisions of Supplement C of Chapter 2E of the Code. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 212: This amendment adds a new title II—"Increase in corporation surtax"—to the bill. This title increases the rate of surtax upon the corporation surtax net income of corporations for taxable years beginning on or after July 1, 1950, from 20 to 22 percent, and makes the necessary conforming changes in the law with respect to mutual insurance companies other than life or marine, regulated investment companies, business income of certain tax-exempt organizations, and the credits of corporations. Section 203 of title II amends section 108 (f) (2) (relating to fiscal year taxpayers) to make it clear that the increased surtax rate has no effect in the case of taxpayers with taxable years beginning before July 1, 1950, and ending after June 30, 1950. The House recedes.

Amendments Nos. 213, 214, 215, 216, and 217: These are clerical amendments. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 218: Under the House bill personal service corporations and certain corporations (otherwise exempt from the excess profits tax imposed by the bill) which were members of an affiliated group of corporations filing a consolidated return under section 141 were included within the definition of the term "includible corporation" if such corporations made and filed consents, for the taxable year or any prior taxable years beginning after December 31, 1943, to be treated as includible corporations. This amendment changes the reference to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1943, to taxable years ending after June 30, 1950. The effect of the amendment is to permit such corporations to make a new election as to whether they will be members of an affiliated group for taxable years ending after June 30, 1950. The House recedes.

Amendments Nos. 219 and 221: These amendments relate to the inclusion of regulated public utilities in an affiliated group of corporations making a consolidated return for a taxable year in lieu of separate returns.

Amendment No. 219 adds to section 141 (e) a new paragraph (8) which provides that the term "includible corporation" does not include regulated public utilities entitled to compute their excess profits credit under section 448 except such a utility which has made and filed a consent to compute its excess profits credit without regard to section 448.

Amendment No. 221 adds to section 141 a new subsection (j) which, despite the provisions of the paragraph added by Amendment No. 219, permits two or more regulated public utilities to be considered as includible corporations for the purposes of the application of subsection (d) (relating to definition of "affiliated group") to such regulated public utilities alone if each such regulated public utility has made and filed a consent to compute its excess profits credit under section 448 only.

A consent under section 441 (e) (8) or (j) is to be made and filed at such time and in such manner as may be prescribed by the Secretary and is to be applicable to the taxable year for which filed and to each consecutive subsequent taxable year for which a consolidated return is filed.

The House recedes.

Amendments Nos. 220, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, and 228: These are clerical amendments. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 229: This amendment relates to the amortization of emergency facilities. The Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 230: This is a clerical amendment. The House recedes with a clerical amendment.

Amendment No. 231: This amendment relates to the same subject as amendment No. 35, namely, payments made by the United States for the encouragement of exploration, development, or mining of strategic or critical minerals for defense purposes, but amends section 22 (b) of the code so as to exclude such payments from normal tax net income and surtax net income. The House recedes with a clerical amendment and with an amendment making this provision applicable to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1950.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON H. R. 9827, THE EXCESS PROFITS TAX ACT OF 1950

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD in explanation of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the quest of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, the conference report on H. R. 9827, the Excess Profits Tax Act of 1950, was agreed to unanimously by the seven House conferees and the five Senate conferees. The conference report retains all the important provisions of the bill which passed the House of Representatives on December 5, by a vote of 378 to 20. A number of amendments were added in the Senate. Some of these made technical changes and others were designed to avoid hardship in the application of the excess-profits tax to particular industries, or to small new expanding corporations. Most of the Senate amendments were acceptable to the House conferees, but a few were not.

The principal differences between the conference report and the bill as passed by the House of Representatives are as follows:

A. Rate of tax and over-all ceiling: The rate of tax would be 77 percent of adjusted excess-profits net income. This includes an increase of 2 percent in the rate of surtax on corporations effective in the case of calendar-year corporations beginning with the 1951 taxable year.

The excess-profits tax would be applicable, in effect, retroactive to July 1, 1950. The over-all rate limitation on income and excess-profits taxes would be 62 percent instead of the 67 percent provided under the House bill and the 60 percent provided under Senate amendment.

B. Termination date: As passed by the House, the bill provided for an excess-profits tax for an indefinite period. A Senate amendment provided that the excess-profits tax should terminate as of December 31, 1952. The conferees agreed to terminate the tax with respect to taxable years beginning after June 30, 1953. The provision for a termination date really is not very important in view of the fact that our entire tax structure will be under constant review as we endeavor to meet the financial requirements of the preparedness program.

C. Borrowed capital: As under the House bill, the conference agreement retains the same election available under the World War II excess-profits tax of computing the excess-profits-tax credit on either the average earnings or invested-capital method, whichever is most favorable to the taxpayer. Under the House bill, taxpayers using the invested-capital credit generally were allowed a lower rate of return on borrowed capital than on equity capital. A Senate amendment allowed the same rate of return for borrowed capital as for equity capital by inclusion of 100 percent of borrowed funds as invested capital. Under the conference agreement, the House policy prevailed, since only 75 percent of borrowed capital would be taken into account, while one-fourth of the interest on borrowed funds would be allowed as a deduction in computing excess-profits net income for the taxable year.

D. Changes in the growth formula: The Committee on Ways and Means recognized that, in the case of small, growing corporations, the 1946–49 experience might not provide an adequate average earnings credit. Under the House bill, therefore, corporations with total assets of not more than $20,000,000 at the beginning of the base period and with a higher volume of business in 1948 and 1949 than in 1946 and 1947 would be permitted to use an alternative credit consisting of either 1949 earnings or the average of 1948 and 1949 earnings. As modified in conference, in accord with the original purpose of the House bill, a corporation with assets in excess of $20,000,000 may qualify for relief under the growth formula if it has a record of rapid growth in the base period attributable to the sale of a new product. Under the conference agreement, "growth" corporations may also elect to take into account, in computing average base period net income, earnings during the first 6 months of 1950.

E. Increase in capacity during the base period: The House bill provided for appropriate adjustment in the average earnings credit based on net income in the base period in the case of abnormalities which adversely affected the income of a corporation during the base period and a change in product or services during the base period which increased the potential earnings of a taxpayer. A Senate amendment carries out the purpose of the House bill by granting similar relief in the case of a taxpayer which made substantial changes in capacity to increase its output during the last 36 months of the base period.

F. Regulated public utilities: As passed by the House, the bill provided an alternative credit for regulated public utilities consisting of a minimum fixed return after corporate normal tax and surtax. Under the conference agreement, this alternative credit would be available to certain bus lines, truck lines, ship lines, and sewerage disposal companies, and the alternative credit was liberalized in certain respects.

G. Distressed industries: As agreed to in conference, the bill provides relief for depressed industries if the average rate of return on total assets of the industry in 1946 through 1948 were substantially below the rate of return for the period 1938 through 1948.

H. Other Senate amendments:

(a) The House receded on Senate amendment No. 17. This amendment does not change the treatment provided in the House bill in cases where gains exceed losses in the case of sales of section 117 (j) assets, including gains and losses upon the cutting of timber under section 117 (k). In such a case, under both the House and the Senate bills, where such gains exceed losses, the gain is not subject to the excess-profits tax.

(b) Though sympathetic with the principle of the Senate amendment relating to the amortization allowance for defense facilities, the House conferees could not accept the amendment because of the limited time available to explore the problem. The House conferees also had in mind that administration of the amortization section is in its early stages and that the officials in charge should be given an opportunity to conform their policy to the intent of the Congress to encourage the investment of private capital in war plants.

If the problem is not solved administratively at an early date, I personally, will ask the Ways and Means Committee to review the situation and to initiate appropriate remedial legislation. Any such legislation should apply retroactively, so that applicants who begin construction on the basis of certificates of necessity currently being issued will not be prejudiced.

I. Revenue yield: According to the estimates of the staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, the bill as agreed to in conference, at current levels of corporate profits, will yield about $3,300,000,000, and if the upward trend in corporate profits continues the bill will yield between $4,000,000,000 and $5,000,000,000 next year.

Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated, the conference report retains all of the essential provisions of the House bill. In my opinion, most of the Senate amendments agreed to in conference have improved the measure by providing greater protection against possible hardship. I believe that the bill now before the House fully complies with the mandate given to the Committee on Ways and Means to prepare as early as possible in the Eighty-first Congress an excess-profits tax bill, and I am grateful to everyone who has cooperated in making possible the completion of our assignment in the limited time available.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, as it passed the House on December 5, 1950, H. R. 9827, the Excess Profits Tax Act of 1950 was probably the most hysterical piece of tax legislation ever to come before the Congress. It was a manifestation of what can, and does, happen when political emotionalism is substituted for judgment and reason and when haste becomes the measure of achievement. But it is to the everlasting credit of our legislative process that even under such a severe handicap the final product represented by the conference report is at least a wholehearted effort to enact a fair and equitable excess profits tax. Of course, any tax which attempts to define normal profits for all corporations is at best a clumsy and inherently inequitable sort of tax, and no amount of relief provisions can ever be made to prevent discrimination between corporate taxpayers. Considering, however, the pressure under which this legislation was framed it is at least a brave effort to achieve the desired objective of taxing the profits arising from our defense program and at the same time not erecting a tax barrier around the expansion of our industrial economy.

The fact that a vast improvement over the bill as it passed the House has been made is due primarily to the energetic fight which the Republican minority made. When the bill was being hurriedly considered by the House we Republicans pointed out many of the serious defects which it contained and urged, both in the minority views and during the debate, that certain changes be made. I am now happy to report to you that the conference report contains most of the Republican recommendations for improvements and that the basic concept of a minimum floor through an increased corporate rate and a maximum ceiling which I proposed is also contained in the conference report. Had the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee not peremptorily ruled my proposal out of order early in the public hearings, it would have greatly expedited the passage of this legislation and made it unnecessary for the House to have to consider the conference report at this late stage of the Fighty-first Congress.

It will be recalled that the Republican motion to recommit H. R. 9827 with instructions to report it back forthwith to the House consisted of only two simple amendments. The first amendment would have provided for an increase in the corporate surtax rate. This amendment is now provided for in the conference report in the form of a 2-percentage-point increase in the corporate income-tax rate with respect to taxable years beginning on and after July 1, 1950. At the levels of corporate profits existing in 1950 this 2-percentage-point increase in the corporate surtax rate will yield approximately $600,000,000 annually. Since no increase is made in the normal tax rate the total tax rate on income of $25,000 or less will remain at 25 percent, which is the present rate under existing law for 1951. The second part of the Republican motion to recommit was the elimination of the 15-percent cutback in the average earnings credit. Although the effect of this amendment was not as simply achieved as under the Republican proposal, substantially the same result has been reached in many cases as the result of the liberalized relief provisions. Among these are the 62-percent ceiling, the more adequate growth formula, the election to use either the historical capital approach or the so-called asset approach provided in the House bill, the addition of the equivalent to section 722 (b) (4) of the World War II law for corporations which made substantial changes in its capacity during the base period, the depressed industries relief provision, the use of borrowed capital in computing the invested capital credit and other provisions.

In calling the attention of the House to the fact that the conference report is a vindication and tribute to the fight by the Republican minority to improve H. R. 9827 as it was reported by the Ways and Means Committee, I do not by any stretch of the imagination intend to infer that the provisions of the conference report are entirely satisfactory. But it can now at least, be said that the Congress has assumed its responsibility for writing tax legislation and has not delegated this right and duty to others.

The House bill provided that the excess-profits tax could not be greater than an amount which when added to the normal and surtax equaled 67 percent of the corporation's surtax net income. The Senate amendment reduced the 67 percent to 60 percent and changed the application of the ceiling so that the amount of the tax could not exceed an amount equal to the excess of 60 percent of the excess-profits net income for the taxable year over the normal tax and surtaxes which would have been imposed for the taxable year if the tax base applicable to the normal tax and surtax were the amount of the excess-profits net income. The House conferees adopted the Senate amendment but substituted 62 percent for the 60 percent. I personally felt that the ceiling should have remained at 60 percent and that a lower ceiling should be provided for small corporations but the 62-percent ceiling is a compromise. Under the World War II tax the ceiling limited the combined rate of the corporate income tax and excess-profits tax to slightly more than 72 percent after the allowance for the postwar credit.

Among the worst defects of the House bill was the inadequate growth formula which was intended as a substitute for the growth formula used in the World War II law which permitted taxpayers to calculate their base-period credit by adding to the average income of the last half of the base period 50 percent of the difference between the average income of the first and second halves of the base period, subject to certain limitations. The conference agreement has remedied the House provision by providing for two general sets of qualifications. One test is applicable to taxpayers whose total assets at the beginning of the base period are not more than $20,000,000, and if the corporation's total payroll for the last half of its base period is 130 percent or more of its total payroll for the first half of its base period, or its gross receipts during the last half of its base period is 150 percent or more of its gross receipts for the first half of its base period. In the case of corporations which do not have total assets of not more than $20,000,000 the following requirements must be met:

First. The taxpayer's net sales for the period January 1 through June 30, 1950, when multiplied by 2 are 150 percent or more of its average net sales in the calendar years 1946 and 1947;

Second. Forty percent or more of the taxpayer's net sales for the calendar year 1950 are attributable to a product or class of products not generally available to the general public prior to January 1, 1946. For this purpose a product or class of products includes articles of which the product or class of products is a principal component and articles which are themselves a component of such product or class of products;

Third. The taxpayer's net sales attributable to such product or class of products in the calendar year 1946 are 5 percent or less than its net sales so attributable in 1949.

If corporations meet either of these two tests they may use an alternate average base period net income on the basis of—

First. Income in the years 1948 and 1949;

Second. Income in the year 1949; or

Third. One-half of the income in 1949 and 40 percent of the income in 1950.

I believe that the growth formula provided in the conference agreement will afford some measure of relief to the electronics and television industry which has experienced such a substantial growth period, unrelated to our military program, in 1950.

The conference report adopts with minor amendments the Senate amendment providing relief for depressed industries. It will be recalled that the Republican minority pointed out that, as it passed the House, H. R. 9827 would have had disastrous impact on a substantial portion of the aircraft-production industry. In adopting the Senate amendment on this point the House conferees followed the Republican recommendations for more adequate relief in this area.

In general taxpayers in depressed industries are permitted to use a substitute average base period net income computed by multiplying their average total assets during the base period by 80 percent of the depressed industry's average rate of return during the period 1938 through 1948.

Among the provisions which were not in the House bill but which are contained in the conference report is the election which the taxpayer is given to use either the asset approach or the historical capital approach similar to that provided in the World War II excess profits tax law. In general the major difference between the asset approach and the so-called historical capital approach is the treatment of deficits.

The Senate amendments permitted borrowed capital to be included in full in computing the credit for invested capital and in computing net additions to capital under the average-earnings basis. This differed from the House bill which provided for the increase in the invested capital credit by one-third of the interest payment and allowed the full deduction for the amount of interest paid. The conference agreement follows the Senate amendment but reduces the amount of borrowed capital to 75 percent but permits one-quarter of the interest payments to be deductible in the current tax year in computing the income subject to the excess-profits tax.

I have attempted to touch on only some of the high lights of the conference report to show that major improvements have been made over the bill as it passed the House. In conclusion I want to particularly call the attention of the House to the fact that the conference report provides for a termination date for the excess-profits tax. The Senate amendments provided a termination date with respect to the taxable years beginning after January 1, 1953, and the House conferees agreed to terminate this tax for taxable years beginning after June 30, 1953. This is a most meritorious provision because it assures all the taxpayers which are subject to this tax that the Congress will review the law not later than 1953.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, during the debate in the House of Representatives on the original consideration of H. R. 9827, the Excess Profits Tax Act of 1950, I discussed quite fully the impact of the proposed legislation on certain industries of especial importance to our national defense, particularly airline operation, aircraft production, and strategic and critical mineral-mining industries. Quite naturally I followed the action in the other body and by the committee on conference on the provisions of the proposed legislation directly affecting those industries. I commend the Senate Committee on Finance and the Senate and the committee on conference for greatly improving the provisions affecting those particular industries.

The exemption of airmail compensation and the increase from 5 percent to 7 percent of profit allowed to the airline industry are changes of tremendous importance to that industry. Also liberalizing the provisions applicable to industries having low earnings during the base period is of great importance to the aircraft production industry. I call your attention particularly to amendment 143.

The need for further amendment to this legislation may arise from time to time and from the above changes made in this bill I feel confident that Congress will give such further changes timely consideration whenever situations may arise calling for additional legislation affecting these industries.

This tax bill is of definite aid in another all-important program which I have previously called to the attention of the House, namely the exploration, development, and encouragement of production of the metals and minerals needed for our defense.

We have far from an adequate supply of strategic minerals in this country, and this bill recognizes that the mining of these strategic minerals should be given all possible encouragement and that those who are willing to undertake the great risks of developing production during this emergency should not be subjected to an excess-profits tax on such production although they will, of course, be subject to the regular income tax. It also permits the defense mineral authorities in their judgment to certify additional strategic minerals besides those specifically named in the bill.

A further provision, under which critical minerals could be certified for excess-profits-tax exemption in the case of new mines, shut-down mines, or submarginal mines was omitted in the final bill, although certain other provisions introduced in the Senate and accepted by the conferees partially cover this situation.

In the case of mines which are called on to deplete their resources more rapidly to meet the emergency, a reasonable, normal unit of production should be allowed free from excess-profits tax. This principle was originally recognized in section 735 of the World War II law. That section, however, was so hemmed in with limitations and technicalities that it was far from adequate to accomplish its purpose of encouraging added mineral production. The bill now before us improves this section in certain respects. It extends to all metal mines a provision which was previously applicable only to coal and iron mines, under which one-half of the unit net income on production in excess of the average base-period production is excluded from excess-profits net income. As to mines which were not in operation during the base period, the bill excludes one-third of the net income from excess-profits tax and again makes this applicable to all metal mines as well as to coal and iron mines. A metal mine which operated at an overall loss during the base period is considered not to have been in operation during the base period and is hence entitled to the benefit of this provision. A mine which operated during the base period with some profit, including mines which may have operated at a very low or inadequate rate of return, would come under the general provision previously cited, under which one-half of their unit income on their increased production could be excluded from the tax.

A further provision for which I wish to compliment our colleagues in the other chamber and the committee on conference is one that will aid the defense minerals authorities in any programs of Government aid to exploration, development, and mining that the defense minerals authorities may undertake under the requirements of the Defense Production Act of 1950. This is a provision under which Government grants or the forgiveness of Government loans made for exploration, development, and mining purposes and expended in accordance with Government instructions shall not be considered as taxable income. I am informed by the Defense Minerals Administration that without such a provision the defense minerals officials would be powerless to carry out the job with which they have been charged. It would obviously be ridiculous to furnish a mining enterprise with $100,000 of Government funds for a vitally necessary development project and then to require that 47 or 77 percent of that $100,000 be taken in taxes. There are certain technical aspects of this provision as to which I am not clear, but it recognizes a principle which is highly important to the success of our minerals program.

On the whole, Mr. Speaker, I feel that this bill will give a measure of aid toward the production of the vital mineral resources which are the foundation of our defense production. While I have not had an opportunity to study it fully, I do know that there were further provisions which we have advocated and which we have felt were highly important in order to remove tax barriers that are holding back this vitally needed exploration and development. If on further study it appears that additional provisions are required, and I am inclined to think that this will be the case, I am sure that the Congress will wish to take promptly the necessary action in order that our defense program may not be impeded at the very time these strategic and critical materials are most urgently needed.

Mr. ALLEN of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALLEN of California. Mr. Speaker, when H. R. 9827 was sent back to the House from the other body, it included Senate amendment No. 205 providing for the treatment to be accorded deposits made under section 511, or 607 of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936. Subsequently in conference the Senate receded. I believe however, that it was understood that the matter would be given further study. The time available being too short to permit such a study to be made during this session of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, the careful study and early appropriate action of the Congress on this subject is highly desirable in order that the maritime industry, so necessary to national defense in times of emergency, should be dealt with fairly and assisted in keeping itself in a healthy condition in accordance with the established policies of the Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

The consent of the Congress shall be granted to each such compact, upon the expiration of the first period of sixty calendar days of continuous session of the Congress following the date on which the compact is transmitted to it; but only if, between the date of transmittal and expiration of such sixty-day period, there has not been passed a concurrent resolution stating in substance that the Congress does not approve the compact: Provided, That nothing in this subsection shall be construed as preventing Congress from withdrawing at any time its consent to any such compact;

"(h) procure by condemnation or otherwise, construct, lease, transport, store, maintain, renovate or distribute materials and facilities for civil defense, with the right to take immediate possession thereof: Provided, That facilities acquired by purchase, donation, or other means of transfer may be occupied, used, and improved for the purposes of this Act, prior to the approval of title by the Attorney General as required by section 355 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (40 U. Such contributions shall be made on such terms or conditions as the Administrator shall prescribe, including, but not limited to, the method of purchase, the quantity, quality, or specifications of the materials or facilities, and such other factors or care or treatment to assure the uniformity, availability, and good condition of such materials or facilities: Provided, That, except as otherwise provided in section 303 (d) of this Act, no contributions shall be made for State or local personnel and administrative expenses, or for items of personal equipment for State or local workers, or for the procurement of land: Provided further, That the amounts authorized to be contributed by the Administrator to each State for organizational equipment shall be equally matched by such State from any source it determines is consistent with its laws: Provided further, That financial contributions to the States for shelters and other protective facilities shall be determined by taking the amount of funds appropriated or available to the Administrator for such facilities in each fiscal year and apportioning same among the States in the ratio which the urban population of the critical target areas (as determined by the Administrator, after consultation with the Secretary of Defense) in each State, at the time of the determination, bears to the total urban population of the critical target areas of all of the States: Provided further, That the amounts authorized to be contributed by the Administrator to each State for such shelters and protective facilities shall be equally matched by such State from any source it determines is consistent with its laws and, if not matched within a reasonable time, the Administrator may reallocate same to other States on the formula outlined above: Provided further, That the value of any land contributed by any State or political subdivision thereof shall be excluded from the computation of the State share: Provided further, That the amounts paid to any State under this subsection shall be expended solely in carrying out the purposes set forth herein and in accordance with State civil defense programs or projects approved by the Administrator: Provided further, That the Administrator shall make no contribution toward the cost of any program or project for the procurement, construction, or leasing of any facility which (1) is intended for use, in whole or in part, for any purpose other than civil defense and (2) is of such kind that upon completion it will, in his judgment, be capable of producing sufficient revenue to provide reasonable assurance of the retirement or repayment of such cost, except that (subject to the foregoing provisos of this subsection) he may make contribution to any State toward that portion of the cost of the construction, reconstruction, or enlargement of any facility which he shall determine to be directly attributable to the incorporation in such facility of any feature of construction or design not necessary for the principal intended purpose thereof but which is, in his judgment, necessary for the use of such facility for civil defense purposes. Whenever the Administrator, after reasonable notice and opportunity for hearing the State, finds that there is a failure to expend funds in accordance with the terms and conditions governing the Federal contribution for such approved programs or projects, the Administrator shall notify such State that further payments will not be made to the State from appropriations under this Act or from funds otherwise available for the purposes of this Act (or in his discretion from appropriations under this Act or from funds otherwise available for the purposes of this Act for any approved program or project with respect to which there is such failure to comply) until he is satisfied that there will no longer be any such failure. Until he is so satisfied, the Administrator shall either withhold the payment of any financial contributions to such State, or limit payments to the program or project with respect to which there is substantial compliance with the terms and conditions governing the Federal contribution for such program or project: Provided, That the Administrator shall report not less often than quarterly to the Congress all contributions made pursuant to this subsection.

"SEC. 203. The Administrator shall give all practicable assistance to States in arranging, through the Department of State, mutual civil defense aid between the States and neighboring countries.

"IDENTITY INSIGNIA

"SEC. 204. The Administrator may prescribe insignia, arm bands, and other distinctive articles (including designs previously covered under Letters Patent which were assigned to the United States and held by the Office of Civilian Defense created by Executive Order Numbered 8757 issued May 20, 1941) which may be manufactured for or possessed or worn by persons engaged in civil defense activities pursuant to rules and regulations for the manufacture, possession, or wearing thereof established by the Administrator. The manufacture, possession, or wearing of any such insignia, arm band, or other distinctive article otherwise than in accordance with such rules and regulations shall be unlawful and shall subject such person to a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment of not more than one year, or both.

"TITLE III—EMERGENCY AUTHORITY

"NATIONAL EMERGENCY FOR CIVIL DEFENSE PURPOSES

"SEC. 301. The provisions of this title shall be operative only during the existence of a State of civil defense emergency (referred to hereinafter in this title as "emergency"). The existence of such emergency may be proclaimed by the President or by concurrent resolution of the Congress if the President in such proclamation, or the Congress in such resolution, finds that an attack upon the United States has occurred or is anticipated and that the national safety therefor requires an invocation of the provisions of this title. Such emergency also shall exist with respect to any designated geographic area or areas of the United States when the President determines that any such attack has been made upon or is anticipated within such area or areas, and directs the Administrator to proceed pursuant to the provisions of this title with respect to such area or areas. Any such emergency shall terminate upon the proclamation of the termination thereof by the President, or the passage by the Congress of a concurrent resolution terminating such emergency.

"UTILIZATION OF FEDERAL DEPARTMENTS AND AGENCIES

"SEC. 302. During the period of such emergency, under such terms and conditions as to donation, compensation, or return as may be prescribed, and solely for civil defense purposes, the President may direct, after taking into consideration the military requirements of the Department of Defense, any Federal department or agency to provide, and such departments and agencies are hereby authorized to provide—

"(a) their personnel, materials, and facilities to the Administrator for the aid of the States;

"(b) emergency shelter by construction or otherwise; and

"(c) on public or private lands, protective and other work essential for the preservation of life and property, for clearing debris and wreckage, and for making emergency repairs to, and temporary replacement of, communications, hospitals, utilities, transportation facilities, or public facilities of States or their political subdivisions damaged or destroyed by attack.

"EMERGENCY POWERS

"SEC. 303. During the period of such emergency, the Administrator is authorized to—

"(a) exercise the authority contained in section 201 (h) without regard to the limitation of any existing law, including the provisions of the Act of June 30, 1932, as amended (40 U. S. C. 278a), and section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (41 U. S. C. 5), and section 3734 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (40 U. S. C. 259 and 267), and the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, as amended;

"(b) sell, lease, lend, transfer, or deliver materials or perform services for civil defense purposes on such terms and conditions as the Administrator shall prescribe and without regard to the limitations of existing law: Provided, That any funds received from the sale or other disposition of materials or for services shall be deposited to the credit of appropriations currently available and made pursuant to this Act and shall be available for expenditure for the purposes of such appropriations;

"(c) coordinate and direct, for civil defense purposes, the relief activities of the various departments and agencies of the United States as provided in section 302 hereof;

As used in this subsection, the term 'employees' shall include full- or part-time paid, volunteer, auxiliary, and civil defense workers subject to the order or control of a State government or any political subdivision thereof, and such employees shall not be deemed by reason of such reimbursement to be employees or appointees of the United States;

"(e) provide financial assistance for the temporary relief or aid of any civilian injured or in want as the result of any attack; and

"(f) employ temporarily additional personnel without regard to the civil-service laws and to incur such obligations on behalf of the United States as may be required to meet the civil defense requirements of an attack or of and anticipated attack.

During the period of any such emergency, the Administrator shall transmit quarterly to the Congress a detailed report concerning all action taken pursuant to this section.

"IMMUNITY FROM SUIT

"SEC. 304. The Federal Government shall not be liable for any damage to property or for any death or personal injury occurring directly or indirectly as a result of the exercise or performance of, or failure to exercise or perform, any function or duty, by any Federal agency or employee of the Government, in carrying out the provisions of this title during the period of such emergency. Nothing contained in this section shall affect the right of any person to receive any benefit or compensation to which he might otherwise be entitled under the Federal Employees' Compensation Act, as amended (5 U. S. C. 751), or any other act of Congress providing for any pension or retirement.

"WAIVER OF ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEDURE ACT

"SEC. 305. During the period of such emergency, the functions and duties exercised under this act shall be excluded from the operation of the Administrative Procedure Act (60 Stat. 237), except as to the requirements of section 3 thereof.

"COMPENSATION FOR NONGOVERNMENTAL PROPERTY ACQUIRED

"SEC. 306. (a) Except in the case of property acquired pursuant to section 201 (h) of this act in conformity with the provisions of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, as amended, or through judicial proceedings for condemnation, the Administrator shall promply determine the amount of the compensation to be paid for any property (other than that of the Federal Government or any department or agency thereof) or the use thereof acquired pursuant to this act, but each such determination shall be made as of the time it is acquired in accordance with the provisions for just compensation in the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. If the person entitled to receive the amount so determined by the Administrator as just compensation is unwilling to accept the same as full and complete compensation for such property or the use thereof, he shall be paid promptly 75 per centum of such amount and shall be entitled to recover from the United States, in an action brought in the Court of Claims, or, without regard to whether the amount involved exceeds $10,000, in any district court of the United States, within 3 years after the date of the Administrator's award, such additional amount, if any, which, when added to the amount so paid to him, shall be just compensation.

"(b) Whenever the Administrator determines that any real property acquired by him is no longer needed for the purposes of this Act, he shall, if the original owner desires the return of the property and pays to the Administrator the fair value thereof, return such property to such owner. In the event the Administrator and the original owner do not agree as to the fair value of such property, the fair value shall be determined by three appraisers, one of whom shall be chosen by the Administrator, one by the original owner, and the third by the first two appraisers; the expenses of such determination shall be paid in equal shares by the Government and the original owner.

"(c) Whenever the need for the purposes of this Act of any personal property acquired under this Act shall terminate, the Administrator may dispose of such property on such terms and conditions as he shall deem appropriate, but to the extent feasible and practicable he shall give to the former owner of any property so disposed of an opportunity to reacquire it (1) at its then fair value as determined by the Administrator, or (2) if it is to be disposed of (otherwise than at a public sale of which he shall give reasonable notice) at less than such value, at the highest price any other person is willing to pay therefor: Provided, That this opportunity to reacquire need not be given in the case of fungibles or items having a fair value of less than $1,000.

"TERMINATION

"SEC. 307. The provisions of this title shall terminate on June 30, 1954, or on such earlier date as may be prescribed by concurrent resolution of the Congress.

"TITLE IV—GENERAL PROVISIONS

"ADMINISTRATIVE AUTHORITY

"SEC. 401. For the purpose of carrying out his powers and duties under this Act, the Administrator is authorized to—

"(a) employ civilian personnel for duty in the United States, including the District of Columbia, or elsewhere, subject to the civil-service laws, and to fix the compensation of such personnel in accordance with the Classification Act of 1949, as amended; and subject to the standards and procedures of that Act, to place not more than twenty-two positions in grades 16, 17, and 18 of the General Schedule established by that Act, and any such positions shall be additional to the number authorized by section 505 of that Act; and, notwithstanding the provisions of any other law, except those imposing restrictions upon dual compensation, employ, in a civilian capacity, with the approval of the President, not to exceed twenty-five retired personnel of the armed services on a full- or part-time basis without loss or reduction of or prejudice to their retired status;

"(b) employ not more than one hundred such part-time or temporary advisory personnel (including not to exceed twenty-five subjects of the United Kingdom and the Dominion of Canada) as are deemed necessary in carrying out the provisions of this Act. Persons holding other offices or positions under the United States for which they receive compensation, while serving as members of such committees, shall receive no additional compensation for such service. Other members of such committees and other part-time or temporary advisory personnel so employed may serve without compensation or may receive compensation at a rate not to exceed $50 for each day of service, as determined by the Administrator;

"(c) utilize the services of Federal agencies and, with the consent of any State or local government, accept and utilize the services of State and local civil agencies; establish and utilize such regional and other offices as may be necessary; utilize such voluntary and uncompensated services by individuals or organizations as may from time to time be needed; and authorize the States to establish and organize such individuals and organizations into units to be known collectively as the United States Civil Defense Corps: Provided, That the members of such corps shall not be deemed by reason of such membership to be appointees or employees of the United States;

"(d) notwithstanding any other provisions of law, accept gifts of supplies, equipment, and facilities; and utilize or distribute same for civil defense purposes in accordance with the provisions of this Act;

"(e) reimburse any Federal agency for any of its expenditures or for compensation of its personnel and utilization or consumption of its materials and facilities under this Act to the extent funds are available;

"(f) purchase such printing, binding, and blank-book work from public, commercial, or private printing establishments or binderies as he may deem necessary upon orders placed by the Public Printer or upon waivers issued in accordance with section 12 of the Printing Act approved January 12, 1895, as amended; and

"(g) prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper to carry out any of the provisions of this Act, and, without being relieved of his responsibility therefor, perform any of the powers and duties vested in him through or with the aid of such officials of the Administration as he may designate.

"EXEMPTION FROM CERTAIN PROHIBITIONS

"SEC. 402. The authority granted in subsections 401 (b) and (c) shall be exercised in accordance with regulations of the President who may also provide by regulation for the exemption of persons employed or whose services are utilized under the authority of said subsections from the operation of sections 281, 283, 284, 434, and 1914 of title 18 of the United States Code and section 190 of the Revised Statutes (5 U. S. C. 99).

"SECURITY REGULATIONS

"SEC. 403. (a) The Administrator shall establish such security requirements and safeguards, including restrictions with respect to access to information and property as he deems necessary. No employee of the Administration shall be permitted to have access to information or property with respect to which access restrictions have been established under this section, until it shall have been determined that no information is contained in the files of the Federal Bureau of Investigation or any other investigative agency of the Government indicating that such employee is of questionable loyalty or reliability for security purposes, or if any such information is so disclosed, until the Federal Bureau of Investigation shall have conducted a full field investigation concerning such person and a report thereon shall have been evaluated in writing by the Administrator. No such employee shall occupy any position determined by the Administrator to be of critical importance from the standpoint of national security until a full field investigation concerning such employee shall have been conducted by the Civil Service Commission and a report thereon shall have been evaluated in writing by the Administrator. In the event such full field investigation by the Civil Service Commission develops any data reflecting that such applicant for a position of critical importance is of questionable loyalty or reliability for security purposes, or if the Administrator for any other reason shall deem it to be advisable, such investigation shall be discontinued and a report thereon shall be referred to the Administrator for his evaluation in writing. Thereafter the Administrator may refer the matter to the Federal Bureau of Investigation for the conduct of a full field investigation by such Bureau. The result of such latter investigation by such Bureau shall be furnished to the Administrator for his action.

"(b) Each Federal employee of the Administration, except the subjects of the United Kingdom and the Dominion of Canada specified in section 401 (b) of this Act, shall execute the loyalty oath or appointment affidavits prescribed by the Civil Service Commission. Each person other than a Federal employee who is appointed to serve in a State or local organization for civil defense shall before entering upon his duties, take an oath in writing before a person authorized to administer oaths, which oath shall be substantially as follows:

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9798) to authorize a Federal civil defense program, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

LEGISLATION IN CONFERENCE

On December 20, 1950, the House of Representatives passed H. R. 9798, which was a bill to authorize a Federal civil defense program, and for other purposes. On December 22, 1950, the Senate considered the House bill and amended it by striking all after the enacting clause and inserted the language of the companion bill in the Senate.

As a result of the foregoing action on the part of the Senate, a number of differences between the Senate language and the House language resulted. The greater majority of these, however, were technical in nature, such as correction of typographical mistakes, clarification of language, and other similar type corrections. The following are the instances in which the Senate language differed in substance from the language of the House bill:

1. The Senate amendment provided that the Deputy Administrator be appointed from civilian life. The House bill did not provide for this limitation on the Deputy Administrator, but did on the Administrator. It was agreed in conference that the Deputy Administrator should have the same qualifications as the Administrator and to be consistent, if the bill required the Administrator to be appointed from civilian life, the Deputy Administrator should likewise be so appointed. The House recedes.

2. The Senate amendment provided for a Civil Defense Advisory Council which would advise and consult with the Administrator with respect to general or basic policy matters relating to civil defense. The Council would consist of the Administrator and 12 additional members to be appointed by the President, and he would be required to appoint three members who would be representatives of the State governments, three of the political subdivisions, and the remaining members to be selected among experienced citizens of the United States. The Council of State Governments, Governors Conference, American Municipal Association, and the United States Conference of Mayors would submit panels to the President and the representatives of the States and the political subdivisions thereof appointed by the President would be selected from these panels. The Council would meet at least once each year and at such other times as the Administrator would determine.

It was pointed out in conference that since the States and political subdivisions were required to match Federal funds for shelters and organizational equipment, they should have some voice, in an advisory capacity, in the administration of the program. The House conferees agreed that this provision of the Senate amendment was worth while as it would bring into a closer working relationship the Federal Government and the States and the political subdivisions. The House recedes with an amendment.

3. Both the House bill and the Senate amendment provided for training programs to be administered by the Administrator. However, the House bill had two provisos which limited the number of schools to one national civil defense college and three civil defense technical training schools, and a further proviso that no land could be acquired nor buildings constructed for training purposes. The Senate amendment had no such restrictions. The Senate conferees agreed that the restrictions upon the Administrator concerning the training program were worth while and should be included in the act. The Senate recedes with an amendment.

4. Both the House bill and the Senate amendment contained a provision by which the Administrator would assist and encourage the States to negotiate and enter into interstate civil defense compacts. The House bill contained a provision whereby consent was given in advance by the Congress to such compacts. The Senate amendment provided that such compacts would be transmitted promptly to the Congress and the approval of the Congress would be considered granted upon the expiration of 60 days following the date on which the compact had been transmitted to it. The provisions of the Senate amendment would give the Congress an opportunity to check each compact as it was made, and the House conferees agreed that the provisions of the Senate amendment should be included in the act. The conferees agreed that a proviso should be written in whereby the provisions of the section could not be construed as preventing Congress from withdrawing at any time its consent to any compact. The House recedes with an amendment.

5. Both the House bill and the Senate amendment provided authority for the Administrator to procure, construct, lease, transport, etc., materials and facilities for civil defense. This was a broad provision and the conferees agreed that although a proviso required the Administrator to report to the Congress all property acquisitions made, a further limitation should be inserted which would prohibit the Administrator from acquiring any land, or any interest therein, after January 1, 1952, unless specifically authorized by Congress. The House receded from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agreed to the same with an amendment to which the Senate agreed.

A proviso was also included in the House bill which would require the Administrator to report in full detail to the Congress before entering into any transaction the value of which was $500,000 or more. The Senate amendment had no such provision. Inasmuch as the Senate amendment was further amended by limiting the time the Administrator could procure real estate, and further because he was required to report quarterly on property acquisitions, the additional report was not deemed to be necessary. The House recedes.

6. Both the House bill and the Senate amendment allowed the Administrator to make financial conditions to the States for shelters and set up a formula for such contributions, which included an apportionment of funds among the States in the ratio which the urban population of the critical target areas in each State bore to the total urban population of the critical target areas of all of the States. The House bill provided that the critical target areas would be determined by the Administrator. The Senate amendment added the words "after consultation with the Secretary of Defense." It was felt by the conferees that the Senate amendment was sound in that the Administrator should be required to obtain military advice when designating critical target areas. The House conferees therefore agreed to the additional language in the Senate amendment. The House recedes.

7. The House bill contained a provision whereby the Administrator was prohibited from approving any Federal contribution to a project which was self-liquidating. The provision established a self-liquidating project as one where the retirement or repayment of the construction cost could be accomplished within a period of 50 years. The Senate amendment had no prohibition against Federal contributions to self-liquidating projects. The conferees were in agreement that some prohibition was necessary but that the language in the House bill was too limiting and unwieldy. The conferees then agreed upon language which would prohibit Federal contributions to self-liquidating projects, with the exception that contributions could be made to both existing facilities and projects to be constructed, provided that such contribution went only to that portion of the renovation or construction which was being made for civil defense purposes. The conferees agreed that the principle of making no Federal contributions to self-liquidating projects should be maintained, but it was recognized that some contributions would be necessary for renovating existing facilities so that they could be used for shelters, and that future construction, in some instances, would have to be strengthened in order that the construction could serve as a bomb shelter. The Senate recedes with an amendment.

8. The House bill and the Senate amendment made it unlawful to manufacture, possess, or wear any insignia or other distinctive article prescribed by the Administrator other than in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by him. The Senate amendment was identical with the exception that the penalties in the House bill were a $1,000 fine or imprisonment of 1 year, while in the Senate amendment the penalties were a $250 fine or 6 months imprisonment. The conferees agreed that firm penalties would be needed for violations of this type and the House language was therefore agreed to. The Senate recedes.

9. Both the House bill and the Senate amendment contained a provision which set forth how an emergency for civil defense purposes would be declared. The House bill had a simple method by which the President would proclaim a national emergency in the event of an attack or in anticipation of imminent enemy attack. On the other hand, the Senate amendment spelled out the method of declaring an emergency to a greater degree and, in addition, allowed for an emergency to be declared by a concurrent resolution of the Congress. In addition, the Senate amendment provided that a localized emergency could be declared. The House conferees agreed that this provision was necessary, for if an attack were made or anticipated on the island of Guam, an emergency for civil defense purposes could be declared for that United States possession without setting off the entire emergency powers of the Administrator, which would have been necessary under the House bill provisions. The language of the Senate amendment was rewritten slightly for clarity. The House recedes with an amendment.

10. Both the House bill and the Senate amendment provided that the Administrator, under his emergency powers, may sell, lease, lend, transfer, or deliver materials for civil defense purposes. However, the Senate amendment provided that the funds received from the sale should be deposited to the credit of appropriations currently available and made pursuant to the act and should be available for expenditure for the purposes of such appropriations. The House bill did not include such a provision and any funds received from the sale of materials would have gone into the miscellaneous receipts of the Treasury. The House conferees agreed that during an emergency the funds received from such sales should properly be made immediately available to the Administrator for other purposes consistent with the act so that there might be no delay or hampering of the Administrator in case of an extreme emergency. The House recedes.

11. The House bill contained a provision concerning immunity from suit so that during periods of emergency neither the Federal Government nor any officer or employee thereof, while complying with the provisions of the act, would be liable to any suit. This was placed in the bill in order that employees of the Civil Defense Administration or the Federal Government would not be harassed with lawsuits arising from the performance of their duties in the civil defense program. The original Senate bill had a companion provision which was stricken from the bill on the Floor of the Senate. In conference it was agreed between the conferees that the right to sue the Federal Government could be waived, but it was questionable whether an immunity from suit against the individual could be maintained. The conferees agreed therefore to exempt the Federal Government from liability but to not attempt to set down provisions concerning the right of an individual to sue another individual. The Senate recedes and accepts the House amendment.

12. The Senate amendment contained a provision regarding compensation for nongovernmental property acquired by the Administrator. This subsection would insure fair and just compensation to the property owner for property requisitioned under the emergency title of the act. The House bill was silent on this provision and the House conferees agreed that it was a protection for individual property owners and should be incorporated in the act. The House recedes.

13. The House bill contained a provision terminating the act on June 30, 1954, or after the date of the passage of a concurrent resolution by the Congress. The Senate amendment contained no such provision. Inasmuch as the Civil Defense Administration is being set up as a permanent governmental agency, the conferees agreed that the entire act should not be terminated as specified in the House bill, but that the emergency powers should be terminated at a specified date. Therefore, a provision was inserted under the emergency title of the bill that those provisions would terminate on June 30, 1954, or on such earlier date as may be prescribed by concurrent resolution of the Congress. The Senate recedes with an amendment.

14. Both the House bill and the Senate amendment contained provisions which would authorize the employment of consultants and advisory personnel at a compensation of $50 per diem. The House bill did not specify a limitation on the number of such experts or consultants which could be hired. The Senate amendment limited the number to 100. The House conferees agreed there should be a limitation on the hiring of such high-salaried personnel. The House recedes with an amendment. The House bill allowed compensation of $50 with no per diem per day for such personnel whereas the Senate amendment allowed $15 per diem in lieu of subsistence and other expenses while so employed. The Senate conferees agreed that $50 per day was sufficient and the $15 per diem in lieu of subsistence was stricken. The Senate recedes.

15. Both the House bill and the Senate amendment contained provisions concerning the investigation of applicants for positions with the Civil Defense Administration. The House bill would have required a complete field examination by the Federal Bureau of Investigation of any person to be employed who was determined by the Administrator to be of critical importance. The Senate amendment allowed such field investigations to be made by the Civil Service Commission and the investigations would not be referred to the Federal Bureau of Investigation unless the field investigation by the Civil Service Commission developed any data reflecting that the applicant was of questionable loyalty or liability. The House conferees agreed that the Federal Bureau of Investigation should not be given more of a load of investigations than they can properly conduct, and it was felt that so long as an investigation was made by the Civil Service Commission and the Federal Bureau of Investigation was called in if it were found that an applicant was of questionable loyalty or a liability for security purposes, the investigation so made would be adequate. The House recedes with an amendment.

16. The Senate amendment contained a provision which would authorize the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, in order to aid in carrying out the purposes of the program, to purchase securities or make loans for the purpose of aiding in financing projects of civil defense purposes. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation could make such loans only upon certification by the Administrator that the projects were for civil defense purposes and the maturity of such loans would not exceed 50 years. The total amount of loans outstanding at any one time could never exceed $250,000,000. Inasmuch as the Senate and House conferees had agreed on a provision of the act which limited the authority of the Administrator to make contributions to the States and municipalities for self-liquidating projects, it was felt by the House conferees that the Senate amendments provision should be accepted in order that the municipalities would have a source of financial aid in assisting them in construction of facilities for civil defense purposes. The House recedes with an amendment.

CARL T. DURHAM,
MELVIN PRICE,
W. STERLING COLE,
Managers on the Part of the House.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the conference report on the bill (H. R. 9798) to authorize a Federal civil defense program, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Speaker, on December 20, the House passed H. R. 9798, a bill to authorize a Federal civil defense program, and for other purposes. The Senate considered the bill on December 22, and amended it by striking all after the enacting clause and inserted the language of the Senate bill. A conference was asked by the Senate and agreed to by the House and the conference has been held with agreement resulting on the part of the conferees. As a result of the Senate striking all after the enacting clause and inserting the provisions of its bill, several differences resulted. The majority of these, however, were technical in nature such as correction of typographical mistakes, clarification of language and other similar type corrections. There were some differences in substance which were resolved in conference.

Mr. Speaker, in order not to take too much time, I will refer only to the major differences in substance.

The Senate amendment had a provision for a Civil Defense Advisory Council consisting of the Administrator and 12 additional members who would be appointed by the President and he would be required to appoint three members who would be representatives of the State governments, three members who would be representatives of the political subdivisions, and the remaining members to be selected among experienced citizens of the United States. The Council of State Governments, Governors Conference, American Municipal Associations and the United States Conference of Mayors would submit panels to the President and the Representatives of the States and the political subdivisions thereof appointed by the President would be selected from these panels. The council would meet at least once a year and at such other times as the Administrator would determine. The House Conferees agreed to this provision for an advisory council because it was felt the States and their political subdivisions should have a voice—in an advisory capacity only—in the administration of this program. After all the States are expected to do a good deal of the civil defense program themselves and they are further expected to match Federal funds. It therefore seems only fair and just that they should have a voice in the program.

Both the House bill and the Senate amendment provided broad authority for the Administrator to procure, construct, lease, transport, et cetera, materials and facilities for civil defense. Because this provision was so broad the conferees agreed that the Administrator should be given this authority for only 1 year and the conferees therefore wrote a limitation of January 1, 1952, into the bill and thereafter no acquisition of any land could be made unless specifically authorized by the Congress.

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DURHAM. I yield to the gentlewoman from Ohio.

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio. I wanted to ask whether a responsible position was found in the National Advisory Committee for Women. Is there any provision in the bill regarding that?

Mr. DURHAM. There is nothing in the bill differentiating as between men and women.

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio. There is nothing to prevent their appointment?

Mr. DURHAM. Nothing at all.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DURHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BROOKS. I am not on the committee of conference, but I am deeply interested in some features of the bill; especially have I been interested in the provision regarding the underground projects to be constructed under the terms of the bill. Will the gentleman explain whether or not the self-liquidating feature was incorporated in the conference report?

Mr. DURHAM. Yes. I will come to that in just a moment. Another major point of difference in the House bill and the Senate amendment was the provision in the House bill which prohibited the Administrator from making contributions to self-liquidating projects. The Senate conferees agreed to the House provisions after the provision was rewritten to liberalize it to some extent. As the provision now appears in the conference report the Administrator may not make Federal contributions for self-liquidating projects except he may make contributions to facilities for that portion which would be for civilian defense purposes. Let me give you an example: Under the bill as agreed upon in conference, the Administrator could make a contribution on a matching basis to strengthen the basement of a large office building if it was determined by him that after such strengthening the basement of the building would be an adequate bomb shelter. Furthermore, if a new building is to be built and it is determined by the Administrator that the building could be used as a bomb shelter by adding certain strengthening features, he could make contributions for those strengthening features in order that the building when built would be suitable for a bomb shelter. The House conferees felt that this provision as rewritten was sound and the Senate conferees agreed.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DURHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman state again, briefly, what part the States will play and how the States will participate with the Federal Government in this undertaking?

Mr. DURHAM. On a 50–50 basis.

Mr. JENKINS. How will they participate from the standpoint of power and decision as to what shall be done? What authority will the States have?

Mr. DURHAM. It is all in the hands of the Administrator, of course, who will deal entirely with the Governors of the States.

Mr. JENKINS. In other words, it will go from the Chief Executive to the State executive; purely as an administrative matter.

Mr. DURHAM. Purely as an executive matter; that is correct.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DURHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. Will the Administrator for the Federal Government have the power to go just as far as he wants to go without coming back to the Congress to make reports from time to time as to the responsibility that the Federal Government would have?

Mr. DURHAM. No. Under the terms of the bill he has to report to the Congress just like any other administrator.

Mr. RICH. Suppose he would make commitments, must the Congress approve those commitments before work can proceed?

Mr. DURHAM. Not necessarily. The powers are rather broad. The gentleman understands there are two provisions of this bill, one relating to the preparation of civil defense and the other relating to the situation after the bombing has started. Under the latter provision, of course, the authority is pretty broad. It would necessarily have to be.

Mr. RICH. Then what is the limitation on the Administrator?

Mr. DURHAM. He does not have many limitations, after the bomb is dropped.

Mr. RICH. Then whoever the President sees fit to appoint, the sky is the limit?

Mr. DURHAM. I would say so, after the bomb is dropped, but not before the bomb is dropped, in making preparations for protection.

Mr. RICH. It seems pretty late to make provisions for protection, after the bomb is dropped.

Mr. DURHAM. Of course the committee recognized that fact. That is the reason we have to draft a measure very broad in scope and authority.

Mr. RICH. They are going ahead to try to look after certain cities particularly, or certain vulnerable spots, so that the people of this country will have protection long before any bomb might be dropped?

Mr. DURHAM. That is certainly what the bill is designed to do.

Mr. RICH. The gentleman believes that is a good bill?

Mr. DURHAM. I believe we have a bill that is workable, one that will offer defense to this country if properly executed and put into effect.

Mr. RICH. The reason I make that statement is that I have a lot of confidence in the gentleman from North Carolina, and his judgment goes a good way with me in trying to formulate these plans.

Mr. DURHAM. I thank the gentleman. I am certainly sorry he is leaving this body and wish for you many happy years.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DURHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SHORT. The estimated total cost of this bill is $3,100,000,000 for the next 3 years. That figure stands, does it not?

Mr. DURHAM. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. SHORT. The gentleman spoke about the matching of funds. As passed by the House, the bill provides for contributions of the States and the Federal Government on a 50–50 basis?

Mr. DURHAM. That is correct.

Mr. SHORT. According to the press which I read yesterday, the Federal Government is to make contributions of $1,670,000,000 while the States make contributions of $1,340,000,000.

Mr. DURHAM. I do not think anybody can work that out on an accurate figure yet.

Mr. SHORT. I simply wanted the gentleman to make a plain and clear statement for the benefit of the record, that is all.

There are really three parts to this bill.

Mr. DURHAM. That is correct.

Mr. SHORT. It is not only for preparation for atomic, bacteriological, radiological, or any other conceivable type of attack, the second phase is to take care of panic and destruction after the attack comes, and the third part of the bill is to rehabilitate and give relief to those who have suffered most.

Mr. DURHAM. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. SHORT. Under the provisions of the bill, the Administrator must of necessity, because it is a new and unexplored field, have great latitude and flexibility in his operations.

Mr. DURHAM. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DURHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ELSTON. I think it should be very clearly understood what change has been made in this provision with respect to commercial projects. Assuming a city wants to build an underground garage, when may the Administrator authorize the contribution?

Mr. DURHAM. The Senate amendment contained a provision whereby the Reconstruction Finance Corporation could make loans for civil-defense purposes, upon certification by the Administrator. The maturity of these loans would not exceed 50 years and the total amount of loans outstanding at any one time could never exceed $250,000,000. The House conferees agreed to this provision because we felt that since Federal contributions were not going to be made for self-liquidating projects and further because the States and municipalities must carry an equal share of the Federal defense program, some source of financial aid should be given to the municipalities. This aid could be in the form of loans and the regular regulations of the RFC could be used in making the loans, that is, it would have to be a good loan and the lender could not have obtained financing elsewhere.

Does that answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DURHAM. I yield.

Mr. ELSTON. I do not think that fully answers it. The very purpose of our amendment in committee was to prevent a lot of boondoggling and to prevent the construction of commercial projects under the guise of civilian defense.

Mr. DURHAM. We wrote a provision to protect it as far as we could so that it should not be used for self-liquidating projects unless it was specifically used for civil-defense purposes. A merchant could not use his basement for storage or something like that. It would of necessity be readly at all times for immediate occupation purposes.

Mr. ELSTON. It might be contended that the underground garage could be used for the protection of the civilian population and at the same time be filled with automobiles. Who is going to determine whether or not that project should be authorized?

Mr. DURHAM. That is entirely up to the RFC people. And I think in fairness to the Administrator, if he has any judgment he should say that it cannot be used for that purpose. If there are 6,000 automobiles there 24 hours a day it would not be good judgment to determine that it could be used for civilian defense purposes.

Mr. ELSTON. Then, as I understand it, the intention of the whole thing is that these funds shall not be used for any commercial project unless it can be shown that part of that project may be used exclusively for the protection of the civilian population.

Mr. DURHAM. That is correct. We tried to tie that down as tight as we could because we realize the danger of the abuse that might arise under this provision.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DURHAM. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Did the gentleman also say that it must be approved by the RFC as a lending agency?

Mr. DURHAM. That is correct.

Mr. CRAWFORD. So far as the gentleman's study goes, how long do you estimate it will be before the States qualify through their enabling acts? Would you say by the first of June of this year?

Mr. DURHAM. I believe at the present time there are 25 States that already have enabling acts and those that do not have legislatures meeting early this year. All the governors endorse this legislation, perhaps not entirely, but in principle—the municipal group and mayors' organization.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In other words, where a State has not qualified, no work can go ahead until it does qualify?

Mr. DURHAM. That is correct.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DURHAM. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. Are we correct in assuming this: The RFC provision means that the sole and single test contained in the bill is whether or not the particular facility is useful for civil defense. It does not make any difference what else it does or does not do, but the sole test is: Is it useful for civil defense?

Mr. DURHAM. That is correct.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the gentleman very much.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DURHAM. I yield.

Mr. RICH. Suppose some State does not wish to participate. The Administrator will have no authority to go into that State and do anything unless they do wish to participate, is that correct?

Mr. DURHAM. That is correct.

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DURHAM. I yield.

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio. What is the termination date of the act?

Mr. DURHAM. The House bill contained a provision terminating the act on June 30, 1954, or after the date of the passage of a concurrent resolution by the Congress. The Senate amendment contained no terminating provision. Inasmuch as the Civil Defense Administration is being set up as a permanent governmental agency, the conferees agreed that the entire act should not be terminated as specified in the House bill, but that the emergency powers only should be terminated at a specified date. Therefore, a provision was inserted under the emergency title of the bill that those provisions of the act would terminate on June 30, 1954, or on such earlier date as may be prescribed by concurrent resolution of the Congress. In this way even though the emergency authority was terminated a skeleton organization could be kept intact under the other provisions of the law. The conferees agreed that this was a sound way to legislate on this provision.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DURHAM. I yield.

Mr. CANFIELD. Suggestion has been made that there should be a congressional watchdog committee to follow through on this program. Does not the gentleman think there is real merit in that proposal?

Mr. DURHAM. The committee considered that somewhat late, and of course with the safeguards we wrote into the bill as we have it before us at the present time, it is not necessary to set up another watchdog committee in the opinion of the conferees.

Mr. CANFIELD. But consideration may be given to that problem later?

Mr. DURHAM. Yes, consideration may be given to that problem later.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DURHAM. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BROOKS. I would like to ask the gentleman further in reference to the matter of RFC loans. What is the procedure which will be available for making application for an RFC loan for an underground shelter?

Mr. DURHAM. They will proceed on the same basis as they would for any RFC loan. It would be handled through the State office and then through the office here in Washington.

Mr. BROOKS. Would it be handled through the State or the municipality?

Mr. DURHAM. It will be handled through the State government; not the municipality. The State government will make application to the Administrator of Civilian Defense.

Mr. BROOKS. It will go through the State authority to the Federal Administrator?

Mr. DURHAM. That is correct.

Mr. BROOKS. Then the operation of the underground shelter would be handled by the State or by the municipality?

Mr. DURHAM. It would be done by the municipality, of course, along with the State administrator and the Governor's office of that particular State.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DURHAM] that the statement may be read in lieu of the report?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDING TITLE II OF THE FIRST WAR POWERS ACT, 1941

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4266) to amend and extend title II of the First War Powers Act, 1941.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RICH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to know what this bill does.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, this bill permits changes to be made in certain contracts by the armed services. We sought to bring this legislation up by unanimous consent last week, as the gentleman will recall, and there was objection to so-called title I of the bill, involving a reshuffling of agencies. We have eliminated title I, and we limit the consideration to title II, affecting contracts.

The bill was passed by the Senate without any controversy. I have already discussed the matter with the gentlemen, leaders on the minority side, and they are all in accord that title II, referring to contracts, to which this bill is limited, should be passed.

Mr. RICH. What change does it make in the law from the present law, relative to contracts?

Mr. CELLER. For example, it permits contractors who are facing bankruptcy because of the high cost of commodities that go into armaments and Armed Forces procurements, to appeal to the armed services and procurement agencies for changes in the contracts, upping the prices so that supplies to the armed services can be continuous.

There is presently involved about $40,000,000, affecting some 46 Army contractors who now hold contracts which they cannot fulfill. They are making matériel which is urgently needed by the Armed Forces, and unless these contracts can be changed that supply will be cut off because those contractors presently face bankruptcy. If the Armed Forces must go to other sources for these same goods, they will pay much higher prices and there will be consequent delays. If these contractors are forced to the wall, the armed services in many instances may be permanently precluded from getting certain supplies. The source might be dried up.

Mr. RICH. When a man bids for a Government contract, is it not good sound business for him to take care of all the material that he needs to fulfill that contract? Why should anyone be so foolish as to go into a contract with the Government or any other person if he did not prepare himself to take care of his obligations? Why should the taxpayers bail out inefficiency whether in business or individuals?

Mr. CELLER. I think that statement would be sound; but we are facing an emergency, and it is very essential, highly essential to the Armed Forces to get the goods when they want them, not at a later date, because serious consequences and repercussions flow therefrom and we must give this relief to the Government; otherwise there will be serious difficulty.

Mr. RICH. I appreciate that, but it is nearly time that the Federal Government stopped bailing everybody out; it does not make any difference whether it is a businessman or who it may be. As long as this Government is going to take care of all the obligations practically of all the people in this country and all the nations of the world there is going to be the greatest calamity and catastrophe that has ever happened to this Nation. I warn the gentleman and I warn him today, on the first day of the new year 1951, that you have got to guard the very fundamental soundness of this Government and its cash position. As long as you are going to wreck it like you have been doing for the last 18 years you will see the greatest trouble any nation ever had. I do not believe in doing a lot of these unnecessary things that we have been doing. I think you ought to be very very careful in what you are doing, do only sound sensible business transactions.

Mr. CELLER. We have been very careful. The Judiciary Committee reported this bill unanimously, this section for the relief of contractors. It is not so much a bill for the relief of the contractors as it is a bill for the relief of the armed services.

Mr. RICH. The armed services is having to assume that burden because a lot of poor businessmen who are jumping on your neck for more money which they cannot get if you do not pass a lot of poor legislation. You have got to be mighty careful that you do not permit gross and reckless and needless expenditures.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. VINSON. The sum and substance of this bill is brought about by failure of having some price control; is not that correct?

Mr. CELLER. That may be one reason for it, but since we have not got price control something must be done along this line for the relief of the Government; the Government needs desperately this material that has been contracted for.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. RICH. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Are we operating under a reservation of objection by the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. RICH. I reserved the right to object.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. And the reservation is still pending?

Mr. RICH. That is right.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Then, Mr. Speaker, it occurs to me that the gentleman from Pensylvania is in control of the time and not the gentleman from New York.

Mr. RICH. That is correct.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield, yes. We have a bear by the tail; we ought to hold on to that bear.

Mr. HALLECK. Let me make just this statement under the reservation of objection by the gentleman from Pennsylvania: I call to the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] that the other day when it was attempted to call this matter up he will recall that I objected. The sole reason for my objection was that title I was included. I indicated at that time that title I would not be included in the action taken on the other body and stated very definitely that I had no objection at all to the enactment of title II. After that objection was entered by me I noticed in the press that the gentleman from New York, referring to that action on my part, was quoted as saying that the people with dear ones in Korea certainly would not be happy at the action I took. I realize that the gentleman may not have been quoted entirely correctly in the press but the quotation was in almost exactly the words I have used. But if the quotation were made, would not the gentleman agree with me that it would be highly unfair as against me because I sought to bring about the enactment of title II of the bill which so far as I could discover was the only part of the bill about which there was any urgency at all? Certainly to charge me with a lack of solicitude for the boys in Korea would be most unfair.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield for me to reply?

Mr. RICH. I yield.

Mr. CELLER. I would say to the distinguished whip on the other side that there was no intention to hurt the gentleman in any way. I know of no one in this body more patriotic than he. The remarks that were attributed to me concerned other matters than the matter to which the gentleman referred; I was referring also to certain objections that were made to certain of the policies of the administration. I assure the gentleman my remarks were not aimed at him.

Mr. HALLECK. I am glad to hear the gentleman make that explanation, because the way the piece was written the clear intent of it was that I was being taken to task by the gentleman from New York due to the fact I had objected to the enactment of title I without further consideraiton and hearings.

Mr. CELLER. May I say to the gentleman that he may have been right when he objected, because what the other body did was to follow the gentleman's suggestion. They objected to title 1 concerning the reshuffling of agencies. We have deemed discretion the better part of valor and we thought it would be best to agree to what the Senate has done and thus agree to what the gentleman wanted. We are asking support only of title I. That is what we are bringing in here this morning.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. REED of New York. I am interested in title II to see whether or not it brings any relief to the contractor who entered into a contract before the Korean War, in this instance for the building of nurses' quarters all around the country. This industry is in one of my cities, it employs a great many men. The industry entered into a contract with the Government without an escalator clause. The price of labor and the price of materials have gone up, also there is a scarcity of materials. Do they get any relief under title II?

Mr. CELLER. As I read the original wording of section 201 of the War Powers Act, relief would be accorded in the case the gentleman indicated.

Mr. REED of New York. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert a letter in the RECORD at this point bearing on the matter under consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

DECEMBER 19, 1950.

The Honorable DANIEL A. REED,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN REED: On May 11 of this year we submitted a bid on substantial quantities of furniture for Army nurses quarters throughout the country. This was a firm-priced bid with no escalator clause included.

In June we were awarded a contract for approximately $300,000 worth of this furniture which we are performing on and producing at the present time with deliveries commencing in October 1950 and continuing through April 1951.

At the time we submitted our bid, prices of labor and materials looked stable for the period of the next year in view of the fact that there has been very little fluctuation over the period of the past year to 18 months.

The onset of the Korean war skyrocketed both labor costs and materials and as a result we find ourselves in the position of having to complete a contract at costs of conservatively 15–20 percent higher than those at the time we bid. You can see how serious a loss this is to our firm.

For a number of years our firm has been a supplier of materials on General Services Administration's contracts which are fixed-price contracts of a year's duration under which various Government agencies place orders.

We find ourselves in the same position on these contracts as on the Army contracts, namely, that there was no provision in our costs to provide for unforeseen or uncontrolled price and wage increases.

If the writer remembers correctly, during the last war legislation was passed which offered some recourse to manufacturers who found themselves in the same predicament as we find ourselves in at the present time.

Can you advise us if there is any possibility of such legislation being enacted at the present time and if so, what our chances for recovery of any losses would be.

Very truly yours.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FULTON. I would also like to inquire of the gentleman from New York, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, about contracts that were entered into before the Korean War without an escalator clause. For example, I have in mind three young men who own the Diamond Metal Products Corp., which, during the current year, has been making mechanics' tool boxes for the Navy and Air Force under several contracts. In the midst of difficulties, which the company was experiencing in performing, Navy contracting personnel gave them general assurances of procuring necessary steel. These young men, relying on the assurance that steel would be so obtained, did not follow up other sources where they could then have gotten it themselves. They were held up for a period of several critical months without getting the steel. As a result, in the meantime, prices and costs all went up, and the contract performance is now threatened by the company's great financial difficulty. These being patriotic young fellows, they have tried to go ahead and are making as much effort as they can to fulfill their contracts although they were told that the General Accounting Office could not, under existing law, permit any relief. As they would otherwise be prevented from completing needed deliveries on such contracts because of increased costs, the Navy would be disposed to give them relief in order to keep this firm in defense production and avoid undue delays. May I ask the gentleman, When the question comes up of contracts like that, and the people are nevertheless doing a good job and trying to make deliveries under very detrimental circumstances, are they likewise intended to be taken care of by the favorable exercise of the discretion vested in the respective defense departments by this bill?

Mr. CELLER. If they have acted in good faith and if the conditions that brought about this situation were beyond their control they could be afforded relief.

Mr. FULTON. Who would afford the relief? Would it be the Navy Department in this case?

Mr. CELLER. Whatever department has jurisdiction over the particular contract. The gentleman said the Navy Department in this case?

Mr. FULTON. The Navy Department.

Mr. CELLER. They would have the authority.

Mr. FULTON. If it is divided between the Navy and the Air Force, and even though part of the contract is completed by delivery and payment prior to the enactment of this bill, there nevertheless would be relief accorded?

Mr. CELLER. I think so without peradventure of doubt.

Mr. FULTON. That is the intention of the Congress?

Mr. CELLER. That is the intent of the sponsors of this bill.

Mr. RICH. About 2 or 3 months ago the Congress passed a bill giving and granting the President of the United States authority to freeze everything so that prices could not go up?

Mr. CELLER. That is correct.

Mr. RICH. He has not done anything up to this time, has he?

Mr. CELLER. That is correct.

Mr. RICH. He has just simply laid down and did not try to stop prices from going higher, so that you gentlemen who voted to give him that authority now find out he did not accept this responsibility. I voted against that bill because I said then he would not do it. I find now I have been vindicated right here on the floor of the House because he did not do anything. I knew he would not do anything because he never has when it comes to freezing wages. He wants to freeze the manufacturers. Now the gentleman wants to help pull a lot of manufacturers out.

You have done so many crazy, foolish things in this "Eighty-worst" Congress that it is about time it ends, and it is going to end tomorrow or the next day, and the quicker the "Eighty-worst" Congress ends the better it will be for the country. I hope that the new Congress that comes in on the 3d at noon will do things entirely different than the "Eighty-worst" Congress did, because I think the Eighty-first is the worst that the country has ever had. I wish you would tell that to Mr. Truman. He should admit it.

Mr. CELLER. The gentleman has asked me a question. Of course, I cannot subscribe to all those observations.

Mr. RICH. The gentleman agreed that he did not do anything with the price control bill you passed several months ago.

Mr. CELLER. That is correct as far as invoking controls across the board.

Mr. RICH. I just added these other things to pay my compliments to the Chief Executive for his inability and his not doing anything.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SHORT. I trust that the Members will not lose sight of the forest because of the trees when we consider this particular piece of legislation. The big and the important thing to keep in mind is that several important contracts have been let. These contracts cannot be fulfilled in supplying the materials and weapons that are so sorely and directly needed at this particular moment, and unless we pass this legislation or something similar providing for negotiated contracts it will be next to impossible to accelerate our defense program, and I hope that the House will go along with it.

Mr. RICH. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Will it bring the boys back out of Korea and save them from being shot? If it does, why we ought to do everything we possibly can to get them out of there, because this Truman war that we have had in Korea is just about one of the worst things that ever happened to this country of ours. To this time over 40,000 catastrophes.

Mr. SHORT. I admit it is a very bad thing, but not being a Delphian oracle I cannot answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FULTON. Under this legislation, might I ask the gentleman from New York, is the discretion in the various Departments of Defense, such as the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force a broad discretion?

Mr. CELLER. It is.

Mr. FULTON. Responsibility and discretion for relief resting right in each of those Departments, and that discretion is not a narrow one?

Mr. CELLER. It is a broad discretion, and I do not see how you can make it otherwise under present conditions.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I should like to ask the gentleman from New York how he expects to save any money for the Government under this bill over what would happen if the contracts were canceled and the Government had to make new contracts.

Mr. CELLER. In some instances it might react to the disadvantage of the Government. If, for example, these contractors who are sought to be helped in this instance cannot supply the material, it might dry up a permanent source of supply. If they were pushed to bankruptcy it would cost the Government a substantial sum.

Mr. SHORT. It would cause delay, in addition.

Mr. CELLER. It would cause delay as well as embarrassment.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The gentleman said a while ago that if the Government had to make new contracts it would cost more money. In the same breath, practically, he said that the powers were desired so that the Government could modify existing contracts and agree to pay more to bail out the present contractors.

Mr. CELLER. That is only a seeming contradiction. If they had to search out a new source of supply they would have to pay not only the extra cost caused by new bids or new negotiations but the added cost brought about by the inflation.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, this bill may be brought in here under the kind of a situation where we are operating today as emergency legislation, but it certainly is not good legislation and it cannot be defended as deliberate legislation. For the act to be extended, it apparently would authorize the President to "authorize any department or agency of the Government exercising functions in connection with the national defense, in accordance with regulations prescribed by the President for the protection of the interests of the Government, to enter into contracts and into amendments or modifications of contracts heretofore or hereafter made and to make advance, progress, and other payments thereon, without regard to the provisions of law relating to the making, performance, amendment, or modification of contracts whenever he deems such action would facilitate the national defense."

In other words, you are here proposing to set up for the currently described national defense the same powers as we had in the First War Powers Act of 1941.

Mr. CELLER. That is correct, with this reservation, that if the gentleman will read further in the Senate bill he well find another provision that the powers granted shall last only for the duration of the emergency declared by the President in December.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. But it is not clear that that would limit contracts that would be amended, modified, or made between now and the 30th of June 1952.

Mr. CELLER. That is correct. Of course, we have to let the power reside somewhere. Somebody must have the power. Otherwise I do not see how you could get relief.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. This is particularly bad because at the present time you do not have a general statute of renegotiation applying to all defense contracts.

Mr. CELLER. Yes; and renegotiation would apply completely to all these contracts.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Renegotiation applies to the contracts that are made by the Army, Navy, and Air Force, but it does not apply under the existing statutes to contracts made by the Atomic Energy Commission or the Tennessee Valley Authority or agencies of government other than those within the Defense Establishment.

Mr. CELLER. With those exceptions the gentleman would say, I am sure, that renegotiation would be applicable all along the line.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I would say it is applicable to the funds of the Defense Establishment. I do not understand that it is applicable under our 1948 extension to other agencies of the Government, and other agencies of the Government are making contracts in connection with the national defense; for example, the Atomic Energy Commission and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The defense minerals administration and other similar agencies.

Mr. CELLER. For example, the Office of the Director of the Budget, a watchdog of our proceedings as far as finance is concerned, is very anxious to get this bill through.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Has Lindsay Warren, the Comptroller General, appeared before the committee and asked for its passage?

Mr. CELLER. No, he has not personally appeared, but we are informed, I repeat, the Bureau of the Budget and all defense agencies approve this bill.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I should like to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT] two questions, if I may. Did the gentleman state that this legislation was necessary in order to obtain material, munitions, or money for the men who are fighting?

Mr. SHORT. I should like to answer the gentleman by saying I agree wholeheartedly with the gentleman from South Dakota and the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I believe the gentleman from Michigan will agree with us that no one can defend this as good legislation, but we have been maneuvered into a bad and dangerous position. Perhaps I should not say "maneuvered," but we have floundered and blundered and bungled our way there due to the incompetency and stupidity of certain men in high places in Government; but we are there, in a very bad and dangerous position, and now is no time to argue how we got there. We are in a dangerous position, and we have to face the very ugly fact, a reality and not a theory. We need these munitions, that can be provided only by the contracts that have been entered into, but due to the enormous increase in the price of these materials, unless this legislation is passed it will be utterly impossible for the companies entering into these contracts to produce these vital and strategic instruments of war. That is my answer.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. The gentleman's answer is that this legislation is needed in order to obtain adequate material or munitions of war for the men who are fighting?

Mr. SHORT. More money is needed to meet the increased cost of raw materials in order to get the weapons of war. We must get them now—not later. Unless we vote it, you will not get them, I do not care what the price is. We are in a race against time.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. What I want to know is, if the President can send our men in there without authority, how come he cannot send the munitions of war with them?

Mr. SHORT. Oh, well, the gentleman can answer that question himself. No one can send the weapons until we make the weapons. We do not have them now.

Mr. RICH. If this legislation does not go through, are we liable to be responsible for the killing of one more American soldier in Korea?

Mr. SHORT. I think unless we pass this legislation we will be held more responsible for the loss of other men who sorely need these weapons of war which we do not yet have and which we will not get if there is further delay.

Mr. RICH. Then I will say this: While I and none of the other Members of Congress had any vote in sending the men to Korea, I am not going to be one to stop getting the material and supplies that are necessary to get them back home, and the quicker we get them out the better.

Mr. SHORT. I will not argue with the gentleman on that.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection. I do not object.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I believe this bill is in the interest of increasing war profiteering and the men in Korea are being used as an excuse for war profiteering. There is not a single word which safeguards the Government against being subjected to the worst kind of war profiteering. The discretion here is absolute. The sky is the limit. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am constrained to object.

Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Yes, but I will object anyway.

Mr. CELLER. May I state to the gentleman that the Congress has the power to review the situation. We have the power to make appropriations. In that sense we can negate what may have been done. There is a limitation here that the contract shall refer to materials supplied to the armed forces.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. It gives the department absolute discretion in the matter.

Mr. CELLER. It only applies during the emergency. The words "national defense" are used. I do not think the gentleman wants to do anything which would interfere with our national defense, would he?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I think the point here is that some people are going to come in and are going to get more money from the Government than they are entitled to, using the emergency as an excuse. Because of the lack of guarantees against that condition I am constrained to object.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. In connection with the statement made by the gentleman from New York, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARDY] is going to offer an amendment enabling the Comptroller General to inspect the books of these companies. It is an amendment which I very strongly favor and which I understand the committee will accept.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Then, Mr. Speaker, may we have the amendment read for the information of the House?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, for the information of the House, the Clerk will read the amendment which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARDY] intends to offer.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HARDY: On page 1, line 8, strike out the period and insert a semicolon and the following: "and such section 201 is further amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof a colon and the following:

"'Provided further, That all contracts entered into, amended, or modified pursuant to authority contained in this section shall include a clause to the effect that the Comptroller General of the United States or any of his duly authorized representatives shall have access to and the right to examine any pertinent books, documents, papers, and records of the contractor or any of his subcontractors engaged in the performance of and involving transactions related to such contracts or subcontracts.'"

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. It occurs to me that that does not go as far as it should. To say that the Comptroller General shall have the right to inspect the books and to look at them does not give him any powers. If the gentleman from Virginia would go further and provide that any contracts modified under the authority of this extension should be subject to the Renegotiation Act of 1948, then he would be getting somewhere, and it would be in line with what the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] assured me a few moments ago he wanted to see done.

Mr. HARDY. I think the gentleman is right, that we should go further. I have felt that way. However, in trying to get something that was workable, this was about as far as we could go and still have a workable bill.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. It would certainly be workable to say that any contract modified under authority of this act shall be subject to the provisions of the Renegotiation Act of 1948.

Mr. HARDY. The trouble is this: Under the contract termination bill and under the existing Contract Settlement Act of 1944, this is the only type of protection that we have.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. For whom?

Mr. HARDY. For the Congress to review or have any action taken to audit it. If we can get this far we can get action by the Comptroller General and a report to the Congress of what he then finds.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. All it means is that you are going to let the Comptroller General stand by and let the horse be stolen.

Mr. HARDY. We would certainly have this deterrent that we did not have under the other law. We are reenacting that was weak in this respect, and my purpose is to try to strengthen it so that we will at least get our foot in the door, and the Congress will have an opportunity to observe intimately just what takes place in these renegotiations. I would like to see the amendment provide greater control, but have been unable to work out stronger wording without burdening the bill in such a way that it would be unworkable by the Departments.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. May I say to my friend that I have just been informed, and my memory refreshed, that the Ways and Means Committee will give very early consideration to the whole question of renegotiation.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The trouble is that we have been told that before on some of the other emergency legislation that has been brought in, and unless we make that retroactive, with all the difficulties that arise when you attempt to enact legislation which is ex post facto, it would not go back to these contracts which are modified.

Mr. McCORMACK. I may say that I hesitatingly go along with this section. Some of us might be inclined to object for reasons other than those given by some of the others. There are 45 or 50 companies that face absolute bankruptcy unless something is done, and through no fault of their own. I would like to see the amendment go further in connection with the control by the Comptroller General's office. I can remember back in 1941, or thereabouts, when we passed a bill wiping away the preaudit of transportation charges. I served on the subcommittee of the Committee on Expenditures, of which our colleague, Mr. BENDER, was chairman, and I was satisfied that the Government paid at least $500,000,000 more to the railroads of the country than should have been paid if there had been a preaudit. The preaudit was eliminated. I voted at that time against eliminating the preaudit. Then there was a postaudit. Of course, the postaudit was incapable of being adequately carried on because there were very few traffic men in the country. They were in the service or the railroads had them. The General Accounting Office had all of this other work to do. We have looked this whole question over very carefully all along the line. I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] and the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE]. As far as the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARDY] is concerned, to those of you who are concerned about these 45 or 50 companies—and I have some general concern about them; no specific concern—as I understand, he has surveyed it and he thinks that is about as far as we can go and have the other body accept the amendment. Is that correct?

Mr. HARDY. That is correct.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I think every Member of this House will agree that the best guaranty against mulcting the Government and the people of these United States in using this emergency for war profiteering in this connection would be simply to add these words: "Subject to the approval of the Comptroller General."

What is wrong with that?

Mr. CELLER. Would you not have confusion? There would be endless delays.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Where would you have confusion? This language would provide a square deal for the American people against profiteering, and that is all.

Mr. CELLER. I understand that this amendment has been cleared by the gentleman who happens to be chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the other body, which committee handled this legislation. I am informed that the amendment will be acceptable to the other body. If we add to it other provisions we will just be walking around in circles. Time is of the essence. We are suitably going to revise the entire system of renegotiation. Time undoubtedly is of the essence in affording this relief, and if we are going to have many more amendments suggested to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia, we will get nowhere today—the day before adjournment. I hope the gentleman from New York will not press his request.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I hope the gentleman from New York will press his request for the addition to the amendment.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I will have to press it unless some action is taken which makes these operations subject to the approval of the Comptroller General.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I am sure the gentleman from New York will remember that after VE-day when we had up the bill to facilitate the liquidation of wartime contracts the Comptroller General ventured a word of warning to the Congress and suggested that that might cause us some trouble. We did not heed that warning and as a result when that legislation was passed and carried out the Comptroller General was able to point out later in many of the liquidated contracts advantage was taken of the Government. The Comptroller's remarks were far from complimentary. In this instance we can avoid that, especially if the gentleman from Virginia would agree to add to his amendment the language suggested by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CELLER. It is agreeable to me, though reluctantly, to have those words added, and I understand that it is agreeable to the gentleman who sponsored the amendment originally.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is a matter that should be given further consideration. The Chair may state that the Chair is going to recognize the gentleman from New York to suspend the rules, either later today or early tomorrow. For that reason the Chair thinks the gentleman ought to stand by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia until some further investigation is had.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws his request.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BECKWORTH].

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I have been waiting for 2 days to call up a rule. The matter that has been under consideration for the past half hour has been made the subject of a rule making it in order for consideration by the House, and I am wondering now if it is in order for me at this moment to call up the preferred resolution which is here from the Rules Committee for the consideration of the bill that has been brought under consideration by consent request.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Texas to make a privileged motion.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

TO AMEND THE RAILWAY LABOR ACT

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I call up from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 3295) to amend the Railway Labor Act and to authorize agreements providing for union membership and agreements for deductions from the wages of carriers' employees for certain purposes and under certain conditions, a bill substantially the same (H. R. 7789) being on the House Calendar.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia raises the question of consideration.

The question is, Will the House consider the bill?

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present, and I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred Members are present, not a quorum.

The roll call is automatic. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 286, nays 48, not voting 94, as follows:

The doors were opened.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House gave considerable attention to the legislation which is before this body today. As the Members know, the chairman of our committee, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER], has been in the hospital because of an eye operation; however, one of the fields in which he has worked most diligently as a Member of the House of Representatives for many years is in connection with railroad labor. When the bill was heard it was not heard by the Subcommittee on Transportation, of which I have the privilege to be chairman. The chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER], felt it expeditious to conduct the hearings himself, and all of the members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce were privileged to attend and many did attend from day to day. It certainly cannot be said that the bill is one that the entire membership of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce does not understand. I feel sure it is understood by the great majority of that committee, and certainly by many Members of the House.

One of the pieces of legislation that was considered most carefully in this body was the so-called Taft-Hartley bill. It is the contention of Senator TAFT, and I expect to read one of his statements about this legislation, that, to some extent at least, this particular measure simply carries into the provisions of the Railway Labor Act some of the provisions which already are in the Taft-Hartley law. I repeat, many of the Members, of course, know what the provisions of the Taft-Hartley law are in detail, and particularly with reference to the points covered in this bill.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BECKWORTH. Not at this time.

I was directed by the membership of our committee to bring this bill to the floor of the House when I could be recognized by the Speaker for that purpose. As a matter of fact, I shall read the motion which was passed in the committee, which directed me to bring this to the floor of the House.

The motion offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BIEMILLER] was this:

Mr. Chairman, I move that Mr. BECKWORTH be authorized and directed to call from the Speaker's table, under rule 24, Senate bill 3295, and ask for immediate consideration thereof by the House, a bill substantially the same, H. R. 7789 being on the House Calendar.

H. R. 7789 is today before the Rules Committee. It has not been reported by the Rules Committee that I know of. When that bill passed the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, it passed by a vote of 14 to 4. As is evidenced by the very fact that we have the bill here under the rule under which we do have it, the Senate has passed a very similar bill, a bill which was passed incidentally on December 11 by a voice vote.

Certainly the question of amendments is one that has been given consideration in the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and given consideration on the Senate floor. As a matter of fact, there were several amendments offered while we were considering the bill in the committee. Even after the bill was reported, some amendments were worked out which it was felt would cause the legislation to be more desirable. But the Senate bill substantially is the same bill as the bill which the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee reported.

As I said before, the Senate bill passed by a voice vote.

One of the amendments which was considered by our committee was the so-called States' rights amendment. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. ROGERS] offered that amendment. I voted for the amendment. I recall Representative HARRIS, of Arkansas, voted for the Rogers States' rights amendment.

The so-called FEPC amendment was offered in the committee. At times there has been great agitation for that amendment. I voted against the FEPC amendment, of course. There were several other amendments which were offered.

It has been pointed out, and I think rather accurately, that railroad labor historically has not been dealt with in exactly the same fashion as other types of labor in this country; and, of course, when we say railroad labor we refer also to labor that is employed by airlines, because airline employees do come under the Railway Labor Act. Railroads and airlines have been considered direct instrumentalities of interstate commerce. Employer and employee relationships in the railroad industry often independent of State laws have been the subject of Federal legislation for many years because of the direct effect of labor disputes in that industry upon the free flow of interstate commerce; I wish to invite your attention to some of these acts which I shall enumerate: The Railway Labor Act, the Railroad Retirement Act, the Railroad Employment Insurance Act, the Federal Employees Liability Act, the Hours of Service Act, and even other acts besides those I have enumerated.

I wish to emphasize again that historically railroad legislation has been dealt with in a different manner certainly in a number of instances to that which other labor in this country has been dealt with.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECKWORTH. I yield.

Mr. HARRIS. I asked the gentleman to yield merely for the purpose of asking a question. A great many Members here have been asking about the procedure and just what is before us for consideration at this time. The gentleman has very ably explained it to a point under this particular and unusual rule. Is it not a fact that the legislation now before the House for consideration is the Senate-passed bill which has been held by the Speaker to be substantially the same as the bill that has been reported by our committee and is now on the House Calendar?

Mr. BECKWORTH. The gentleman is exactly right.

Mr. HARRIS. And if the House passes this bill, then the bill becomes final, it is adopted, and there will be no conference at all; it will have passed both the House and the Senate?

Mr. BECKWORTH. The gentleman has stated the situation correctly.

Mr. HARRIS. For further clarification, is it not also true that the gentleman from Texas who has been recognized has 1 hour and that he is not permitted to yield for any purpose at all except debate, or he loses control of the legislation?

Mr. BECKWORTH. That is correct.

Mr. HARRIS. And is it not also true that no amendment will be offered to this bill at all for the House membership to pass on as we passed on in the committee? It is a legislative proposal to be voted up or down in the House.

Mr. BECKWORTH. That is true. As I pointed out, as a member of this committee, who in this instance is taking the place of our beloved chairman, I am simply following the rather formal instructions of the committee as is illustrated by the resolution I read a moment ago which was passed in our committee.

Mr. HARRIS. That was the other point I was going to mention for clarification of the situation, I may say to the gentleman; that by direction of the committee the gentleman called up the bill, was recognized, and is to have 1 hour of debate, and by direction of the committee is not to yield to anyone to offer an amendment.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Yes; in effect you have concisely stated the situation as it is.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eighty-five Members are present, not a quorum.

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 311 Members have answered to their names: a quorum is present.

Without objection, further proceedings under the call will be dispensed with.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House dispense with further proceedings under this call?

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

The question was taken; and the House agreed to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

TO AMEND THE RAILWAY LABOR ACT

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BECKWORTH] is recognized.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. BECKWORTH. Yes; I yield for a unanimous-consent request only.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD at that point following the debate of the gentleman from Texas.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. BECKWORTH. I yield only for a unanimous-consent request.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD and insert a telegram I received from General MacArthur thanking me for the Christmas message and prayers for the men at the front, in which he states he will do his best, no matter what happens.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to take much more time. Several members of the committee have requested time. Some of them have studied this legislation in detail and have worked diligently to perfect as much as possible the provisions of the bill. Suffice it to say that this bill does not make mandatory a union shop. It permits organizations representing the railroad men to work out and to bring about agreements with carriers providing for union shops, a principle enacted into law in the Taft-Hartley bill. Likewise, it permits agreements that would call for the check-off; this, too, is recognized in the Taft-Hartley bill. One of the important amendments that was agreed to requires that a given railroad worker must make assignment in behalf of the labor union to the company which is paying the worker.

Another important provision which changed the original bill is with reference to the fact that no person is required to be a member at any one time of more than one union. That was one of the purposes of one of the amendments which our committee acted on and favorably reported after the bill was originally reported out of our committee. Still another change which has been made is that fines and penalties will not be permitted to be checked off as assessments, and membership or initiation fees will be checked off if agreements are reached between carriers and railway labor organizations providing for such check-off of assessments, membership or initiation fees.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECKWORTH. Not at this time.

One of the members of our committee who worked most diligently on this legislation is a man who has served on the committee for many years. I regard him as one of the finest authorities we have respecting railroad labor legislation and at this point I propose to yield to the distinguished former chairman of our committee, now ranking minority member, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WOLVERTON], for debate only. I yield to Mr. WOLVERTON 18 minutes.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECKWORTH. Not at this time. I hope to yield later if I have time.

Mr. FISHER. There is a question about the bill I wish to ask the gentleman.

Mr. BECKWORTH. I have already yielded to the gentleman from New Jersey for debate, but I may say that before the debate is over I will undertake to yield to the gentleman from Texas for a question about the bill, but not at this time.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 18 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WOLVERTON].

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the bill which the House is now considering is the Senate, not the House, bill.

Whatever may be the situation on the Democratic side, copies of the Senate bill which we are now considering, which we will within the hour be asked to vote upon, are not available to the membership of the House.

Within the last few moments, I was able to obtain from the ranking Republican member on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce the loan—mark you, the loan for a few moments—of a copy of the Senate bill.

The report on the House bill which I have been asked by union officials to support is, especially on page 6, misleading and not in accord with the provisions of the Senate bill.

Labor, a national weekly newspaper published here in Washington, complains most bitterly of those of us who have wanted an opportunity for the consideration of, and an opportunity to debate, this proposed legislation for a union shop in connection with our transportation systems.

But those who have charge of this legislation have today, by their tactics, used methods which have stifled practically all debate in opposition to the bill. My remarks are carried here because, and only because, of a parliamentary maneuver I made—the securing of unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point.

As I recall, but 7 minutes were allocated to those who desired to explain the provisions of the bill.

This bill provides that certain transportation systems may, dealing with union representatives, impose the union shop upon all employees of those systems.

The only practical difference between the closed shop and the union shop is the 60 days reprieve which is given by the union job practice, during which an employee can either make up his mind to give up his job or surrender his independence to the union.

If transportation systems derived their revenue solely from union men, I could understand why union men should have all the jobs. As long as the public generally, union and nonunion men, pay for transportation, enable the transportation systems to function, I cannot see the justice of insisting that the transportation system and the unions, through their representatives, can deny employment to a man simply because he does not belong to the union.

Nor can I see the justice in permitting the company and the union to enter into an agreement—and that is what the Senate bill does—which provides that, in order to hold his job, the union man must have deducted from his pay check "the periodic dues, initiation fees, and assessments uniformly required as a condition of acquiring or retaining membership" in the union.

I voted for a somewhat similar, but not an identical, provision when I voted for the Taft-Hartley Act. I did not believe then, I do not now believe, in the principle of a union or closed shop, but, in order to get some degree of relief for employees, who were members of the union and for the public, I was forced, when voting for the Taft-Hartley Act, to accept that provision. I am in a somewhat similar position today. It is this bill or nothing.

My vote cast against the bill would be a futile protest against legislation which I do not believe should be put upon the books. I will, therefore, go along with the overwhelming majority of my colleagues, hoping that the railway unions, getting what they argue they must have in order to stop communism and wildcat strikes, will use the power given them wisely and justly, and not, as some of these organizations are today using it, to oppress, coerce, their own members.

The recent wildcat strike, which held up the delivery of mail; which prevented some men in service going home for a last visit with their families before being shipped abroad; which prevented other men who had enlisted or who had been drafted reaching their training camps at the designated time, was an exhibition of the misuse, in a disloyal way, of arbitrary power.

It is no answer for union officials to say that the strike was a wildcat strike, for it is apparent to the most casual observer that union officials did not make an honest, vigorous effort to either keep the men from walking out or to induce them to return.

Moreover, two Presidential fact-finding boards, so far as I have been able to learn, earnest and honest in their conclusions, failed to give the railway unions a demanded increase. Did those unions abide by the law of the land? They did not. A strike was called and, in the end, the President, yielding to political pressure, gave the unions increases, which they accepted. Now, according to the press, they intend to repudiate those agreements and are coming back to Washington for additional benefits.

Nor have I forgotten that a few years ago, at the time of another great emergency, when the national safety was involved, these railway unions called a strike. At that time, at the request of the President, the House by an overwhelming majority passed a bill to draft railway men into the Federal service. My vote was one of the very, very few which was not cast in favor of that legislation.

If the officials of the railway unions follow the policy which they have sometimes followed in the past, of insisting, even when the welfare of the people, the security of the Republic, is endangered, upon having their way, employees of transportation unions will, before world war III is over, be made subject to a draft, be assigned to work when and where and for a compensation determined by the Federal Government.

Members of Congress may fear the political power of the unions. Personally, I am more in fear, from a political standpoint, of the people who do not belong to these unions, whose sons, brothers, husbands, are being drafted to fight on foreign soil.

If there comes a strike which interferes with the war effort; if the unions demand for their members an increased wage which the people finally decide is out of all proportion to the service rendered, it is just possible that, once again, the people will make their wishes known to the Congressmen in such manner that there will be no hesitation on the part of the Congress in protecting the welfare of the people as a whole. It was that kind of an uprising which put through the Taft-Hartley bill.

There is one other piece of advice, unasked, I am giving to the railway unions. It is this: That they should quit levying political assessments or assessments for the benefit of some union officials and, through the use of this legislation now before us, force their members to meet those assessments—especially those for political purposes—as a condition of an opportunity to earn a livelihood.

What I mean by that statement you will gather from reading the following excerpts from a letter—and, by the way, it is not the only one which has come to me from transportation workers, who are members of the unions which are back of this bill, protesting the enactment of this legislation. The excerpts read as follows:

DEAR SIR: I note by the daily press the Senate recently passed and now has before the House a bill to authorize a union shop for the railroad employees. Please accept this as my opposition to such an act. Before the recent election I was a dues-paying union member, but withdrew when I found the leaders were using most of my dues ($28 per year) to oppose such outstanding men as the Honorable ROBERT TAFT.

In retaliation for my withdrawal this is what happened. Previously I have been allowed my vacation at a time agreeable somewhat to me and when my family could enjoy it. This year I could not have it during the summer months when my children were also on vacation from school. Instead it was given the first week of this month, which as you may know isn't a very enjoyable time for a vacation, especially with three children in school. Likewise for the coming year, I am dated for May 2, which will be about as convenient. All of these vacation dates are established by the union vacation committee and given to the superintendent for compliance.

Another point to be mentioned is the fact that heretofore, we did not have to take our vacation if we so desired. In that case we were paid for the vacation not used and in my case, is what I had planned on doing. However, the union chairman informed me the contract called for a vacation, and it must be taken when scheduled. I talked with our superintendent, and it was agreeable with him to defer the vacation until a later date or pay me for the time not used. However, such was not the case. The union (ORT) must impress these new men with their power to furnish them jobs and the only way to do this, is to force everyone to use his vacation time regardless of his liking.

No doubt this is old news to you, after you have held so many investigations respecting the union's powers. But I bring it to your attention as my protest against the union shop for the railroad employees.

Permit me also to answer the charge that some of us have been influenced by the railroad lobby. I have had no communications whatever from anyone connected with the management of our transportation system. I have had communications favoring this legislation from union officials.

Some of my colleagues may wonder why I am making these remarks. One answer is that I do not subscribe to the principle of the closed or union shop. I fear that the union shop will be followed by the closed union.

Why, then, will I vote for the bill? I will vote first to recommit the bill. Failing in that, I will, as stated, vote for it because any other course would be futile, and because I do not want the railway unions to say, even though it would not be true, that I refused to extend to their membership the opportunity for a union shop which was given to other employees by the Taft-Hartley Act.

This is but the third time in my 16 years of service here that I have supported legislation to which the beneficiaries were not, I thought, entitled, and which I thought might be unsound, but which would nevertheless have been overwhelmingly adopted without my vote.

The first such time was when I voted for the so-called Bretton Woods measure, when two of my Michigan colleagues overpersuaded me. The second was when I voted for the unification bill, and the last will be my vote on this bill which is before us today.

To my friends who are working on the railroads, may I say I am going along with you today; I hope the ride will not be too rough, and I hope you will so use the privilege granted as to avoid going full-speed into the dead end of a public sentiment which, once aroused because of injustice or unfairness or arbitrariness, causes the pendulum to swing too far in the other direction.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, before addressing myself to the legislation now before the House, I wish to congratulate the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BECKWORTH] on the splendid manner in which he has analyzed the provisions of the bill and explained the purpose and effect of the bill. It was sound, logical, and fair. I also wish to commend him for the fine spirit and great ability he has shown as acting chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in the consideration of the proposed legislation during the time our chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] has been incapacitated by illness.

The purpose of the bill now under consideration (S. 3295) is to amend the Railway Labor Act, approved May 20, 1926, so as to permit any carrier subject to that act and any labor organization duly designated and authorized to represent employees in accordance with the requirements of that act to make agreements, first, providing, subject to certain limitations, for the union shop. By this is meant a requirement that within 60 days after the beginning of employment, or the taking effect of the act, whichever is the later, employees of the carrier shall be members of the labor organization representing their craft or class; and, second, providing for the check-off. By this is meant a deduction by the carrier from the wages of the employees, and payment to the appropriate labor organization, of dues, initiation fees, or assessments which may be payable to the labor organization.

Under paragraphs 4 and 5, section 2, of the Railway Labor Act, carriers are prohibited from requiring any employee to join, refrain from joining, or remaining a member of any labor organization. The carrier is also prohibited from deducting from the wages of employees any dues, fees, assessments, or other contributions payable to labor organizations.

The effect of this bill would modify these provisions so as to make the union shop and check-off arrangements appropriate subjects of collective bargaining available to carriers and employee representatives subject to the Railway Labor Act. The bill will also similarly apply to common carriers by air and their employees.

As I see it, the matter before us is very simple. It is merely a question of whether the Congress desires to continue to deny to railway labor the right by collective bargaining with management to negotiate union-shop agreements when we have protected by the Taft-Hartley Act that right in all industries except those subject to the Railway Labor Act.

We are not being asked to impose compulsory union-shop conditions by statute. The bill before us merely permits the collective-bargaining process to operate in that field. It merely removes an existing statutory prohibition against the negotiation of union-shop agreements if the carrier and the representatives of its employees are able to reach a meeting of the minds.

I do not see how in justice and fairness we can continue to deny this right to the employees in our great railroad and airline industries and at the same time grant such rights to all others, as we do under the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act.

In the consideration of this legislation it should be borne in mind that the Railway Labor Act requires the labor organizations as the representatives of any craft or class of railroad or airline employees, to represent all of the members of the craft or class fairly and equitably and without regard to membership or nonmembership in a union. Benefits of collective bargaining may not be withheld from employees because they are not members of the union which represents them.

One of the compelling reasons that in my opinion justifies the union-shop provision grows out of the fact that under the act whatever benefits result from the collective bargaining of the employees' representatives is shared by all employees of the particular craft or class. The representative therefore actually represents all the employees of such craft or class whether they be members or not of the union. To me it seems simple justice to expect, and, if necessary, require all employees who stand to benefit from the collective bargaining to belong to the union that acts for them, and in their behalf. Otherwise, employees who did not belong to the union share equally with those who do belong, the same benefits, and, without assuming any of the responsibilities incident to membership. The mere statement of this fact seems to me to present an unanswerable argument in favor of what this bill seeks to do.

In further amplification of this viewpoint, if any is necessary, it should be understood that at the present time there are approximately 1,200,000 employees of our railroads. Of these between 75 and 80 percent are members of one or another of the railway labor unions. Thus 20 to 25 percent, who are not members of any union, are enabled to share in all benefits derived from union bargaining without bearing any part of the expense incident to obtaining such benefits. It is only fair to provide that benefits and responsibility should be jointly shared by all. This principle likewise justifies the check-off system as fulfillment of part of the responsibility or obligation due to membership in the union.

It is a matter of common knowledge that activities of labor organizations which result in the procurement of employees' benefits are costly. The only source of funds with which these labor organizations may carry on these activities is the dues received from members of the organization. I believe that it is essentially unfair for nonmembers to participate in the benefits of these activities without contributing anything to the cost. This is especially true when the collective-bargaining representative is one from whom the employee receives very important and substantial benefits and one which is obligated by law to extend these advantages to him.

Under the Taft-Hartley Act we have permitted union-shop agreements in industries where the collective-bargaining process is not nearly as complex and restricted as it is under the Railway Labor Act. In the railroad and airline industries, the provisions for mediation, arbitration, Presidential emergency boards and the National Railroad Adjustment Board, while very much in the public interest, are administrative processes which are very costly to the involved labor organizations.

It seems to me that the rights sought under this bill have an additional important significance. The employees in the railroad and airline industries, unlike those in most industries, frequently are scattered over hundreds, if not thousands, of miles of territory and are not concentrated in one locality. This obviously makes the problem of organization on a voluntary membership basis much more difficult to achieve than in those industries where the employment is localized. Furthermore, it must be kept in mind that under the Railway Labor Act, all crafts and classes are established by the National Mediation Board on a system-wide basis. Thus the railway unions may not carve out any group in a particular geographical location where its membership may be substantial and represent only those who contribute to the collective bargaining expense. These unions must represent every employee on the entire railroad system who is a member of the craft or class which the union represents. In view of these facts, it appears to me that the justification for the right for which provision is made in this bill might well be said to be greater than in other industries where we have conferred such rights.

This bill is essentially the same as the union shop and check-off provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act, the only differences being those which are required to make it practical of operation in the railroad and airline industries.

In support of this bill it was stated by Senator TAFT in the debate on this bill in the Senate on December 7:

> In effect, the bill inserts in the railway mediation law almost the exact provisions, so far as they fit, of the Taft-Hartley law, so that the conditions regarding the union shop and the check-off are carried into the relations between railroad unions and the railroads. I believe that those provisions have worked satisfactorily under the Taft-Hartley law. I feel that they would work well in connection with the Railway Labor Act.

Here then is a bill on which there have been extensive hearings in the Senate committee and considerable debate on the floor of the Senate which resulted in a voice vote and passage. Extensive hearings have been held in the House Committee and the committee has reported a bill which is substantially the same. Furthermore, here is a bill which now has, with one exception, the unanimous support of the affected railway labor organizations.

There is another provision of the bill that I would like to discuss. That is the provision dealing with voluntary dues deductions. It authorizes the negotiation of agreements between labor organizations and the carriers to provide for the deduction from the wages of the employees of any "periodic dues, initiation fees and assessments uniformly required as a condition of acquiring or retaining membership" in the union.

This provision is confined, as specifically stated to periodic—that is, normal—dues, fees, and assessments. The carrier would in no way be expected to deduct fines and penalties that might be imposed by a union in exceptional cases.

Furthermore—and this is especially important—the provision is completely voluntary. Such deductions would be made by a carrier only on the individually signed authorization of the employee.

The proposed legislation declares plainly that "no such agreement shall be effective with respect to any individual employee until he shall have furnished the employer with a written assignment to the labor organization of such membership dues, initiation fees and assessments, which shall be revocable in writing after the expiration of 1 year, or upon the termination date of the applicable collective agreement, whichever occurs sooner." Thus, it is hedged in with safeguards.

The employee will have two alternatives. He may pay his customary dues, fees or assessments directly to his local union, or he may authorize the railroad or airline on which he is employed to deduct the amount regularly from his wages and turn that over to his union. The choice will be up to him.

Surely, there can be no sound objection to such a provision. Where a union-shop agreement is in effect, the employees covered are required to belong to the union, and they must pay their dues as a condition of continued employment. This provision would merely facilitate the payment of the dues.

It will be helpful alike to the employees, the managements and the unions. As everyone knows, the railroads cover tremendous areas, crossing and crisscrossing the Nation in every direction for a total of 225,000 miles. Employees are scattered far and wide. Many are at isolated points, hard to reach. This naturally makes collection of dues more difficult and more involved than in any other industry.

For the employee, the provision will simplify payment of his dues. He will not have to make long trips to the headquarters of his local union, or search out the representative of his union, to pay his dues. His signed authorization will take care of the matter and save him much inconvenience.

For the management, the provision will also be beneficial. True, it may add a bit to bookkeeping costs, but that will be more than offset in other ways. For example, collection of dues by union representatives on company time—a practice difficult to control—will be eliminated.

Also, the management would be relieved of the responsibility for discharge of employees who neglect or forget to pay their dues. The provision will reduce controversy over the issue of whether or not an employee is delinquent in dues payments. In short, it will make for smoother operation of the union shop and hence for greater efficiency and less disruption on the job.

Likewise, the dues-deduction provision will be of help to the union. It will simplify collection of the dues which must be paid. It will do away with the necessity of taking disciplinary action against members who become delinquent in dues payments. It will eliminate the need of proving to the management that a member has failed to pay his dues and should be discharged.

In short, this provision will make for better relations all around, and serve as another influence for minimizing strife and assuring uninterrupted transportation.

I repeat that the matter before us is not complicated and would not justify a failure to enact this bill at this session and thus require that the entire legislative process be initiated anew in the next session.

I can see no justifiable reason for continuing to withhold from railroad and airline employees the right to bargain collectively for union-shop and check-off agreements in the face of the rights which we have preserved by the Taft-Hartley Act to employees in all other industries. I think to do so would result in a grave injustice.

In conclusion it should also be borne in mind that there is nothing in this proposed legislation that makes the union shop or the check-off effective unless and until a union and the carrier as a result of collective bargaining agree to it. The law is permissive and not compulsory. The bill has the endorsement of 21 standard railway labor organizations affiliated with the Railway Labor Executives Association and is in full accord with present-day thought in labor-management relations. The Senate has already approved the bill and I trust it will have the approval of the House.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLVERTON. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. HARRIS. The gentleman has referred to the applicability of this amendment to the provisions of the Railway Labor Act affecting the mediation and arbitration. This amendment in no way affects the present procedure of the National Mediation Board with reference to adjustment of disputes; is that true?

Mr. WOLVERTON. I did not say anything that would indicate that this bill would in any way affect the present law with respect to mediation, arbitration, or the jurisdiction of the Adjustment Board. It would not do so. I am in full accord with the statement of the gentleman from Arkansas that this amendment of the Railway Labor Act does not make or contemplate any change with respect to the National Mediation Board with respect to adjustment of disputes.

Mr. HARRIS. The question has been raised that there might be some application that would affect the present arbitration provisions of the Railway Labor Act.

Mr. WOLVERTON. It does not, either directly or indirectly.

Mr. HARRIS. I want to make very clear that this in no way amends such provisions of that law.

Mr. WOLVERTON. The gentleman has correctly stated the situation. I trust that the House will give its approval to this bill. It has had the favorable consideration of the Senate in its present form. It likewise has the approval of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which has given its provisions full and careful consideration after extended hearings. The legislation does nothing more or less than give to railway and airline employees the benefit of similar provisions as now contained in the Taft-Hartley Act. It is entitled to the support of the membership of this House.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. O'HARA].

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that most of my colleagues will support this legislation. If I were working in the railroad industry, I would want to belong to one of the brotherhoods in the craft or the class of work that I did. I would not want to have to do so as a matter of compulsion, however. If I had to have a job and had to pay a toll for that job, I would not enjoy that as an American citizen. That is my own personal feeling. Believing as I do in the railroad brotherhoods and the unions, respecting what the union shop is and the closed shop, and the justification that may exist for each, I think they all are part and parcel of our American way of life, but still, as an American citizen, I would not like to have to belong to a union in order to obtain or hold a job.

All of the brotherhoods have not endorsed this legislation. One of the oldest of the present American labor organizations with a continuous record of service to its membership since 1863 opposes this legislation. That is the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. Mr. John Corbett, the national legislative representative of that organization, has authorized me to use and to insert in the RECORD the statement of the position of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers in opposition to this legislation, and I now ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to insert at this point in the RECORD that statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

The statement is as follows:

The Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers is the oldest of the railroad labor organizations and is one of the oldest of any of the present American labor organizations, with a continuous record of service to its membership since 1863.

It has been the policy of the brotherhood to endeavor to make the organization such as to have men in locomotive service desirous of becoming members and, because of that policy, it has never favored any proposals for closed-shop and/or union-shop conditions in its contracts with the railroads of the United States and/or Canada.

The Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers is on record before both the Senate committee and the House committee holding hearings on bills S. 3295 and H. R. 7789 as being opposed to the proposed provisions of those bills which, as originally introduced, were companion or identical bills, as it has been the practice to promote men in locomotive service, in train service, from the position of locomotive fireman to the position of locomotive engineer and, as the act of promoting the man does not carry any guarantee of work as a locomotive engineer except as the railroad may need his services as an extra locomotive engineer to take the place of some senior man who may lay off because of illness for a day's vacation, or some similar occasion, such an employee would be required to become, and retain, membership in two labor organizations in order to be protected in his efforts to make a living. He would be required to maintain membership in the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen to retain his right to work as a locomotive fireman and to acquire and retain membership in the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers to protect his right to work as a locomotive engineer.

Three amendments to bill H. R. 7789 were given favorable consideration by the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, subsequent to August 7, 1950, when the bill was reported out of committee—with House Report No. 2811.

The first of the three amendments would have little effect; the second amendment proposing: "Provided further, That no such agreement shall require membership in more than one labor organization," appears to merit considerable attention and there must be some controversy as to whether an employee, as a young man, was in service as a waiter in a railroad restaurant and joined the union of such employees, might assume that his union card in the waiters' union should qualify him for rights in the other 127 different crafts and/or divisions of crafts identified by the Interstate Commerce Commission as being railroad employees, if those other crafts had contracts with the different railroads under the authority of this legislation.

Under the provisions of bill S. 3295, as passed by the Senate, amended, there appears the guarantee that the young man who has served his apprenticeship as a locomotive fireman shall never be required to become a member of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, and this guarantee, apparently, in opposition to the proposed provisions that the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, which has contracts with practically all of the principal railroads of the United States, may be expected to secure contracts with those railroads, if this legislation is approved, which would provide protection for the organization on those railroads.

We submit the opinion that such a proposed condition is in direct opposition to any existing condition; that it would be unjust to a group of outstanding American workers; that there is no precedent for such action in all the history of our great Government; that there is no right or reason for taking such action and we respectfully request that no such action shall ever be taken.

JOHN T. CORBETT,
National Legislative Representative, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers.

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I should like to call to the attention of my colleagues two statements particularly, which were made by this great brotherhood with reference to this type of legislation. I quote from the statement of Mr. Corbett:

It has been the policy of the brotherhood to endeavor to make the organization such as to have men in locomotive service desirous of becoming members and, because of that policy, it has never favored any proposals for closed-shop and/or union-shop conditions in its contracts with the railroads of the United States and/or Canada.

There is a provision of the bill which is now before you for consideration to which I would like to call your attention. That has been well set out and I again quote from Mr. Corbett, as follows:

Under the provisions of bill S. 3295, as passed by the Senate, amended, there appears the guaranty that the young man who has served his apprenticeship as a locomotive fireman shall never be required to become a member of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, and this guaranty, apparently, in opposition to the proposed provisions that the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, which has contracts with practically all of the principal railroads of the United States, may be expected to secure contracts with those railroads, if this legislation is approved, which would provide protection for the organization on those railroads.

In other words, if a young man was a locomotive fireman and was promoted to an engineer, under the provisions of this bill he would not have to belong to the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, which, of course, in time perhaps means the defeat or would help defeat the continuation of that great brotherhood.

I recognize the difficulty that arises and the difficulty with which the committee was involved in considering this legislation where we wanted to get away with the overlapping of crafts or classes of the brotherhoods so that the worker did not have to belong to three or four organizations.

I think the comment which has been made by Mr. Corbett in regard to this amendment is extremely important.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota. I yield for a question only.

Mr. JACOBS. I really wanted to make a brief statement.

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JACOBS. I think the House has been inadvertently misinformed in regard to one aspect of this bill. It was told that the bill merely carries into the Railway Labor Act the provisions of the Taft-Hartley law. The truth of the matter is the Taft-Hartley law permits a closed union where closed shop or union shop conditions are contracted for. This bill absolutely legislates the right for closed unions where there are union shop conditions.

I do not believe there is any Member of this House who is any stronger in favor of the right of a union to have union shop conditions if they can contract them, but I will guarantee there is no Member of this House who is more opposed to a closed union than I am. I have worked to try to get legislation that would correct the abuses that have often followed and were made possible by union or closed shops.

I regret there can be no amendments offered to this bill for I cannot support this bill as written. At this time I would like to ask permission to extend my remarks and include an amendment that I propose to offer and a statement which I made to the Committee on Education and Labor on March 7, 1949, bearing on this subject:

On page 2, strike out from word "Provided," on line 9, through line 19 and insert "Provided, That no labor organization which enters into such an agreement shall—

"(1) refuse to grant membership to persons, having the qualifications generally required, upon the same terms and conditions generally required; or

"(2) penalize a member or a subordinate body for criticizing or demanding an explanation of the conduct of its officers or agents or an examination of its books and records, or for its officers or agents to refuse such examination during reasonable hours; or

"(3) penalize a member or a subordinate body without written charges; adequate notice thereof with copy of such charges attached; and a hearing before a tribunal composed of persons who have no personal interest in the controversy, with opportunity to produce favorable witnesses and cross-examine adverse witnesses, or without substantial evidence to sustain such charges."

STATEMENT BY HON. ANDREW JACOBS, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF INDIANA, BEFORE THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR, MARCH 7, 1949, IN HEARINGS UPON H. H. 2032, TO REPEAL THE TAFT-HARTLEY LAW AND ENACT A NEW LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS LAW

Gentlemen, within the next 15 minutes I hope to be able to induce you to give serious consideration to some much-needed labor legislation. This will pertain to evils which have not been heretofore covered by legislation.

We must accept the facts as they exist, recognizing that combinations of wealth or men or both possess economic power with which an individual cannot cope. Then we must acknowledge that a prime function of government is to regulate and restrain such excessive power so as to enable all men to fairly compete for their just share of what they help produce by their labor or investment. To apply this principle of government we must do four things:

(1) Evaluate the general economic power of the usual types of combinations.

(2) Determine who is normally the object of the abuse of such combined economic power.

(3) Determine the corresponding economic power of those upon whom the first is ordinarily exerted.

(4) Regulate and restrain any abuse of such excessive economic power so as to restore competition and enable ordinarily prudent and energetic men to bargain for what they helped produce by their labor or investment.

For a half century legislative bodies recognized the inability of the employee to meet the general economic power of the employer. More than a half century ago the Federal and most State legislative bodies enacted into law the principles of the Wagner Act, only to have them stricken down or denied enforcement by the courts.

This was a strange jurisprudence, since the common law recognized and curtailed economic duress in almost every contractual matter save the labor contract. Fortunately, the principles of the Wagner Act are no longer seriously challenged. They are enacted as the first sections of the Taft-Hartley Act.

However, the opponents of and those who did not fully understand the Wagner Act abandoned the direct assault for a flanking attack. Though the act was left standing, its effect was largely emasculated by the Taft-Hartley Act.

Some of the detailed provisions, and an analysis thereof, are more fully set out in my response to the General Electric questionnaire, now a part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and which I request, Mr. Chairman, be made a part of the record of this hearing.

Suffice it to be recorded at this point that the most damaging effect of certain provisions of the Taft-Hartley law has now been conceded by its senior coauthor, Senator TAFT, as well as by three national periodicals, which are generally accepted by business as sound reliable publications.

I hasten to say, Mr. Chairman, I do not mention Senator TAFT's concession as partisan chiding of an opponent. I believe his change of mind is perfectly honest and highly commendable. The politics of this question should not concern us. I will join with or oppose Democrat or Republican to gain a fair law. I believe a majority of this committee feels likewise.

I will not dwell longer upon either the Wagner or Taft-Hartley law, except as they may illustrate my proposals. Both of those laws will be the principal consideration before this committee, including the administration provisions regarding boycotts and jurisdictional disputes, which I discuss in response to the General Electric questionnaire. Rather I come here in the capacity of a witness and urge you to consider the necessity of applying the rules I suggested to another phase of the labor problem.

The proponents of the Taft-Hartley law claimed it reduced the power of union officials. That it did. But I feel that in so reducing such power they did not "determine who (was) normally the object of the abuse of such combined economic power." And the Taft-Hartley law did not restrain the abuse of such excessive economic power so as to relieve those who were the objects thereof.

The power of the union officer can be directed toward bargaining for wages and working conditions. But that power can also be used to oppress members and local union organizations affiliated with the national or international.

It was the former power, or the power to bargain for wages, that the Taft-Hartley law curbed, not the latter. It is the latter that is sometimes abused, and concerning which I will urge legislative restraint.

Many union people know of this and want remedies. I urged it upon the Seventy-ninth Congress and again upon the Eightieth. I will furnish you names of witnesses, good union men, who will give you illustrations of what I want remedied. These practices are certainly not prevalent in all unions, and there should be no objections from those unions that recognize and honor democratic processes.

I will, to induce your interest, give you a relatively brief example:

A local union was held in a captive status for over 16 years. It was never permitted to elect an officer. Every officer was appointed by the international president. The same group served through the entire 16 years. Vacancies by death were filled by the international president. Petition after petition to elect officers were rejected or ignored by the international president, until finally he yielded after 16 years and permitted a partial election. But the partial election, together with ground rules laid down by the international president, left his personal appointees in full control of the local's finances.

Finally, the few newly elected officers summoned up the courage and demanded to see the books. They were gone. Suit was filed against the international president, who then produced remnants of the books. Most of them had been destroyed after a very questionable audit by a Washington accountant.

Then, in order to intimidate the local into dismissing its suit for possession of its own books and an accounting of his stewardship, the international president suspended from the union pension roll all the old members of the local who had fully paid for their pensions. I think that was one of the cruelest acts I ever saw committed by an individual who had somehow been favored with a human appearance.

Finally, after proof of embezzlement became overwhelming, he repaid the local a large sum from the international treasury, promising to recoup it by proceeding against his own agents. But, in the meantime, the local had another problem. The wage scale had lagged to 34 cents per hour less than that in an adjoining district in the same craft. This occurred while it was captive and its contracts were made by the administrator, trustee, or whatever you choose to call him (these union members had a few very choice names, which don't belong in the record).

The employers in that district had to learn collective bargaining all over again. The pretended representative of these laboring men had become a mere broker of their labor. But the scale was finally raised. How much the men lost during the captivity of their local is incapable of quick estimate, but the equalizing increase amounted to about one and a half millions per year.

Now, let's have this cleared on the point of financial reports. The members got financial reports. But without looking at the books and behind the financial reports, the reports didn't mean anything. And without protection when demanding a look at the books, no one was apt to demand a look except in desperation.

This is pretty well illustrated by the next phase of the matter.

Part of the local embezzlement was concealed by items in the audit and some of the recovered books. "Special organizing" was the only explanation for items totaling $90,000. So the very term "special organizing" was suspect.

Recall the international president had obligated himself to proceed against his agents who were at least the primary, though probably not the sole defaulters in the local. Well, he dragged his feet for 8 months without commencing action. In the meantime, an international convention was called. A financial report was furnished and again up bobbed our friend "special organizing." But this time he was responsible for expenditures of over a million dollars. The local's officers announced they would press action against the defaulters of their own treasury and demanded, through their delegates, to know who got the million dollars from the international and what the international got in return. Whereupon the international president intimidated the convention into expelling the four elected delegates.

I won't prolong this by outlining the method of intimidation further than to say it was implied threats of expulsion against the delegates, and requiring them, when voting, to stand long enough to be identified.

He also intimidated the convention into granting him power to revoke the local's charter. Then he put up a $700,000 bond and, without notice, recaptured the local, its treasury, offices, and functions by a mandatory injunction.

During this time, the matter was brought to the attention of one of the Senators from the State where the local was situated. He was vainly asked to sponsor legislation such as I am going to ask you to consider.

Finally, the charter was restored with autonomy, but the local's president was never again recognized as a member. He is still wandering about like a lost soul, and the Taft-Hartley law does not help him in the least. This will become apparent during these hearings.

But to return to the court that ousted the local's elected officers. That court refused to listen to the evidence of those things heretofore related. While the judge no doubt wanted to be fair, he just didn't comprehend the problem, its scope nor its effect upon the workers.

Being reduced to the utter lack of representation they had suffered for almost 17 years, the local members accepted a compromise that did not reinstate the local president; the man who had led the fight that restored its autonomy, its treasury and its wage scale. This man later obtained a civil court judgment ordering him reinstated as a member, but that was appealed and the appeal is still pending.

Now, during the same convention, the international president refused to permit nomination of candidates to run against himself and at least one of his co-officers. The same intimidating methods were employed. The delegates trying to make nominations were simply ruled out of order. The printed convention proceedings will establish these facts without verbal proof.

I have related these matters as pertaining to one case. They have their counterparts in other cases. I do not represent that they are prevalent in many unions. But that these conditions exist in a few unions is too much. We cannot in good conscience ignore them.

These abuses were offered as excuses for the Taft-Hartley Act. Thus some union officials themselves furnished ammunition which apparently justified destruction of unions. On March 12, 1947, I offered to the then chairman of this committee this information as a basis for remedial legislation. He ignored me. I hope that you gentlemen won't.

Let me assure you the case I outlined is not a single isolated instance. True, a few unions have most of the trouble. The law reports are replete with examples where these matters have reached the highest courts.

There are remedies for these abuses at common law, but they are long, delayed, tedious and too expensive for those who are thus abused. I believe a more expeditious remedy should be provided in the labor act with jurisdiction in the National Labor Relations Board. It can comprehend the problems.

Proper remedies would, in my judgment be:

(1) Provisions requiring periodical election of union officers, and a remedy for fraud or duress in such election.

(2) Provisions for any member to audit or examine the books of the local or international, and of the local and international to audit each other's books.

(3) Provisions requiring due process of law, including disinterested trial boards for violation of union laws, and a right to have a Government agency review heavy penalties, including expulsion, which are capriciously or arbitrarily imposed.

(4) A requirement that a union accept qualified workers in a craft or area where such union controls all or substantially all work in that category.

With these provisions, the abuses of the closed shop can be eliminated and the worker can again establish a single unified front to meet the unity of the corporate employer. If we treat those four matters properly in our legislation, we will contribute decency to the unions whose officers have abused their power and we will not injure any union or employer.

We will have determined the persons who are the objects of that abuse of power and protected them by eliminating the abuses rather than destroying the only instrumentality they have to protect themselves from the economic power of the employer.

Our economic system cannot function without large employers; employers whose power is too great for the employee to meet and bargain with. Hence the only hope for a free economy is that labor can organize to match the employers' economic power. Let those who preach free economy and in the same breath damn the unions find another solution. And let those who damn the unions for such abuses as I point out here come forward and help legislate union decency and not union destruction.

It is possible, even probable, that I have not made friends nor influenced people (even you gentlemen) by this statement and these recommendations. But my statement is true, and what I recommend will have to be eventually adopted.

However, I want to particularly correct the impression that this is the same as the Taft-Hartley provision on union shops—because this bill, on page 2, lines 9 to 13, specifically legislates the right to a closed union where there are closed-shop or union-shop conditions.

A member of one of the railroad brotherhoods met me in the lobby one day and said: "The only difference between those who do not belong to a union and who we do not accept to membership, and those who do, is that those who do not belong to the union do not have to pay dues."

I said, "There is another difference, is there not? The fellow that you do not accept does not have to go to the trouble of voting. Is that not right?"

He said, "Yes; that is right."

Well, I do not believe that people can get good representation when they cannot vote and have a voice in the government of the organization that is supposed to represent them.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. O'HARA] has expired.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, in connection with what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JACOBS] has just said, I think it might be interesting to read a few words from the statement that Senator TAFT made when he spoke on this bill in the Senate. He said:

> In effect, the bill inserts in the railway mediation law almost the exact provisions, as far as they fit, of the Taft-Hartley law. So that the conditions regarding the union shop and the check-off are carried into the relations between railroad unions and the railroads. I believe that those provisions have worked satisfactorily under the Taft-Hartley law, and I feel that they would work well in connection with the Railway Labor Act. In response to a question from the unions, I have stated to them that I thought those provisions would work well in the railway labor law.

I yield to my colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. FISHER] for a question.

Mr. FISHER. The gentleman has referred immediately to the fact that this bill would bring railway employees under provisions similar to those which apply under the Taft-Hartley Act in States which now have control or regulation over the closed shop, union shop, and check-off. I wish the gentleman would state for the RECORD whether this bill would recognize the validity of the various State laws in those respects or whether it would superesede those laws.

Mr. BECKWORTH. As I pointed out when I made my first statement a moment ago an amendment was offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. ROGERS], which would have done that. I stated that the gentleman now talking had voted for the amendment and that it was not adopted. I stated that the FEPC amendment was offered but was not adopted. I further stated, however, that for many years railroad labor, being labor in interstate and foreign commerce activities has been dealt with differently than other types of labor as is evidenced by the Railway Labor Act, the Railroad Retirement Act, the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, the Federal Employees Liability Act, and the Hours of Service Act. The two types of labor, interstate and foreign commerce transportation labor and other labor, have not been dealt with historically identically.

Mr. FISHER. I understand. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. BECKWORTH. I will yield for a brief question, but I do not have much more time and there are many requests for time.

Mr. FISHER. Then, in that respect this bill does not do the same thing for railway labor that is provided under the Taft-Hartley law?

Mr. BECKWORTH. The gentleman is correct in that respect; that is my understanding.

I now yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BIEMILLER] 7 minutes.

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to start these remarks by going further into the question raised by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. FISHER].

We must recognize that all aspects of the economics of the railroad industry are under national control, not under State control. Since the passage of the Interstate Commerce Act in 1887 it has been wisely recognized that all matters relating to railroads whether they be rates or labor problems are much better handled by the Federal Government than they are by the various State governments. If we were to break down this Federal control in the field of railway labor we would be setting a precedent that could only lead to chaos in the entire railroad industry, because certainly the question of rates and other problems must stay in Federal hands. I think that point should be recognized very clearly when one talks about the possibility of trying to have State labor legislation apply to problems of railroad labor. After all we must also recognize that the contracts that are made between railroad management and railroad labor are made on a system basis; they are not made on a State-wide basis; some will cover as many as thirteen or fourteen States in their various terms. To try to break those down in terms of the conflicting laws of the thirteen or fourteen States covered by a particular railroad system would lead inevitably only to chaos.

I must confess that I am a little surprised to find that there is still opposition to this bill. It seems to me to be a bill that every Member of this House should conscientiously support. It is, as has been said, simply an attempt to give to railway labor the same bargaining rights that other labor groups have in the United States. It does not make the union shop mandatory; it simply makes it a matter of bargaining between railroad management and labor. Today it is not legal to bargain for the union shop under the Railway Labor Act. The bill is a simple amendment of the Railway Labor Act to deal with matters which properly come under the relationships of management and labor. What is wrong about that?

Those of you who voted for the Taft-Hartley law have voted for a similar provision for industry. Those of you who opposed the Taft-Hartley law did not oppose it because it had the union-shop provision in it. Those who fought that act fought it because it was too restrictive on labor. Obviously, it seems to me, whether you were for or against the Taft-Hartley law, this is a bill that should be supported by every Member of the House of Representatives and if you think of it in those terms you will see what the real solution is.

I recognize that there are on the railroads today a number of employees who do not belong to the railway labor unions. They are people who are getting a free ride. Some of the management representatives who appeared before our committee were brutally frank in saying they were using those nonunion members as management stooges to interfere in the labor-relations problems of the railroads. Let me give you one quote from a statement made before our committee. Paul Neff, chief executive officer of the Missouri Pacific, said:

> If we are deprived of these nonmembers, we would be in the position of men who knew noth'ng. We would be in the dark. We would not be able to get the information that we need to bargain with.

That is a very obvious statement as to what is still going on in connection with certain phases of railway labor problems, a condition that every student of industrial relations says tends toward very poor labor relations in any industry where such a situation exists. So long as management uses spies in an effort to disrupt the legitimate activities of unions we cannot hope to achieve stable labor relations.

The rest of American industry Nationwide has accepted the provision of the union shop. That issue is not debated very much any more in labor-management circles. The last time I checked on elections on the union shop, 98 percent of those who participated in such elections voted for the union shop. You are all aware of the fact that Senator TAFT said in effect, "What is the use of holding these elections any longer? Let us get rid of them," and the Senate last year did pass such a proposed amendment to the Taft-Hartley law.

All you are being asked to do is to O. K. a provision that gives to railway labor the right to bargain for the union shop just as any other labor group in the country may do.

We have had all kinds of issues raised on this matter—State's rights, civil rights, and so forth. These are questions that people have talked to me about, that they have to come to you about; have come to all of us about. But actually there is one simple issue before the House of Representatives today and that is, Are we going to give to railway labor the same right to bargain for a union shop that we have given to labor in industries throughout the United States?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIEMILLER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I think the gentleman is correct that the real issue involved in this bill is whether we should give to railroad labor the same rights and privileges of the union shop that are contained in the Taft-Hartley Act. As I understand the gentleman's position he favors this bill.

Mr. BIEMILLER. Correct.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Am I to accept the gentleman's position as one favoring also the Taft-Hartley Act? That is, Does he approve the Taft-Hartley Act? If so, I am happy to accept him at the mourners bench this late in the session.

Mr. BIEMILLER. My good friend from Ohio did not hear some remarks I made quite carefully a few minutes ago.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I did hear them and that is the reason I am asking the gentleman whether he is also endorsing the Taft-Hartley Act by his statement.

Mr. BIEMILLER. The gentleman must not have heard the remarks I made pointing out that both those who voted for the Taft-Hartley Act, and those who were opposed to the Taft-Hartley Act, approved the union shop provision and thus all supported for the same kind of provisions that are in this bill. I am definitely of the opinion that the Taft-Hartley bill is bad for the public, bad for management, and bad for labor. I am convinced the union shop is a sound provision for the public, for labor, and for management. I trust the House will approve this bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR.]

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I rise to support S. 3295. The bill as passed by the Senate is in substance identical to H. R. 7789, which has received the most careful consideration in our committee.

There is nothing revolutionary to my mind about Congress saying to industry and to labor, "If you fellows get together on a contract, it will be all right with us." The Labor-Management Act of 1947 does that very thing.

Consider, for a moment. You are being asked to permit privately owned railroads to enter into agreements with their own employees. I see nothing radical about that. To adopt as public policy the continued prohibition on the part of the Government of the normal collective-bargaining processes is the height of folly. The Labor-Management Act of 1947 is the law of the land. In the interest of consistency, and as the result of the enactment of that act and of the natural desire of other labor organizations to enjoy some of its benefits, we are faced with the responsibility of seeing to it that that law works and that it is properly extended under legislative conditions as this bill proposes.

The bill that we are now considering extends to the railroad workers and employees of common carriers by air a great principle embodied in the Taft-Hartley Act. It has extended such benefits to much of the Nation's labor population in the Taft-Hartley Act. This bill extends them to the employees of the railroad and aviation industry. Can we afford to go on record in favor of a principle for one group of workers and oppose it as to another? I think not. I think we must demonstrate our good faith; we must show that we stand by our convictions. This bill is wholly consistent with existing labor-management legislation.

I appeal to the Members of the House to support this bill. It will promote peaceful solutions and stability of relationship between labor and management in the industries concerned. I am satisfied that that is the purpose, and that that will be the effect of the bill. It is not radical; it is common justice. I support the bill without amendment because I believe it is consistent with our previous efforts in connection with the promotion of good labor-management relations.

S. 3295 relaxes existing prohibition against union security and check-off agreements contained in Railway Labor Act.

Permits, but does not require, union-shop agreements notwithstanding provisions of State laws.

Permits agreements requiring union membership 60 days after employment or date of agreement.

Provides that no employee may be deprived of employment for failure to join union which will not accept him on same terms and conditions applicable to any other member.

Provides that no employee may be deprived of his employment if his union membership is terminated for any reason other than failure to tender his dues, initiation fees, or assessments (not including fines and penalties).

Provides that in transportation groups such as engineers, firemen, and so forth, membership in any organization, national in scope, which accepts such employees as members shall fulfill requirements of union membership. This is to prevent employees who regularly move back and forth between various crafts from being required to join more than one union.

Requires individual authorizations as a prerequisite to the deduction of dues, and so forth, from employees' wages.

Except for the provision with respect to State laws and the provision against double membership, both of which are required because of conditions peculiar to the railroad industry, the bill prescribes conditions which are practically identical to those contained in the Taft-Hartley Act.

For those reasons I support the bill and urge its support by the House.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. ROGERS] to close debate.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee I offered two amendments to this bill, one dealing with wages and assessments and that there must be written authorization from the employee. Unfortunately that amendment was not adopted, but when it got to the Senate it was put in there. Now, another very important amendment I offered, and which I think ought to be in this bill, is respecting those States that have constitutional amendments or legislative acts where it is not necessary, in order for a man to work, to belong to a union. The people of my State of Florida spoke in no uncertain terms, through a constitutional amendment, saying that it is not necessary for a man to belong to a union before he can have a job. Therefore, as a Member of this House I think I am bound by the constitutional provisions of my State, and so am opposing this bill.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LUCAS. Does the gentleman mean that in the State of Texas, where we have a law against the closed shop, this bill will nullify that law?

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. It will absolutely nullify it. Your State laws and your constitution are not worth a cent so far as the provisions of this bill are concerned.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the provisions of the constitution of my State and in view of my thinking, I am going to vote against this bill.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I yield one-half minute to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD] for debate.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, as one who voted against the Wagner Act and who supported the Taft-Hartley Act at the time it was passed, and who still supports the Taft-Hartley Act, and in the hope that we can improve it some day, I am in favor of this bill and in favor of bringing all of American labor who desires to come under the Taft-Hartley Act, within its provisions. If it is a good act and if it is to stand down through the years, why deny any group its protection. I think the railway men have given emphatic proof the Taft-Hartley Act is not a slave act, as contended by President Truman.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I yield one-half minute to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WHITE] for debate.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I am in hearty support of this bill. The members of the railroad unions have poineered and blazed the way in establishing orderly and constructive relations between employers and employees, and have set the example in establishing constructive labor relations being followed by the unions in many other lines of employment. I am for the bill.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I yield one-half minute to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BENNETT] for debate.

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I think this legislation is entirely sound and just. It puts the railroad worker on a par with the other workers. I am for the bill and hope it will be adopted.

The purpose of the bill is to amend the Railway Labor Act to give railroad workers throughout the country the same right to enjoy the benefits and privileges of a union-shop arrangement that is now accorded to all workmen in most other types of employment. It merely extends equal justice to the railroad worker.

The legislation is permissive. It will enable the carrier to bargain collectively with representatives of the particular craft or class and permit them to enter into an agreement that requires membership in the union representing the craft or class as a condition of continued employment. There is no compulsion to make the agreement. It must be mutually satisfactory to both the carrier and the union. The passage of this bill will put the railroad man on the same footing with respect to union security as that presently enjoyed by other American workers and it is the duty of Congress to give him that recognition without further delay.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I yield one-half minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HESELTON] for debate.

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, this bill primarily provides for the same kind of treatment of railroad and airline employees as is now accorded employees in all other industries under existing law. It is in no sense a departure from the labor-management relations as they exist throughout other industries.

Others have discussed and explained the details of the Senate bill and the comparisons between the provisions of that bill and the one reported by the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce with the committee amendments.

I shall confine myself to two differences between the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 and the bill now before us.

First, there is in the Labor-Management Relations Act a requirement for union-shop elections. However, I am sure you will all recall that when the question of amendments to that act came before this session of Congress it was proposed to repeal that provision for elections. The reason was that experience had demonstrated that it was unnecessary and served only to cost additional expense in the holding of such elections. Under these circumstances I submit that the decision of the committee was in line with proven experience and was a sound one.

The second difference is the omission of the requirement contained in section 14 (b) of the Labor-Management Relations Act, which reads as follows:

> Nothing in this act shall be construed as authorizing the execution or application of agreements requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment in any State or Territory in which such execution or application is prohibited by State or Territorial law.

Again, the committee considered this carefully but decided not to include it. I think no one will dispute the fact that if any of our business units is primarily intrastate in character, it is the transportation business and particularly railroads and airlines. Under the Railway Labor Act, agreements must be systemwide, and in an overwhelmingly number of instances, cross many State lines. Seniority districts lap over from one State to another. Therefore, any requirement which would exclude union-shop coverage in those States prohibiting union-shop agreements would be both illogical and unworkable. It is true 17 States have laws prohibiting union-shop agreements. However, six of these States exempt the application of their laws insofar as employees under the Railway Labor Act are concerned. The State of Massachusetts is one of the six. I submit that Massachusetts and these other five States shows a realistic and sound course to take.

I have been advised that this bill in its present form is vigorously supported by 21 of the 22 standard railway labor organizations and that these 21 organizations represent approximately 1,300,000 out of a total of 1,350,000 employees. It is rare that any legislation affecting any groups is supported by any such overwhelming majority, in this instance, a ratio of about 26 to 1.

It seems to me that any fair-minded person, considering all of the evidence and arguments for and against this bill would readily admit, even if he could not support or approve the bill, that it is a reasonable proposal and is entitled to the support of those who wish to be fair in the development of sound labor-management laws. I can and do urge that we pass this bill today by an overwhelming vote.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members be permitted to extend their remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, it was with profound regret that I was unable to be present on January 1, 1951, to participate in the discussion of S. 3295, a bill to amend the Railway Labor Act. Because of a very delicate eye operation I was urged to refrain from active participation in the affairs of the House for several days.

As chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House I introduced H. R. 7789, a bill substantially the same as S. 3295, and arranged for the hearings and executive sessions thereon. My interest in legislation of this and kindred nature goes back almost to the beginning of my service in Congress in 1913. I was a member of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce during the time when the Railway Labor Act was passed in 1926. I was the author of the Railway Labor Act amendments in 1934, which is the present law.

The purpose of S. 3295 is to amend the Railway Labor Act, as amended in 1934, so as to permit carriers subject to that act, and labor organizations duly designated and authorized to represent employees in accordance with the requirements of that act, to make voluntary agreements, first providing for the union shop, and second, providing for the check-off.

The Railway Labor Act, as currently in effect, makes it unlawful for any carrier or its agents to influence or coerce employees in an effort to induce them to join, remain, not to join, or not to remain members of any labor organization. The carrier also is prohibited by the Railway Labor Act from deducting from the wages of any employees any dues, initiation fees, assessments, or other contributions payable to labor organizations.

The present prohibitions against all forms of union-security agreements and the check-off were made part of the Railway Labor Act in 1934. They were enacted into law against the background of employer use of these agreements as devices for establishing and maintaining company unions, thus effectively depriving a substantial number of employees of their right to bargain collectively.

It was because of this situation that labor organizations agreed to the present statutory prohibitions against union-security agreements. An effort was made to limit the prohibition to company unions. This, however, proved unsuccessful; and in order to reach the problem of company control over unions, labor organizations accepted the more general prohibitions which also deprived the national organizations of seeking union-security agreements and check-off provisions. It is thus clear that these organizations did not oppose union-security and check-off agreements as such but merely their use as a means of carrier control over the bargaining process.

The principle of authorizing agreements for the union shop and the deduction of union dues has now become firmly established as a national policy for all industry subject to the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947, including transportation industries other than railroads and airlines. Unions representing railway employees and employees of common carriers by air, however, not only are exempted from the provisions of that act, but, as explained above, also are denied the right to negotiate such agreements by the Railway Labor Act.

There are approximately 1,200,000 employees in the railroad industry today. Between 75 and 80 percent of these employees hold membership in one or another of the railway labor unions. Nonunion members, nevertheless, share in the benefits derived from collective agreements negotiated by the railway labor unions but bear no share of the cost of obtaining such benefits. It is manifestly unfair that individual employees should be permitted to obtain all the benefits resulting from collective bargaining process and be subject to none of the obligations of the process.

No sound reason exists for continuing to deny to labor organizations subject to the Railway Labor Act the right to negotiate agreements with railroads and airlines of a character permitted in the case of labor organizations in the other large industries of the country. I, therefore, recommend prompt enactment into law of the legislation here proposed, which would extend to labor organizations subject to the Railway Labor Act the privilege of negotiating agreements containing provisions for the union shop and for deduction of dues, initiation fees, or assessments from the wages of employees.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, as some of you may know, I come from a railroad-labor family. I have known at first-hand the problems of the railroad man. This bill that we are now considering has my full support. I have given it very careful consideration through long hearings in our committee and I can see nothing to be afraid of. As a matter of fact, I cannot understand why railroad management does not agree to the bill and dispense with all of this hubbub to which we have all been exposed.

Most of you know that there have been some problems in getting agreement among all of the railroad unions with respect to the bill. On the other hand all of the railroad unions that believe in the principle of the union shop are now in agreement on S. 3295. The only organization, out of the 23 standard railroad unions, that has opposed this bill has made it perfectly clear that it opposes any type of union security. All the other organizations are for the bill. All of the shopcraft unions, the clerks, the telegraphers, the trainmen, the firemen, the conductors and all the rest are asking us to vote for this bill.

It seems appropriate to stop for a moment to consider what the House is being asked to do. We are being asked to permit unions and management to make agreements regarding the union shop. We are not being asked to vest in some Government board the authority to order union-shop agreements. We are not being asked to set up some new authority at great expense to the Government to administer some standards that will be set here. We are simply proposing to say to railroad management and railroad labor—"If you fellows can get together on contracts of this sort and want to sign one it is all right."

As a matter of broad public policy, I can see nothing wrong with the negotiation of union-shop agreements on the railroads. When the Railway Labor Act was passed, the Congress had in mind stabilizing as much as possible labor relations. This bill will help stabilize the industry. It will place responbility squarely in the unions for the conduct of bargaining and eliminate the shadow area of nonmembers who at the same time exercise all employee prerogatives. Within the past few days we have all witnessed the spectacle of men going off the job all over the country after reporting sick to their superiors. As could be expected, there was a howl set up calling for the scalps of the union leaders. We know that the leaders asked their men to return to their jobs, but in most instances the men did not go back. It may very well be that a large number of the men who called up sick and tied up several major rail terminals were not even members of the unions whose leaders were being denounced. Certainly, if this bill were passed and all the men belonged to unions, the responsibility could be fixed and there would be no doubt as to who was speaking for the men on the job.

We must bear in mind here that the Railway Labor Act as we have known it requires that the bargaining agent for the clerks, for example, on a railroad represent all of the clerks on that railroad. This is true even though the clerk to be represented may not be a member of the union. This is comparable to saying to the American Medical Association that it must treat every person who becomes ill regardless of whether the patient pays or not. In my judgment to continue as public policy the requirement that unions represent employees who do not pay their share of the cost of representation is socializing the unions.

We are not blazing a new trail here today. There is nothing new in this proposal that union shop contracts be permitted on the railroads. The War Labor Board during the late war ordered union shop contracts in a large number of cases. Most responsible students of modern labor relations agree that the principle of union security is sound. Some of the country's largest industries have profited by adopting this system. I have no doubt that it would help the railroad industry.

This bill has the support of a great majority of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. We have given it the most careful consideration. There is no doubt that the bill is needed. I shall support it without amendment and urge all of my colleagues in the House to do likewise.

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to lend my support to the Senate passed bill, S. 3295, which is similar in all respects to H. R. 7789, which was reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I am happy to take part in an action which will accord the railway labor organizations substantially the same rights as are enjoyed by unions in other industries.

This bill, when enacted into law, will permit negotiations by railway labor organizations for agreements with the carriers, providing for union security. I believe it is only fair that this body should act to permit the negotiations for such agreements. The organizations of railroad workers are among the most respected of our democratic institutions. They have unquestionably made real contributions to the welfare of railroad workers, the railroads and the Nation as a whole.

These railway labor organizations will be called upon to render even greater service to the Nation in the troublesome times which lie ahead. They are entitled to the stability which will be permitted by enactment of this bill.

The physical structure of the railroad industry poses certain unique problems in dealing with the employer-employee relationship, as well as the employee's relationship with his union. The reason is that, to a great extent, a large number of employees are scattered over an area of several hundreds and even thousands of miles of railroad property, and yet these employees in a given class or craft are under one collective bargaining agreement for an entire railroad system. Therefore, if union security agreements are to be made permissible in the railroad industry, it should be done in such a way as to make such agreements feasible and workable. It would be of little value to railroad unions to authorize the negotiations of union security agreements and at the same time place so many obstacles in the path of effectuating such agreements as to make them almost unworkable and worthless.

During the hearings on H. R. 7789, and in the deliberations of the Committee on that bill, several amendments were proposed which in my opinion would impose undue restriction and hardship if adopted. The Committee gave careful consideration to each amendment that was proposed. Some were adopted for purposes of clarification and the protection of individual employees. Others were rejected either on the basis that they were unworkable in a wholly interstate commerce industry, or because they were not germane to the subject of the proposed legislature. As stated before, the bill now before the House—S. 3295, is substantially identical to the bill reported by our Committee, the only difference being language agreed to by the railway labor organizations themselves, for the purpose of clarifying the section dealing with union membership requirements, where employees hold rights in more than one class or craft, and where different organizations hold the bargaining rights in such crafts or classes. This generally applies to what is termed train and engine service employees. Under such circumstances, such an employee could not be required to hold membership in more than one such organization. The very fact that these unions worked this out themselves for the protection of the individual employee demonstrates their sincerity and good faith.

It is my opinion that the proposed legislation is long overdue. I therefore urge that S. 3295 be adopted without amendment.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this bill for several reasons. First, because of the manner in which it has been brought up. I think it a sad commentary upon our legislative process here in the House that on a bill as important as this, affecting thousands, yes, even hundreds of thousands of railroad employees, that not one amendment may be offered. Are the sponsors of this bill afraid of some changes in it? Do they not trust the Members of this body in the presenting of amendments? No, Mr. Speaker; this bill is being railroaded through this House without proper consideration, and if for no other reason than this, I shall vote against it.

Second, Mr. Speaker, we have in Texas a State statute prohibiting the closed shop. While I appreciate the benefits of such an arrangement, I do not believe that I should vote for legislation which will arbitrarily and absolutely nullify my own local laws. Our railway employees in Texas have done rather well, I think, under this statute, and I can see no reason why I should repeal it by voting for the passage of this bill. In fact, I cannot in good conscience vote for this bill after taking an oath to support the laws of this country. And no false logic, which I have heard argued here, can alter my conviction on this question. I understand that an amendment providing that this act will not supersede State laws and State constitutions will be offered in a motion to recommit. If such a motion is offered I shall, of course, support it. Not unless such a provision is put in this bill will I vote for it.

These reasons, Mr. Speaker, impel my action. I think some one should say it—and I shall—I think that someone should say that not one copy of this bill, not in the hands of those supporting this measure, is on the floor. I have asked at both pages' desks and I am unable to find one copy of the bill. Are we so desperate to pass this bill that we have to force it through the House the Members of which cannot even read what they are being called upon to vote on?

No, Mr. Speaker; I will not be a party to such machinations, and whether, save for its nullification of my own State laws, it contains good or bad features, I cannot but register my disapproval of such tactics by casting an emphatic "No" vote.

Mr. LINEHAN. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the principle of the union shop—as embodied in the proposed legislation before us—is 100-percent American.

It reflects the American spirit of fair play. It provides that those who accept the benefits secured by an organization shall also share equally in the expense of operating such organization.

"Free riders"—those who seek to get something for nothing are resented in every walk of life, and justly so. We all believe no man should shirk his responsibility. None among us will deny that all who benefit from the services provided by organized society, through government, should help pay the cost of government. Why should not the same principle apply to workers who secure the benefits of trade unionism?

There is nothing compulsory about this legislation. It is merely permissive. It provides that unions and managements in our great railroad industry may voluntarily negotiate union-shop agreements by the process of collective bargaining.

I want to stress the words "union shop." The legislation would in no way authorize what is known as the closed shop, under which employers are required to obtain their workers from the union.

On the contrary, under this legislation, the railroads would be entirely free in the future as in the past to select their own labor. A union-shop agreement, if entered into in conformity with this legislation, would merely provide that a worker hired by the railroad would, after 60 days, join a union of his craft, and remain so as a condition of continued employment.

There are ample safeguards in the bill against any possible abuse or discrimination. For example, it provides that if a union for any reason declines to accept a worker into membership, his employment will in no way be jeopardized.

This measure is the very essence of democracy. It encourages 100-percent membership and 100-percent participation in the activities of a union. Thereby, the policies formulated by a union will more truly reflect the wishes of the great majority.

This bill will also enhance peace on the rails. It will remove a major source of irritation and unrest. As I said earlier, railroad workers who regularly and loyally tender their dues to support their unions resent the "free riders" in their midst—the men who take the gains which unions win through long and costly struggles, but refuse to pay one penny toward the expense involved.

Such a situation creates friction. It makes for hard feelings. It lowers morale. It affects output and productivity. Without question, correction of such situations will raise morale and make for greater productivity. Under the union shop, workers will be pulling together. Each man will be bearing his proper share of the load. This should undoubtedly result in improved productivity and greater harmony which will be equally beneficial to the employees, the management, and the public.

It should be remembered that the Railway Labor Act has, as its foundation stone, the principle that genuine collective bargaining is the way to peaceful relations between labor and management—the way to uninterrupted transportation.

Certainly, collective bargaining can function more effectively if the union voices the sentiments of all the employees and if it is supported by all the employees.

The union shop is an old, established American institution. It has existed in many industries for decades, and has made for stability. It is welcomed by many employers as an aid to discipline and efficiency in the shop. Fair employers who have operated under union-shop conditions would frankly declare they would never go back to the irresponsibility and the confusion of the open shop.

This is recognized even in the Taft-Hartley Act, which sanctions the union shop in all other industries. Why should the railroad industry be discriminated against in this respect? Why should the conditions permitted in other industries be denied on the railroads? The answer, obviously, is that this discrimination must be ended now.

Summing up, I should like to emphasize that the union shop makes for equality and fairness, for harmony and peace, for high morale and better productivity. For that and many other reasons, I think this legislation should be overwhelmingly approved by this body.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is to be commended for the outstanding work it has accomplished in presenting this bill on the floor of the House. The officers and representatives of the various railroad brotherhoods have worked incessantly for months to get this legislation so the House Members could vote on the bill.

This legislation if enacted into law will tend to improve relations between railroad management and railroad employees. Its enactment will elevate union brotherhood status and solidify railway labor and place union officials in a position to more effectively bargain on problems which will inure to the benefit of industrial relations on all our carrier systems. This bill will reinstate union security and provide check-off arrangements which will aid in clarifying railroad work problems and give union collective bargainers a legal status which does not now exist.

The gentleman from Ohio, Chairman CROSSER, is to be congratulated on his effective work for this bill as well as other legislation involving the betterment of railroad labor relations back through the years. This bill should receive an overwhelming vote on final passage.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, it is true this proposed legislation, Senate bill 3295, is before the House under somewhat unusual circumstances as provided by the rules of the House. This particular rule provided in paragraph 2 of rule XIV is rarely used and in fact has not been used as I understand in the last 20 or 25 years.

I think the position of the committee should be clearly understood as to the responsibility in connection with this legislation in view of the application of this rarely used procedure.

Let me repeat the rule provides that when a committee of the House reports a bill which is placed on the House Calendar and the Senate passes a bill substantially the same, it is privileged and may be called up from the Speaker's table by some Member directed by the committee having jurisdiction.

In this instance, our Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce reported H. R. 7789 August 7, 1950. Later the committee adopted certain amendments. The bill as reported was placed on the House Calendar.

The Senate passed a similar bill before the holidays which has been on the Speaker's table. There were certain amendments adopted by the Senate which has brought that bill in line and substantially the same as the bill reported by the House. This brings this legislation within this special rule.

Before the Christmas holidays, after a number of meetings by our committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BECKWORTH], the acting chairman of the committee, was directed to call up the Senate bill from the Speaker's table. This he has done today, and thus the legislation before us.

But let me explain further. A number of the Members have asked for information and clarification as to just how this applies. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BECKWORTH], acting chairman of the committee, has 1 hour, which is at his discretion to yield to other Members only for debate. Under the direction, he cannot yield for amendments. As a practical matter, he could not yield, or else he would lose control of the legislation completely. As an example, should he yield for any purpose other than debate, the person to whom he would yield would have then 1 hour, and so on.

There have been many Members who inquired about the opportunity of voting for some amendments. Therefore, this explanation giving the reasons why the gentleman from Texas will not yield to anyone for the purpose of offering amendments.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill, S. 3295, has, as I have already said, the same purposes as that of H. R. 7789, reported by our committee in August. It would amend the Railway Labor Act, so as to permit rail and air carriers and labor organizations to negotiate agreements providing for, first, union shop; and, second, for the deduction from employees' wages of union dues, initiation fees, and assessments, commonly referred to as the check-off system.

The similar House bill, H. R. 7789, was a subject of lengthy hearings by our committee during May and June of 1950. During the course of the hearings differences of opinion developed, first, between the carriers and labor organizations over the general principle involved and the protection afforded individual employees; and, second, among labor organizations themselves, particularly those in operating services over the possible requirement that certain employees be required to maintain membership in more than one union.

We in the committee attempted to determine and resolve these differences at least on the questions other than the differences of opinion on the basic issue.

It was not entirely satisfactory, therefore, subsequently certain further questioning arose over the definiteness of the protection afforded operating employees against being compelled to belong to more than one union and over the matter of handling the deductions of periodic dues, fees, and assessments payable to labor organizations.

As the bill was reported and language adopted relating to these two problems, the operating brotherhoods opposed it. On September 11, 1950, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, and the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, directed a letter to Senator LUCAS opposing the bill, S. 3295, before the Senate in its present form.

The following day, September 12, 1950, a letter was directed to the members of the Rules Committee of the House signed by representatives of all four of the operating brotherhoods, the Locomotive Engineers, the Firemen and Enginemen, Brotherhood of Railway Conductors, and the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, opposing H. R. 7789, which had been reported by our committee and stating that the proposed amendments in their opinion "make the bill more unsatisfactory." They, therefore, requested the Rules Committee to decline a rule on the proposal.

In December, these two differences, that is, dual membership and deductions, were matters of amendment on the Senate floor during the consideration of the bill by that body. Clarification of the amendments was made. There were adjustments and the bill in the amended form as it comes to us now from the Senate appears to be endorsed and actually urged by 21 of the 22 national railroad labor organizations.

On December 11, three of the four operating brotherhoods: the Firemen and Engineers, Order of Railway Conductors and the Trainmen, wrote a letter to the chairman of the House committee, to the effect that they had been opposed to railway union shop bills, S. 3295, and H. R. 7789, but the Senate had just passed S. 3295, and incorporated therein a measure which makes the proposal entirely satisfactory. Having cleared up these two issues, they urged that the Senate bill, 3295, which we have before us today be passed.

The Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers as I understand are still opposed to the proposal.

I have stated the purposes of this proposed amendment. Now the two principal changes in this Senate-passed bill from the House bill as reported by the committee are:

First. Page 2, lines 24, 25 to page 3, line 9, of Senate bill 3295, the addition of language providing for the written assignment by the employee to the labor organization of periodic dues, initiation fees, and assessments; and second, the addition of subparagraph (c) which leaves to the individual employee in the operating services the choice of operating union to which he will belong, and thus specifically resolves any doubt concerning a possible requirement of dual membership. However, if an employee is not a member of any union at the time of union-shop agreement, if any, he must join the craft of the bargaining agent, within the 60 days in which he is working at the time.

The fundamental proposition involved in the bill, even as amended, still remains; namely, shall the national policy expressed in the Taft-Hartley Act regarding the lawfulness of labor organizations and employers entering into agreements providing for the union shop and voluntary check-off be extended to permit railroad and airline labor organizations and rail and air carriers to make the same kind of agreements?

The granting of this authority in the railroad and airline industries is urged by labor organizations on the ground that employees who are nonunion members receive the benefits accruing to all by reason of the collective agreements negotiated by the bargaining representatives, but bear no share in the cost of obtaining such benefits.

Testimony before our committee was to the effect that some 80 percent of the 1,200,000 railroad employees today are members of a railroad labor organization. Thus it appears this bill is directed at some 250,000 who are not now in one of the unions.

It is obvious, however, that even under negotiated agreements for union shop, a substantial portion of these employees will never become union members. Many employees are not eligible for union membership because of constitutional limitations of the labor organizations upon and requirements for membership.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JACOBS] referred to this a moment ago. It is a fact that because of limitations, a number of employees are not eligible for membership and this legislation permits it to continue. In addition, many employees exercise supervisory confidential management functions.

They are excludible from the coverage of the agreements. In other words, these employees not eligible for membership in the labor organizations because of the constitutional limitations and supervisory control, and so forth, which exclude them from the organization, are protected by the fact that they can continue their employment.

The fact that they will not be accepted in the labor organizations will in no way affect their employment.

The exact union-shop status of supervisory employees or confidential secretaries is not as closely and directly defined in the Railway Labor Act as in the Taft-Hartley Act. The latter act provides that no employer subject to that act shall be compelled to define as employees—and hence subject to union-shop agreements—individuals defined as supervisors, and such term is defined in the act. The Railway Labor Act, on the other hand, includes within the term "employee," every person in the service of a carrier who performs any work defined as that of an employee or subordinate official in the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Under such orders, many supervisors are considered employees under the Railway Labor Act. It is to be hoped that any ambiguity over union membership requirements of supervisory employees will be clarified in any agreements negotiated.

There are two propositions not now contained in the Senate bill before us, nor in the House bill on the House Calendar, which were proposed as amendments in the Senate and before our committee.

One of these related to an exemption of the applicability of the union shop and check-off in those States which now prohibit such agreements. This is provided for in the Taft-Hartley law, but not in the bill before us. This proposition was defeated in our committee, although I supported it in committee because my State of Arkansas has a constitutional provision prohibiting agreements of this character. This proposition was also defeated on the Senate floor 23 to 59.

The other proposition provided that the permission to negotiate agreements for the union shop would not apply where the union denied membership to applicants on grounds of race, creed, or color. This amendment was voted down in our committee. I opposed the amendment in the belief that this policy question is of such broad and general scope that it does not belong in this bill. A similar amendment along these lines was tabled when proposed on the Senate floor, 64 to 17.

This is the situation which I feel though quite important but a relatively similar problem. As already stated, the only issue other than the possible differences that could arise over supervisory employees is the basic question.

The Taft-Hartley Act, on this particular issue seems to be national policy, providing union-shop agreements with 60 days following any agreement through bargaining for any employee who does not belong to join and pay his dues, permitting check-off only by the voluntary system.

With this background and history of a national policy, I feel sure that this bill even though brought under this procedure will be adopted.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, there could be no more hopeful omen for the future, and at a time when certainly we need such stimulus to our morale, than the passage on this New Year's Day of 1951 of the measure we have been debating.

The larger the majority by which we declare ourselves for this necessary and beneficial measure the greater will be the brilliance of the omen.

We are facing the greatest crisis of our national history. To survive, all of us, whether we furnish the capital and supply the contribution of management or whether we furnish the labor, must look forward to years of sacrifice. Sacrificing together, we will learn to think and act together, leaning on one another and supporting one another in the trials, the struggles, and the tests ahead. Thus that which organized labor has always envisioned, that which organized labor has during the years constantly and steadfastly worked to achieve, will come into realization.

Often the aims and the aspirations of organized labor have been misrepresented, sometimes unfortunately they have been misunderstood, but always dominating every action of organized labor and every advocacy of desired labor legislation has been a deeply sincere and a laudable desire to make of capital and labor a perfect team in the true American sense, pulling together and going ahead together as partners on an equal basis of authority in counsel and equal respect for the dignity of man regardless of whether his contribution to the success of a common undertaking is in the field of management or that of labor.

All this is no more in the interest of labor than it is in the best interest of management. More and more the large industrialists of the Nation are coming to realize this. Harmonious and satisfactory labor relations can exist only where there is absolute equality in the authority of counsel and in dignity. I think that now, when we will be called upon to sacrifice as we never have before, the truth of this will be more widely accepted.

I had hoped that during my service in this Congress the Taft-Hartley Act would have been repealed and the replacement would have been legislation reflecting this spirit of friendly and cooperating team mates. It would have been so helpful to our country if we had done out part in bringing labor and management together on this basis of equality in counsel and in dignity by discarding entirely the labor enactment that was built on the principle that I am better than you.

I am sorry that the Eighty-first Congress failed to obey the mandate of the American people in November of 1948. But when I leave this Hall tomorrow and prepare to return to my activities in private life, it will be with the complete confidence that the hour is not far distant when all labor legislation framed in the lust to take advantage of men and women who live by the labor of their hands will be wiped from our laws.

As certain as the day will break tomorrow, as certain as we shall meet the crises facing us and that we and a universe of democracy will survive, legislation is coming in our land of justice and of equality that will promote and safeguard the working together of Americans in management and Americans who labor as a perfect team of partners guided by the rule of equality in authority in counsel and equality in dignity.

I am glad that during the 2 years I have been privileged to represent a great district on the shores of Lake Michigan in the metropolis of Chicago I have voted on the side of men and women who earn their daily bread by toil. Property rights I respect and will defend, but I could never accept a philosophy that circumstances of good fortune on one side and circumstances of not-so-good fortune on another side could ever place property rights in priority to human rights. I have lived my life that way. I have not changed in the Eighty-first Congress. I will return to my neighbors with the satisfaction that in the one term I have been here I have kept the faith with them.

I am voting for the bill now before us. I anticipate that it will pass by a large majority. Its provisions are fair, and they are necessary if labor is to march on undiscriminated against in a partnership with management on the basis of equality to do the work ahead in our fight for survival and for a better world.

I was on the floor of the House some days ago when the bill first came up. I have remained in my office and in attendance at the sessions during the holidays and one propelling reason, aside from a desire to do my job as the representative of my constituents up to the final hour, has been to be on hand to cast a vote for this good bill as one of the last acts of my service with the Eighty-first Congress.

I might add, Mr. Speaker, that this to me has had a significance in consistency since in my first legislative service, as presiding officer of the State senate in Illinois more than three decades ago, I was privileged to have a not unimportant part in the fight against stubborn opposition resulting in the enactment of the Full Crew Act. The brotherhoods were right then, as experience has so conclusively shown; and their counsel, supporting the enactment of the bill before us, is as wise now as it was those many years ago.

I want to congratulate the chairman and the members of the committee for the faithful work they have done, and also the railway labor officials who have so effectively presented the case of their membership.

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, we now have before the House for consideration, Senate bill 3295 which passed that body. I am supporting this bill.

The purpose of this legislation is to give the railway workers of the Nation an opportunity to bargain collectively with railway management to secure what is known as the union shop.

It says to the railway workers and railway management, we are changing the present law which prohibits under the Railway Labor Act collective bargaining between employers and employees to bring about a union shop. This bill, if enacted into law, removes the present prohibition of such a course now written into the Railway Labor Act and says if you, management, and you, the railroad workers, can get together on a contract which provides for a union shop it will be legal under the law.

This proposed legislation makes it legal for railway management to apply the check-off of union dues for all members who specifically authorize such check-off in writing. It provides that all railway employees hereafter shall become members of their craft union within 60 days after such employment.

Mr. Speaker, the facts are that the railway men and their representatives are now asking that the Congress extend to the railway unions the benefits of that provision of the Labor-Management Act of 1947, commonly known as the Taft-Hartley Act, to them, which provides that employers and employees through collective bargaining may establish the union shop.

There is nothing radical in the Congress making this change in the Railway Labor Act. As a result of the enactment of the Labor-Management Act of 1947—the Taft-Hartley law—the railway labor organizations naturally desire some of the benefits of this act.

This bill simply extends to the railroad workers and employers the benefit of this provision now enjoyed by all other laboring men under the Taft-Hartley Act. We cannot afford to withhold from the railway workers these benefits granted to practically all other workers in 1947 under the Labor-Management Act, commonly known as the Taft-Hartley law.

I have supported this legislation for many months because it is consistent with my previous efforts in constantly looking to the improvement and promotion of good, fair, labor-management relations.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I am opposed to the bill, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman qualifies.

The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SMITH of Virginia moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce with instructions to report the same back with the following amendment: "Strike out all of page 3 down to and including line 22 and insert the following:

"'Eleventh. Any carrier or carriers as defined in this act and a labor organization or labor organizations duly designated and authorized to represent employees in accordance with the requirements of this act shall be permitted—

"'(a) to make agreements requiring, as a condition of continued employment, that within 60 days following the beginning of such employment, or the effective date of such agreements, whichever is the later, all employees shall become members of the labor organization representing their craft or class: Provided, That no such agreement shall require such condition of employment with respect to employees to whom membership is not available upon the same terms and conditions as are generally applicable to any other member or with respect to employees to whom membership was denied or terminated for any reason other than the failure of the employee to tender the periodic dues, initiation fees, and assessments uniformly required as a condition of acquiring or retaining membership: Provided further, That nothing contained in this act shall permit the making of any agreement between a carrier and a labor union not permitted by the laws of the State or States in which it is to operate.'"

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present; and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 61, nays 285, not voting 82, as follows:

TUSKEGEE INSTITUTE'S REPORT ON LYNCHINGS FOR THE YEAR 1950

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention to the report of the Tuskegee Institute for the year just closed, 1950, with reference to the crime of lynching in America. This report shows that in the whole of the United States there were only two killings of any kind within that category or that could possibly fall within that category, and neither of these was a lynching within the definition of that crime as contained in the antilynching bills. As described in the Tuskegee report, both these crimes more closely resemble gang slayings than what are usually regarded as lynchings.

Please permit me to congratulate the Nation upon the progress that has been made toward complete stamping out of the vile crime of mob murder, called lynching. It is with particular pride that I note again from this report that the vanishing point for this crime has almost been reached.

God speed the day when human life may be as sacred to man as to his Creator and all murder cease, whether called war, gang slaying, or lynching.

NATIONAL ASSEMBLY FOR MORAL REARMAMENT

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, this week there is taking place at the Shoreham Hotel the greatest step yet taken toward the ideological mobilization of America. Members of Congress have already received notices of this event from Mr. WADSWORTH and myself. This National Assembly for Moral Rearmament has as its theme, An Ideology That Can Win the World. I would strongly urge all Members of the House to take the chance of going over to the Shoreham this week and seeing there at first hand the striking evidence of an effective strategy at work to answer communism.

As reported in Washington newspapers yesterday, five of the overseas delegates from 22 countries are men who have left the top ranks of the Communist Party because of the force of a superior idea.

Sessions at the conference are at 11 and 5 each day till January 8. Plays will be presented each evening at 8 o'clock at the Lisner Auditorium dramatizing the basic ideas of democracy for which we are fighting. Members will recall The Good Road, which played here 3 years ago. Information as to how tickets may be obtained can be gotten from my office.

PRESIDENT TRUMAN

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I dislike very much to let this 1st day of January go by without recalling two very significant events in American history. In April 1945 President Truman called upon the people of the country to pray for him. In December 1950, just before Christmas, he called upon them to pray for the country.

THE LATE C. FREDERICK PRACHT

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania

There was no objection.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, it is my sad duty to call to the attention of the House the recent passing of a former Member of this body from Philadelphia, the Honorable C. Frederick Pracht, who in the Seventy-eighth Congress represented the Fifth Congressional District, which adjoins mine. Those of us who served with Fred Pracht will remember him with affection and with deep regard. It was my pleasure and my privilege to be associated with him on terms of great friendliness over a period of many years before he came to Congress and afterward.

Fred was a man of notable amiability, tact, good humor, and kindliness. He had many of the qualities which make friendship come so easy as between men. Unlike so many Members of Congress who have grown to like every minute of their stay here, I think it ought to be noted in passing that Fred was fundamentally a family man and devoted to his family and his immediate coterie in Philadelphia, and he did, I think, at times rejoice in the opportunities to go home. Now he has gone home to join those others of his loved ones who wait for him in the land beyond dreams, in the place prepared for him by the Most High.

THE LATE HONORABLE AMOS HENRY RADCLIFFE

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I have the sorrowful duty of announcing to the House the death last Friday of a distinguished former Member of this body from my congressional district, the Honorable Amos Henry Radcliffe, who would have been 81 years of age on January 16, next. He lived in Paterson, N. J., and his service in the House was in the Sixty-sixth and Sixty-seventh Congresses, March 4, 1919–March 3, 1923. There are now nine Members still serving in the House who were colleagues of Mr. Radcliffe.

Altogether, Mr. Radcliffe served 18 years in public life. For 5 years he was a Passaic County assemblyman in the New Jersey State Legislature, 1907–12. Then from 1912 to 1915 he was sheriff of Passaic County. In 1916 he was elected mayor of Paterson, serving two 2-year terms. He was a life-long Republican and was a delegate to State and National conventions of his party.

Mr. Radcliffe attended the public schools of Paterson, was graduated from the Paterson High School and from the New York Trade School. He became a blacksmith and ornamental and structural ironworker for his father, the late James Radcliffe. He joined his father's firm in 1896 and was made secretary when the business was incorporated in 1907.

In addition to becoming a director of the Franklin Trust Co. in 1916, Mr. Radcliffe was also a director of the United States Trust Co., the Paterson Savings Institution—now the Paterson Savings & Trust Co.—and the Clifton Trust Co. He was also president of the Frankham Realty Corp. and of the Ben Lynn Corp.

In 1888 Mr. Radcliffe joined the Second Regiment, National Guard, and was honorably discharged as a sergeant in 1894.

Fraternally, Mr. Radcliffe was a past master and life member of the Benevolent Lodge 45, Free and Accepted Masons; a member of Cataract City Chapter, Royal Arch Masons; Terry Council of New Jersey; Melita Commandary, Knights Templar of New Jersey; a life member, Mecca Temple, Ancient Arabic Order, Nobles of the Mystic Shrine of New York City; a member of the Paterson Lodge, BPO Elks; Paterson Lodge, Loyal Order of Moose; William Parker Council, Junior Order, United American Mechanics; Pioneer Camp, Modern Woodmen of the World; Silk City Lodge, Order of Heptasophs; and National Association of Engineers 2 of New Jersey. He was also a member of the Hamilton and Masonic Clubs, and the Phelps Outing Club of Greenwood Lake.

He was married to Ruth Hartley in 1897. Before her death a few years ago she was an active member of the Paterson Park Board.

He is survived by three children, James S. Radcliffe, of Lafayette, N. J.; Hartley E. Radcliffe, of Sparta, N. J.; and Mrs. Emma R. Wright, of Baleville, N. J.; also four grandchildren, Susan, Frances, and Jim Radcliffe; and George F. Wright.

Editorially eulogizing Mr. Radcliffe, the Paterson Morning Call last Saturday pointed to his administration as Paterson's mayor and said:

> It ran as smoothly as any within the writer's recollection. He insisted only on being consulted on political appointments and the men he named to the various boards were honorable and given a free hand. None violated the trust he reposed in him.

The Call also recalled that soon after he was first elected mayor Mr. Radcliffe called upon a severe critic to become a member of the city's board of public works and when the latter declined he permitted him to suggest another competent man for the appointment.

> It was a natural thing for Amos Radcliffe to gravitate toward politics because he liked people, was an excellent mixer, and made friends easily—

Editorialized the Paterson Evening News last Saturday. The News went on to say that—

> Mr. Radcliffe leaves an honored name with many pleasant memories.

According to the Passaic Herald-News, in its editorial eulogy, Mr. Radcliffe was "like other American ironmasters whose grandsires learned their trade at English forges." The Herald-News continued:

> He had rugged health, a buoyant step, and undiminished energy for almost all of his 80 years, and like Longfellow's blacksmith he looked the whole world in the face for he owed not any man.

While it had been impossible for Mr. Radcliffe to visit Washington in recent years due to failing health, I made it a point to call upon him shortly before the convening of each session of Congress. I admired him for his intense patriotism, his ready wit, and his down-to-earth expressions. He was terribly concerned about the state of our country because of its spending policies. He feared that any destruction of our American way of life would come chiefly from within. Occasionally, he sent me a brief message of reassurance and cheer as I sought to act wisely on the problems facing the Congress.

Amos Radcliffe spoke often of some of his old friends in the Congress, particularly EARL MICHENER, whom he was wont to describe as his ideal of a true Congressman. He was extremely sorry to learn some few months before his passing that Mr. MICHENER had decided to retire this year.

My predecessor also never forgot two of the faithful employees of the House who were very kind to him during his service, Republican clerks James P. Griffin and John McCabe, both of whom corresponded with him and visited him at his Paterson home.

Mr. Radcliffe always insisted that our Nation's strength rested in the type of man that Ralph Waldo Emerson described in his poem, A Nation's Strength.

In closing, I quote a few lines therefrom:

> What builds the nation's pillars high
> And its foundations strong?
> What makes it mighty to defy
> The foes that round it throng?
> Not gold but only men can make
> A people great and strong;
> Men who, for truth and honor's sake,
> Stand fast and suffer long.
> Brave men who work while others sleep—
> Who dare while others fly—
> They build a nation's pillars deep
> And lift them to the sky.

CLARENCE CANNON,
GEORGE MAHON,
MICHAEL J. KIRWAN,
JOHN TABER,
R. B. WIGGLESWORTH,
Managers on the Part of the House.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the conference report on the bill H. R. 9920.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I think we had better have the conference report read. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read the conference report as above set out.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, this report includes all items in the supplemental appropriation bill with the exception of the Senate amendment proposing to provide contract authority for additional cargo ships and the amendment striking out the transmission line from Buggs Island Dam to Langley Field, and two of three technical amendments, which it is necessary to bring back in disagreement in order to comply with the rules.

The bill, as originally passed by the House, carried appropriations totaling $17,809,304,424. The Senate added $2,163,000,000, bringing the bill up to $20,247,062,938, of which $224,000,000 is contractual authority. The bill, as recommended by the conference committee, aggregates $19,941,412,938.

Mr. Speaker, the bill is essentially a defense measure, and for that reason we have included every dollar requested by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Secretary of Defense, and the Bureau of the Budget. Wherever there has been any question the doubt has been resolved in favor of the budget estimate.

Mr. MCCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MCCORMACK. The gentleman has told me, but there are other Members who would like to know because of the interest in the hospital construction appropriation. Will the gentleman state what happened with reference to that?

Mr. CANNON. We reached an agreement in conference on the hospital item, and added $10,000,000 above the budget estimate for that purpose. The item is included in the conference report.

I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, this bill, as it comes from the conference, calls for nearly $20,000,000,000. Probably with reappropriations and funds made available, very nearly $21,000,000,000.

The greatest part of it is for the war effort. I just want to say that the people of the United States are going to be called upon for tremendous sacrifices in connection with that war effort.

I want to warn the Defense Establishment that in connection with the war effort they must just as far as it is humanly possible guard against unnecessary waste and extravagance in purchasing and building the things that are required, and that they must get the best prices possible for everything for which they are provided funds. We remember too well the numbers of occasions where someone like the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ENGEL], who was on the military subcommittee for years, found enormous waste in the construction of camps. A better job than that must be done. We must not have the purchase of things for the stockpile to such an extent that prices are built up to the point where the war effort is handicapped. We must not have the purchase of things that will spoil in a short time. We must have a more intelligent approach to all of these things than we had before, and I hope that the Defense Department and all those connected with it will take heed of what I have said here today, because I am sure that the Congress intends to follow it up to the limit.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I have asked the gentleman to yield to tell us whether or not the bill does not carry provision for more civilian employees for the Defense Department than we had in proportion to the number of men in the armed services during World War II.

Mr. TABER. I do not know that I can answer that question, but it does call for a very large number of civilian employees. On the other hand, of the number of employees that are to be used probably 85 percent are in arsenals, navy yards, and such places rather than in clerical work.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. If the gentleman will yield further, Mr. Speaker, the House has a special committee which has been making an examination or investigation of overstaffing in various Government departments and a report, I understand will be submitted which will show that there has been great overstaffing and waste of manpower in civilian employment within the Government. I am wondering what steps, if any, the Committee on Appropriations is taking to make certain that there will not be such overstaffing of civilian employees in connection with the war emergency.

Mr. TABER. I would not say that the committee has taken any action as yet. I understand, however, that it is the intention of the committee to follow these appropriations through and to try and see that there is just as little waste as possible and just as little unnecessary employment as possible.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. CANFIELD. Would the gentleman also include a warning against the ten percenters and the five percenters who, it is reported, are resuming operations again?

Mr. TABER. Yes; and the guys who go out and get small manufacturers out in the country to give them $500 or $600 and do nothing for them. That is a terrible fraud, and it is going on right now. I ran into several cases of it while I was home last week.

Mr. CANFIELD. I had a similar experience.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. I am glad the gentleman from New York made the statement that we are going to watch the armed services in reference to the letting of contracts. I can cite instances I know of, for instance, wool, which a year ago was worth $1.05 a pound. Today wool is worth $2.50 on the market. The Government is going in now and stockpiling at the highest price of wool I have ever known. Furthermore, the specifications covering various items for the Army are so complicated that it is made very difficult for the people of this country to get wool. If the Army takes it all and if they do not make some agreement with Great Britain, who now controls the wool market of the world, we will be in a bad fix. Great Britain is pulling the wool over the eyes of the American people because they control it and the State Department will not do anything to help get this wool from Great Britain. I asked Mr. Howard 3 months ago why he had not stockpiled more and he said that he had gone to the State Department to get permission to stockpile and he was prohibited from doing so. That is when wool was worth $1.25 a pound. Now they want $2.50 for the same item.

Mr. TABER. I think there is a great deal to what the gentleman has said. But we have a terrible situation that the State Department has brought on to us through these reciprocal trade agreements by which they have practically killed off the American sheep producer, put them out of business, and as a result we have not any defense against gouging on the part of the nations outside who own the outside wool.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. It is my understanding that there are some who, anticipating this huge expenditure for defense, are going beyond the 5 percent and the 10 percent classification. They are going back to the small-business men and small concerns representing themselves as supersalesmen able to go into these various departments and get huge defense orders. They are setting themselves up in lush offices here in Washington so that these businessmen have to carry the load and are trying to get big defense orders for them beyond the 5-percent classification.

Mr. TABER. Does not the gentleman think they are trying to get the money out of these poor suckers to a greater extent than they are trying to get contracts?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I think the gentleman is quite right.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAHON].

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I think it appropriate at this time to point out that the other body made no material changes in the military portions of the appropriation bill now before us. As Members are aware, those of us who are conferees on this bill have been required to be away from the House sessions for much of the afternoon in order to work out with the Senate conferees the final language of the bill now before us in the form of this conference report. The bill is, of course, vital to our defense effort.

However, there was one rather considerable change in the military part of the bill. The House version of the bill provided $100,000,000 for use in connection with civilian relief behind our lines in Korea to support our Army effort. In view of the fact that the portion of Korea which we now have under our control is much smaller than formerly, this item was cut in half by the Senate. The House went along with that figure. The $50,000,000 would seem to be entirely adequate. Otherwise, there is no change whatever of consequence in the military portion of the bill.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAHON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. Is there anything in this bill for the rearming of the North Atlantic Pact nations?

Mr. MAHON. There is nothing in this bill for the rearming of the North Atlantic Pact nations. In this connection it might be pointed out that funds previously appropriated to assist in the rearming of these nations would not necessarily be used for rearming those countries in the event they should be overrun. The airplanes, the tanks and the guns produced for those countries would become immediately available to this Government in the event they were not used by our allies.

Mr. RICH. How are you going to have them available for this Government if you ship them over there and if they are overrun and if some of those governments do not care whether they are overrun or not and are not going to fight very much? If they take possession of those implements of war and use them against us, what are you going to do then?

Mr. MAHON. This Congress has appropriated this year $5,200,000,000 for assistance to other free nations in building up their military establishments. Much of that money has been obligated, but most of it has not been spent. Most of those weapons have not been delivered, and until they are delivered, they will be available to this country. And, furthermore, it is our hope that other free nations will not be overrun.

Mr. RICH. Are you going to see that this money is appropriated and given only to those nations who really want it, who really want to protect themselves, who really want to defend themselves in case of aggression rather than to have us go over there and say, "Now, in case something happens, we want you to be on our side, and we want you to do the fighting?" If they are not willing to go in there and defend themselves, then you ought not to send them one cent's worth of military supplies.

Mr. MAHON. The gentleman from Texas feels as does the gentleman from Pennsylvania that no funds should be appropriated to rearm countries that are not willing to fight for their own liberties and support the efforts of the United States to promote peace.

Mr. RICH. You have done it before. You armed Russia to the tune of $12,500,000,000 and you armed China to the tune of $2,500,000,000. Now, are you satisfied we did that? Be careful what you do or it will come right back; it will be a bomb against you in the end if you do not keep your eyes open.

Mr. MAHON. Of course, the issue of rearming other free nations is not involved in the pending measure.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAHON. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAHON] has a congressional district which lies very close to the great mohair producing subdivision of that great State, and I should like to ask him this question as relates to the point made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH]. If through this $5,000,000,000 appropriation or other types of appropriations or through plan 4 or the Marshall plan we are to pour billions of dollars into the treasuries of other countries, why is it not logical—I am asking this question; I am not defending the proposition but I am talking about the logic of it—why is it not logical—and I might say, political—to assist those countries through paying to them very, very high prices for the raw material that they ship to us, and do business straight over the counter instead of channeling it through the so-called Marshall plan, plan 4, or otherwise? Would the gentleman care to comment on that phase?

Mr. MAHON. I doubt that we have the time to discuss that matter but the gentleman raises a very important question.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If we are going to do the job, I think we may find it will be more constructive all the way through to pay the prices through the commodity markets instead of channeling them through these subterranean avenues.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the conference report.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present. However, I will withdraw that, if the Chair will permit me to make a statement to the effect that my vote be recorded at this place in the negative.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's statement will appear, of course, in the RECORD.

The conference report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 1: Page 2, line 1, insert the following:

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CANNON moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate Numbered 5, and concur therein with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum of $10,000,000 named in said amendment, insert "$7,000,000."

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 6: On page 5, line 19, insert the following:

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CANNON moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and concur therein with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert:

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I offer a preferential motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. THOMAS moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment No. 6 and concur in the same.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division of the question.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 6?

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CANNON moves that the House concur in the amendment of the Senate numbered 6 with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert:

"MARITIME ACTIVITIES

"SHIP CONSTRUCTION

"The first proviso in the paragraph under the head 'United States Maritime Commission, ship construction' in the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1951, is hereby amended by striking out 'December 31, 1950' and inserting in lieu thereof 'June 30, 1951.'

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, really the question—to put it in different language—is simply this: you will vote on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri. His motion is to reduce for cargo ship construction the over-all sum of $350,000,000, by $224,000,000. The motion that the gentleman from Texas has made is to keep intact the $350,000,000 as voted by the other body.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. CANNON. The motion of the gentleman from Missouri is not to reduce the amount. It is to adopt the language of the budget estimate.

Mr. THOMAS. May I say to my distinguished friend that he may make his own speech on his own time. But you certainly do not deny that you are taking off $224,000,000?

Mr. CANNON. I certainly do. We are not moving to reduce the amount at all.

Mr. THOMAS. That is exactly what your motion is, and I certainly am surprised at my distinguished friend in not being a little more frank with the House.

Mr. CANNON. Furthermore, when this very identical question was before the House, they voted down this same motion.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not yield to my friend any further. If I may proceed with my statement, may I say that we all love our friend, and if he is confused, will you just forgive both of us?

Now, Mr. Speaker, of course the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] in truth and in fact lops off $224,000,000. Let me give you quickly in chronological order a history of things that have been going on in the full committee and in the Independent Offices Subcommittee. This item came to your subcommittee for $126,000,000 to build 15 or 16 fast cargo ships—fast 20-knotters. We have nothing that will go faster than 10 knots now, with the exception of 75 others that will go 15 knots.

Perhaps one of the many errors in judgment which we made during World War II was to build these slow ships, every one of which has to be convoyed, which means a loss of time, a loss of manpower, and a loss of dollars. The Maritime Commission, the White House, the Navy, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and everybody, says that we need these fast cargo ships. These ships will be able to travel without a convoy. Look at the time you are going to save. Look at the manpower that the Navy will save. They will have a helicopter at either end to protect themselves. They will have torpedo tubes and they will have guns. They will weigh around 13,000 deadweight tons and will cost anywhere from $6,500,000 to $7,000,000. They will require from 11 to 14 months to build.

Your subcommittee unanimously raised the budget estimate from 16 of these ships to 50 because they told us that they would have to have several hundred of them. We cannot go to Sears-Roebuck catalogue and get these ships. It takes from 11 to 14 months to build one of them. Let us reactivate these yards on the Atlantic and on the Pacific and in the Gulf and get our labor started and trained, and let us start building these ships.

My distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], our able and genial chairman, did not like the unanimous vote of our subcommittee, and he just overturned it. I do not know by what authority, but my hat goes off to him. He really overturned it. I think he whispered to the clerks in a firm voice and said, "Just take it out." I love him for that.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMAS] has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. THOMAS. Let me thank the gentleman from Missouri. He is a gentleman and a scholar and one of the ablest men in this House.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Should not the gentleman from Texas, with whom I agree, point out that the Senate put it back as contract authority; so that the actual amount of money involved is not an addition to the present budget?

Mr. THOMAS. That is right; $224,000,000 contract authority, but in the final analysis there is no difference, because it has to be paid.

The subcommittee was unanimous, five to nothing. We came to the full committee, and we had a closed session and a little friendly argument among ourselves, and we had a vote, and, by about 2 to 1, we put it back in. It came to the House, there was some confusion, and it went out on a point of order. Over in the other chamber the Senate put it back in. Now, that is the situation. The question is very clear. Do you want to build some fast cargo ships, when the Navy, the Bureau of the Budget, the White House, and the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and everybody says we need them?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. CANNON. The White House and everybody else the gentleman mentioned says we do not need them in this bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Now, you are too smart a man to make that statement, if you will pardon me for chiding my friend. It came up as a budget item for 16. Now, did your people send you up here to let some CAF–8, or 9, or 10, in the Budget Bureau tell you what to do? If they did, you can do it. My people did not send me up here to do that, and I am going to follow my own judgment, and the House of Representatives is supposed to provide the money, and not the Bureau of the Budget. I think we are going to be too little and too late, if we do not keep this item in here.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. RICH. You made the statement that these vessels were built during World War II.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, no, no. They have not been built. We are trying to get them started, and it takes from 11 to 14 months to build them.

Mr. RICH. Well, where are those slow ships?

Mr. THOMAS. They are laid up in the reserve fleet at various points throughout the country. They do not make more than 10 knots an hour. They must go in convoy, and in convoy they make about 7½ knots. Do you know how long it will take these ships to get to our boys in Korea? Forty-five full sailing days. With these ships that we are trying to build, we can get that time down, from 45 days to about 19 days.

Mr. RICH. Where are the ships you built during World War II?

Mr. THOMAS. You have got about 1,600 of them. That is what I am trying to tell you now. They will only make about 7½ knots an hour.

Mr. RICH. Did not the same White House, did not the same Budget Bureau, and did not the same people who advocate this and who were doing these things that they did when they built these slow ships, now come in here and tell you to do something different?

Mr. THOMAS. No. No.

Mr. RICH. If you are going to follow them now, you ought to get new people down there.

Mr. THOMAS. I will say to my distinguished friend that it is a different set of people. Of course, we are not following the budget. That is what we are trying to get away from. We are trying to move a little faster than the budget.

Mr. RICH. Well, the way the budget has been moving and spending for the last two or three decades, it is about time we got away from them.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. CANFIELD. It seems to me the most important executive authority is Admiral Cochrane, Chairman of the United States Maritime Commission.

Mr. THOMAS. Do you want me to tell you what he said?

Mr. CANFIELD. Yes; that is what I want the gentleman to tell the House.

Mr. THOMAS. And the admiral said, "I have got to defend this budget; but if you will let me tell you what I think, we have got to have several hundred of these vessels, and the more we build now the better off our fighting boys are going to be."

Mr. CANFIELD. I am glad the gentleman said that; that is why I am going to vote to support the gentleman.

Mr. THOMAS. Why build these guns, tanks, planes, and implements of war if you cannot deliver them when you need them?

Mr. CANFIELD. The gentleman is right.

Mr. THOMAS. Now, let us vote down the motion of my distinguished friend to cut out $224,000,000 which virtually cuts out 34 of these ships; then when the motion to recede and concur comes along, vote for it and put the money back.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. THOMAS. Let me thank my genial chairman for yielding to me.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. PHILLIPS].

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Mr. Speaker, the question before us is how much responsibility we as individuals are willing to take on a chance we may delay the production of ships for carrying material, munitions, and men to fighting zones.

Mr. Speaker, if we could use some of the money it has taken to rebuild and redecorate this Chamber and buy a first-class crystal ball, we might know what to expect. Since we cannot, we have to decide today whether we will start ships, open shipyards, and train men at once, to have the ships ready when they are needed. I think there is no doubt that they will be needed. Many of the old slow ships now laid up will be used but they were built because that was the design that could be built more quickly at that time.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. I yield.

Mr. COLMER. Did I understand the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMAS], to say that the Joint Chiefs of Staff had recommended this?

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. I have no report of that, but I do know that the Maritime Commission and Admiral Cochrane, whom the gentleman from Texas quoted, came before us; and I also heard the testimony before the Senate committee, and the testimony there was even stronger that we must get these boats started now.

Mr. COLMER. Before the gentleman leaves that subject, I understood the gentleman from Texas to make that statement.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. I heard the gentleman from Texas make it.

Mr. COLMER. Then I understand that so far as the gentleman has any information on that he does not deny that that is true.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. I think it is very likely true; I simply did not know it myself. I do know that all five members of my subcommittee representing both parties were unanimous in feeling that this money should be put in, and we were joined by the gentleman from Massachusetts who was chairman in the preceding Congress, who sits beside me.

Mr. COLMER. Finally, is it not true that we have in the final analysis to rely upon the recommendation of our military authorities?

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. I would much rather rely upon them than on the Budget Bureau which is trying to maintain a rule that you cannot increase the budget after it has once been agreed on, and whose decisions are often made weeks or months before we consider the requests.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield,

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. I yield.

Mr. MAHON. I do not think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMAS] while he is here and can speak for himself, said that the Joint Chiefs of Staff had recommended these additional ships above and beyond the budget. Insofar as I know the Joint Chiefs were not called upon to make recommendations for or against the idea of additional cargo ships. The testimony shows that Admiral Cochrane said that additional ships would be helpful.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. I think he said that.

Mr. MAHON. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMAS], if I understood his viewpoint, indicated that the top officials of the Government recognized the great need for fast cargo vessels in the event of full-scale war. That was my understanding of the remarks.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. There is no question of that. The important thing is not who recommended or who did not recommend; the important thing is that it takes time to produce a fleet of ships, to open navy yards, to train men. We should start immediately on this program. I think that our problem today is whether or not we are willing to take the responsibility of not having such boats ready when they are needed. The item in question calls for contract authorization; it does not add to the present budget.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. These are to be merchant ships?

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Yes; cargo ships.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will these cargo ships travel in a convoy?

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. They will not necessarily be convoyed. The old ships required convoys. These should be fast enough to move without convoy.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. My understanding from the Department of Defense is that the snorkel submarine will go 26 knots under the surface and 30 knots on the surface and that these ships having 20 knots would not be able to get away from them. With that picture in mind, it does not seem to me that the approach to it on the part of the gentleman from Texas and the subcommittee is realistic. I do not see how a 20-knot ship can run away from a 26-knot submarine.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. I have not the time to give the gentleman a technical description of how it is done. We asked the same question in subcommittee. I think the answer to the gentleman from New York is that I would rather have them go 20 knots than 7½ knots.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH].

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, in my judgment the House made a mistake, and a serious one, when it eliminated the construction of all fast cargo ships from the bill now under consideration.

I think the House ought to support the motion which the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMAS] has offered in order to make it possible to start construction of 50 of these ships as soon as possible.

I look at this matter solely from the standpoint of national defense.

We have been told for a long time of our need for fast cargo vessels—vessels which can outrun submarines and take care of themselves. Korea and the general picture in the world today have served to emphasize this need.

These ships, if we are to believe the printed record, meet the requirement of greater speed than the submarine and of being able to proceed and to take care of themselves, without benefit of convoy.

I have known Admiral Cochrane, present head of the new Maritime Board for a number of years as a high-ranking naval officer—I have confidence in him. He has already been referred to.

I want to quote one sentence from the record of the hearings before the Senate Appropriations Committee in this connection. I think it is important.

Senator HILL asked Admiral Cochrane the following question. I quote:

> Is it the idea that these ships would be so fast that they would outrun a submarine—if they found a submarine there they could outdistance it?

Admiral Cochrane replied, and I quote:

> They will outrun any submarines that we know about today.

Mr. Speaker, the truth of the matter is that Admiral Cochrane asked the Bureau of the Budget for the construction of 50 of these ships. Your Subcommittee on Appropriations after careful consideration recommended to the full committee the construction of 50 of these ships. Your full Committee on Appropriations by record vote recommended to the House the construction of 50 of these ships.

The Senate Committee on Appropriations after hearings on the subject also recommended to the Senate as a whole the construction of 50 of these ships. And the Senate as a whole in approving the measure before us, also gave its approval of the construction of 50 of these ships.

Sixteen ships, Mr. Speaker, are better than no ships but I personally think that 50 ships is a very reasonable request in the light of probable requirements.

We need the ships for national defense. We need the construction of the ships for national defense. In my opinion, we are going to need a lot more than 50 of these ships before long.

It takes from 10 to 14 months to build any one of these ships. Time in terms of national defense is of the essence. We should go along with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMAS] and permit construction of 50 ships to be started at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. SHELLEY].

Mr. SHELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the position taken by the gentleman from Texas. I think there are several factors in connection with this issue that the Members of the House who may not come from coast line areas should know. This country, through two World Wars, has found itself without a merchant marine and has found it necessary to depend upon foreign merchant marine shipping to carry ammunition, men and supplies abroad. In haste we then built vessels of a type that could be speedily built, but vessels not of an economical nature to serve in peacetime, and not actually adequate in war, except that we were able to build so many of them because of our productive capacity. Those are the vessels that are laid up in our various ports now. They are not adequate for the problem with which we are confronted. Secondly, we do not have a merchant marine that is modern and up to date. The Maritime Board now proposes to meet both of these problems. If we get into an all-out war, if we get into any expansion of that situation with which we are now confronted as a country, we cannot depend upon liberty ships, an antiquated and obsolete type, powered by triple expansion reciprocating engines with a top speed when new of 10 knots; they were an emergency job. We need fast new prototype cargo and troop-carrying vessels, Diesel or electric turbine powered and capable of maintaining over 20 knots cruising speed for long periods; vessels equipped for a "fast turn-around" and with far more modern cargo-handling gear than the "libertys." The Dutch and the English and other foreign nations are building 20-, 22- and 24-knot vessels. We do not have vessels to compete with them in peacetime, and we cannot always depend upon their vessels to carry our men and our supplies in wartime. We should get into this program immediately, and I think it is just as much a part of our national defense as building tanks, airplanes or arms for the men in the field. The program will take some time to get into. We do not build a ship overnight, but after the first one, two or three vessels are built, then you speed up your program. The shipyards are lying idle throughout this country, and foreign countries are busily engaged in building new, fast ships. The so-called No. 1 enemy of this country and of democracy throughout the world is for the first time in its history recognizing the importance of sea power in world affairs, and Russia is now building battle vessels and fast cargo-carrying vessels, as well as a huge fleet of submarines. Is this country going to be found wanting again for the third time and depend on chartering foreign vessels and using vessels that are laid up because they do not meet the purpose? I think the proposal made by the gentleman from Texas should be kept in the bill and should not be stricken out. It is all too modest to meet the needs. This is a subject and a problem which I have repeatedly urged action upon before this body. My remarks of July 10, 1950, and September 8, 1950, calling attention to the critical need have received wide support from those who really know the situation and the danger. We now have opportunity to take the first step in adequately meeting that danger. I strongly urge adoption of the proposal.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHELLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. JENSEN. In the gentleman's estimation, would American boys' lives be saved by the building of these additional ships?

Mr. SHELLEY. My answer is, "Yes"; definitely so.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. RABAUT. I just want to ask the gentleman from New York who sat on this committee, if the budget estimate did not call for 16 ships?

Mr. TABER. It did.

Mr. RABAUT. And I want to ask the gentleman if these ships are in any other form than the blueprint stage?

Mr. TABER. That is correct; they are not beyond the blueprint stage.

Mr. RABAUT. This is a trial order for 16 ships in the blueprint stage. They might find a lot of trouble with them when they finally have them built. So, are you going to get into a wholesale construction of these ships when you have never had one of these ships built before?

Mr. TABER. That is one of the things that disturbs me tremendously.

Mr. RABAUT. And they cost $7,000,000 apiece.

Mr. TABER. That is correct.

Mr. RABAUT. You do not know whether they will be the success they predict they will be or not.

Mr. TABER. We do not. If they do what Admiral Cochrane said they would do, go 20 knots, they will not be fast enough to go without convoy against the 26-knot snorkel submarines under water and 30 knots on the surface.

Mr. RABAUT. Another thing is, we are going to have the defense forces before us again before long, at which time, if they want to revise their order and stay within the budget estimates, they can do so.

Mr. TABER. That is correct.

To my mind, the provision for 15 or 16 of these ships is exceedingly liberal, because they are unproved. On top of that, in building them we are following the pattern which got us into trouble in the last war, where we built a couple of thousand of these Liberty ships, that the gentleman from Texas told us a minute or two ago would do only 7½ knots. Now we are going to build another bunch that will not do the job. I want to see us design ships that will do the job, and then I am ready to give them the money.

The gentleman from California told us that other nations were building ships that would do 22 and 24 knots. I want to see our folks design ships that will do at least 26 knots, so that they would be some good to us in this situation we are facing, rather than go ahead with a lot of ships that will do 20 knots which will not serve the purpose we desire to have brought about. That is the position I take.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. THOMAS. Most of us certainly admire the judgment of my distinguished friend from New York, although I am afraid he has gone a little far afield today, but I wonder if the gentleman would want to stop the purchase of some five or six thousand airplanes we are buying now on the theory that they are brand new planes and we do not know whether or not they are going to work.

Mr. TABER. The planes we are ordering on a quantity basis are pretty well tried out.

Mr. THOMAS. Does not the gentleman know that we have been building cargo ships in this country for the last 100 years, and there is no error in these ships? The gentleman knows that.

Mr. TABER. There is plenty of error in those old Liberty ships that will do only 7½ knots.

Mr. RABAUT. That is the point I was going to make. We are talking about error in ships. We have ships galore in mothballs that they claim they cannot use today.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. COLMER. The statement was made by the gentleman from Michigan that none of these ships had been tried out, that they would all be new. Does not the gentleman know that there is now one of these ships, a prototype, already under construction.

Mr. TABER. I did not understand that anything was beyond the blueprint stage. That is what I have been told. That is the information that has come to me. Maybe it is wrong.

Mr. COLMER. I have just had some information to the effect that under a contract a prototype ship is now being built along this line. It happens that it is being built in my home town. That is the reason I happen to know something about it.

Mr. TABER. I read the hearings of Admiral Cochrane before both committees, and I did not see anything about it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Part of the question I desired to ask the gentleman from California [Mr. PHILLIPS] was this: If these new ships to make 20 knots an hour are to be convoyed, how can the speed of such ships be utilized with the slow-moving other ships that must go along with the convoy?

Mr. TABER. They cannot go in a convoy with slower ships. That would not do. The only way they could go in a convoy and have it successful would be to have all the ships of about the same speed.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is the next point I want to develop. Where are the other ships which are necessary in the make-up of a convoy, or a train, we will call it, with the necessary speed to meet the 26- or 30-mile speed of the submarines?

Mr. TABER. There is nothing in sight that can do that.

Mr. RABAUT. They are to be equipped with helicopters. The helicopters are supposed to be their protection. They are not supposed to go in convoys.

Mr. TABER. They would not be able to go ahead and get anywhere unless they had more speed than 20 knots.

That is absolutely certain. Why we should attempt to build ships that will go 20 knots when other countries are building them at 22 and 24 knots is a little beyond my understanding. If this was for the benefit of our national defense, I would be for it, but I do not see it.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. I am given to understand that at the present time, or at least in the recent past, the Maritime Commission has authorized the selling of ships capable of doing 18 knots to private enterprise on the Great Lakes. Can the gentleman enlighten the House in that respect?

Mr. TABER. I understand they have been negotiating for them and I supposed that they had sold them some of these Victory ships which some people say will do 14 and 15 and 16 and 17 knots. I do not know. But I understand that that is the story—they are negotiating for them and getting ready to move them.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. I wonder if the gentleman would inquire of the proponents of this bill whether or not they have information along that line.

Mr. RABAUT. What does the gentleman want to know?

Mr. TABER. Are they the Victory ships that will go 15, 16, and 18 knots?

Mr. RABAUT. I think they are not the troop-carrying type, but the cargo-carrying ships. I think they have been negotiating for 10 of those ships to be transferred to the Great Lakes for the purpose of carrying ore. You certainly need ore for the war effort.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. We certainly need both types of ships.

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. BURNSIDE. What evidence does the gentleman have that submarines can make 26 knots?

Mr. TABER. Only what the Defense Department tells us—that is all I have. I do not have anything better. I do not know any other way that you can get any better information.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. I gather in referring to the fact that there may be submarines that can go faster than 20-knot ships, the gentleman is thinking in terms of a submarine overtaking a ship. Is it not true that a 20-knot ship is better able to get near a safer or a friendly shore or a friendly fleet than a 14-knot ship?

Mr. TABER. Unquestionably. On the other hand, if other nations can build faster ships we ought to get designs out that would enable our ships which we are building do the job which they are supposed to do. We made a terrible mistake in World War II in building too many of these Liberty ships which have turned out to be absolutely helpless in this particular; and we will get into the same boat again unless we are careful as to how we proceed.

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. RABAUT. I am certain the gentleman does not want to leave the impression that we do not favor any of these ships. We are in favor of 16 of these ships as approved by the budget.

Mr. TABER. That is correct. Frankly I think it is a very liberal figure considering the fact that they are not fast enough on the basis of our knowledge today as to the conditions that they will have to meet at sea.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. DINGELL. There is no guaranty that this type of ship, of which the committee provides for the construction of 16, traveling at the rate of 20 knots an hour cannot be hit by a 44- or 48-knot-per-hour torpedo? Is there any guaranty that because they have a 20-knot speed that they will not be hit by a 44- or 48-knot torpedo?

Mr. TABER. There is no guaranty.

Mr. DINGELL. Of course not. Moreover, do we have any guarantee that these ships can go without a convoy?

Mr. TABER. We do not.

Mr. DINGELL. There is no guaranty, and no one else can give me that guaranty. The convoy is the safest thing. It is indispensable to delivering the goods. Unless you can build a ship that will travel about 36 knots an hour, like a good fast Chris-Craft, you might just as well forget the 20-knot an hour ship and claiming immunity for such a ship from submarine attack with submarines now traveling at the rate of 26 knots an hour which have 44- to 48-knot torpedoes, and even torpedoes that travel at a higher rate of speed. It just cannot be done. It does not make common sense. I can understand this demand from some of our shipbuilding centers, Mr. Speaker, because I think it will mean more business to them, but when you have an order of 16—a trial order—I think that is sufficient.

Mr. TABER. It seems to me that we ought to vote for the motion that has been made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON].

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] has again expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, this is not an unimportant matter. The country is at war. We are confronted by perhaps the most serious situation the country has faced in its history.

One of the bottlenecks is money. We do not have the financial resources we had when we fought the First World War. We are not where we were financially when we fought the Second World War. We have hanging over us a stupendous debt. And nothing has been paid on it. We have been engaged in deficit spending ever since 1941 and are spending twice our income today with the prospect of accelerated disbursements.

And, we are finding it difficult to borrow more money. For 3 months this last summer although we were in a bond-selling campaign, more bonds were cashed than we were able to sell.

Furthermore, everything we buy today costs twice what it cost during the Second World War. The cost of war materials and military armament has advanced enormously. We are in desperate need of money. It is one of the most vital factors in the war.

To meet this appalling situation we must not only levy additional taxes but we must discontinue all spending not absolutely essential and we must spend such funds as we have with the greatest care. It must be put where it counts most. We must not spend more money than is urgently required and certainly we should not spend more money than the military authorities have asked for. They have not asked for this additional money.

My good friend from Texas [Mr. THOMAS] has made some of the most astonishing statements here. In the first place, he said the pending motion is to reduce $350,000,000 for cargo ship construction by $224,000,000.

Mr. Speaker, we do not propose to decrease the bill by one penny. The motion is at the desk and speaks for itself. Then the gentleman from Texas said I directed the clerks to take the item out. No such instructions were given. The item was never in the bill. It was never voted for by more than three Members until after the bill was printed and was never at any time voted unanimously by the subcommittee. The gentleman from Texas further said the Maritime Commission, the White House, the Navy, and the Joint Chiefs of Staff say we need these additional ships. The Maritime Commission, the President, the Navy, nor the Joint Chiefs of Staff have never made any such statement to anybody under any circumstances at any time anywhere. The printed hearings are before us and there is no such intimation. If there is then let us have the book and the page. We talked again to the Bureau of the Budget this morning and they said nothing has developed since the hearings that would warrant any increase in the $126,000,000 asked for the 16 ships.

Now, what is the situation? The Bureau of the Budget sent up a request for 16 ships. They are experiments. They are in the blueprint stage. We do not know what they can do. We can only guess what they might do. As the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] said, that seems a very liberal allowance when we do not know what they will do. If we should go wholesale and build 50 ships when steel is hard to get, when all supplies used are strategic materials, and these ships will only travel 20 knots an hour, we will waste a large part of everything we put into them.

We already have cargo ships. We have 2,021 in moth balls at this time. They are serviceable, because during this Korean war we have taken 151 of them out of moth balls, and they are now in service. The only difference between that ship and the ship they propose to build is possibly 5 knots an hour.

As has been said, these new Snorkel submarines will travel 26 knots. How is a 20-knot ship going to run away from a submarine that travels 26 knots?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the gentleman have any competent authority on earth to the effect that there is a submarine in being now that will make 26 knots?

Mr. CANNON. We were told that during the hearings.

Mr. THOMAS. Our own Navy has some snorkel submarines, and no one claims that they will make more than 10 or 12 knots an hour. Admiral Cochrane testified that these 20-knot ships—bear in mind, we do not have one single ship that will make 20 knots an hour—but he testified that these 20-knot ships will outrun any known submarine. If he does not know, who does? He built all of our submarines in World War II and is the outstanding authority in America.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there have been some loose statements made here about these submarines making 26 knots. We certainly do not have one; and, as far as the Navy and our naval architects are concerned, they do not know of one on earth that will do it. Let us be perfectly frank about it. Why build 16? Why build 1 if they are experiments? But these are not experimental ships; they are practical, everyday cargo ships, and we need them and need them badly.

Too little, too late. Let us not have that hurled at us.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman makes the statement that these are not experimental ships. Not one has been built; they are still in blueprint stage. We do not know what such a ship it will be until we have built one. They want to build 16 ships. That is all they ask. Let us build the 16 ships and see what they will do; then if they are a success we can proceed with others.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If any or all of the Members of this distinguished body wish to come to my office I will show a current report on this experimental shipbuilding proposition that will open your eyes on this debate, because they are full of bugs. You have got to rout the bugs out by building a few and trying them out under the pressure of their normal use.

The chairman of the committee is right. This is an experiment. It is a public record. I will show it to you if you will come over to my office.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Michigan makes a statement axiomatic in ship building. In spite of every effort to build 20-knot cargo ships for the last 100 years no ship has ever been launched that would make that speed. What ground is there for believing that we can just go out and build 50 ships offhand that will do what no previous ship has done. Such ships are purely experimental and 16 is enough for a try-out.

Mr. Speaker, what little money we have we must make go as far as possible. And we must follow the best advice we can get in spending it. The gentleman from Texas says he will follow his own judgment in preference to that of the Defense Department and the trained Army and Navy officers who appeared before the committee and recommended the 16 ships. The managers on the part of the House do not have such confidence in their own judgment. We believe in critical times like these, when the very safety of the Nation is at stake, we should be guided by those who have made a life study of means of national defense. This item is a part of a great program, a coordinated program; it is related one part with another. When we propose to increase some favored item in the program it unbalances and dislocates to that extent the remainder of the program. We appeal to the House not to disorganize the program recommended by General Marshall, General Bradley, General Collins, Admiral Sherman, and General Vandenberg. They say this is all the money they need for these ships for the present. They do not recommend that we build more than 16 ships of this type at this time. It is merely a question of whose judgment the House prefers to take when our troops are falling back before an aggressive enemy overseas, with every prospect of more serious contingencies.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DINGELL. I think the experts are talking now with some sense. It was not so very long ago that the experts were telling us that the battleship was obsolete. If instead of following their advice and sinking a number of them at Bikini we had retained them and had them to use against both coasts of Korea we would be better off.

Mr. CANNON. All that the committee is asking today, Mr. Speaker, is that we follow the program laid down by the Bureau of the Budget, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and the Department of Defense. I trust the House will agree to the motion of the conference committee.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. THOMPSON. In order to vote for the Thomas amendment, as I understand, we must first vote down the Cannon motion.

The SPEAKER. Yes; the Cannon motion must first be voted down.

The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on motion of the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. THOMAS) there were—ayes 94, noes 95.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and forty-six Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

So the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMAS].

The question was taken; and the Chair being in doubt, the House divided and there were—yeas 127, noes 82.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 8: Page 11, strike out all of lines 3 to 11, inclusive.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 12: Page 12, line 7, insert:

"SALARIES AND EXPENSES

"For an additional amount for 'Salaries and expenses', $3,250,000; and the limitation imposed by section 103 of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1951, on the amount available for travel expenses under this head, is increased from '$260,000' to '$300,000'."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 15: Page 13, line 10, insert: "Provided, That both of the limitations under this head in the Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1951, on the amounts available for travel expenses are hereby repealed."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 17: Page 13, line 22, insert: "Provided, That purchases and contracts for supplies or services may be made by the Authority during the fiscal year 1951 without regard to any provisions of law relating to advertising or competitive bidding.'

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 22: Page 30, line 8, insert:

"CHAPTER VIII

"DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

"(Out of revenues of the District of Columbia)

"OFFICE OF CIVIL DEFENSE

"For an additional amount, fiscal year 1951, for 'Office of Civil Defense,' $337,500; and appropriations granted under this head for the fiscal year 1951 shall be available for personal services without reference to the civil-service and classification laws."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CANNON moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 22, and concur in the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert:

"CHAPTER VIII

"DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

"(Out of revenues of the District of Columbia)

"OFFICE OF CIVIL DEFENSE

"For an additional amount, for 'Office of Civil Defense,' $250,000; and appropriations granted under this head for the fiscal year 1951 shall be available for personal services without reference to the civil-service laws as related to recruitment."

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 23: Page 30, line 17, insert:

"CHAPTER IX

"FOREIGN AID

"Whenever he determines that such action is essential, the President may from time to time utilize, for the effective carrying out of the purposes of the China Area Aid Act of 1950 (title II of Public Law 535, 81st Cong.), not to exceed in the aggregate 5 percent of the funds made available for the fiscal year 1951 for the purposes of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948 (Public Law 472, 80th Cong.), as amended."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CANNON moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 23, and concur in the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the words "5 percent" named in said amendment, insert "3 percent."

The motion was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider the votes by which action was taken on the several motions was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LANE] is recognized for 15 minutes.

STOCKPILING WORSTED FABRIC

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, on June 5, 1950, I introduced H. R. 8707, which would authorize, for a temporary period, the purchase by the Government of worsted fabric in amounts sufficient to maintain normal production and employment in the worsted-fabric industry, to promote the national welfare, and for other purposes.

One of these other purposes was to establish a stockpile of worsted fabric to insure that adequate supplies will be favorable for the common defense in any future emergency.

The Korean war broke out suddenly—several weeks later—while my bill was put to bed by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, where it has been dead to the world ever since.

Meanwhile, a summer of hard fighting passed and when the bitter Korean winter hit our troops, there was much criticism that winter clothing was not supplied to them in time.

Now it could not have been that winter came as a surprise, because it is one factor that cannot be adjourned, amended, or otherwise put off. It has a habit of arriving on time.

Back here in the States, there has been a decrease in civilian demand for worsted fabrics. At the same time, with a curious sense of unreality, the procurement agencies of the Department of Defense have been slow in setting forth requirements and placing orders. Not only have they been UN-ready. Even with a war that is 6 months old, and with new men coming into the Armed Forces by the thousands, they hesitate on the first and fundamental necessity of providing them with uniforms.

Who is responsible for this stubborn and criminal neglect?

The finger points to the Munitions Board.

For verification of this charge, I refer you to the third report of the Preparedness Subcommittee of the Committee on Armed Services of the United States Senate, dated November 27, 1950. Many months before this, my efforts in this matter were prompted by concern for the woolen worsted textile industry of New England which furnishes employment to tens of thousands of workers. It occurred to me that the jobs of these people could be protected by Government purchases of the goods they produced, during those periods when civilian demand slackened. We had established the precedent of protecting farm income. We could do no less for industrial workers.

Since then, the merits of this proposal have become national in scope, because the security of this Nation is threatened. The new levies coming into the Armed Forces, whose numbers will swell into the millions, need clothing and equipment to do their job of protecting the free way of life from aggression. And clothing comes first.

Apparently the policy of the Munitions Board is to make haste slowly for the Strategic and Critical Materials Stockpiling Act was passed by the Congress as far back as June 7, 1939, and was amended as of July 23, 1946.

But when one looks for results, early in 1951, and at a critical moment in the history of this Nation, one is stopped by the statement of the Munitions Board that it will not reveal figures concerning the stockpile of wool.

Previously this hush-hush attitude gave rise to suspicions in the Congress that our wool stockpiling program was a "paper program" at best. Early in 1950, the Senate Armed Services Stockpiling Subcommitte decided to investigate the mystery. They were shocked by the lack of performance which they discovered. When the casualty lists from Korea started coming in, and the Nation realized that a police action had turned into a full-scale war, Congress authorized in a supplemental appropriation bill the procurement of 100,000,000 pounds of wool textiles, yarns, and other wool products, for the purpose of creating a war reserve. Even though the Defense Department subsequently took steps to secure 30,000,000 pounds of wool, and 70,000,000 pounds of wool products for the war reserves, no substantial amounts of either have been acquired.

The Munitions Board is deliberately ignoring the lessons that were learned during World Wars I and II. In both conflicts we were caught without a sufficient supply of wool to meet stepped-up demands. In 1917 and 1918, the shortage was so serious that shoddy was used in the manufacture of military uniforms and blankets.

According to the Preparedness Subcommittee's report—November 27, 1950—there is no wool in the strategic materials stockpile.

The United States produces scarcely more than one-quarter of the wool it consumes in a year. Current production is about 230,000,000 pounds, grease base, as against a consumption of about 800,000,000 pounds annually.

We have been obliged for many years to import wool to meet our ordinary requirements. With the early shortages of World War II still fresh in our minds, and with the press keeping us informed that Russia was actively bidding for the Australian crop since the end of the war, the Munitions Board was given ample notice to stockpile without delay. But it ignored every competent warning. As a result, we will have to pay much, much more for the wool now—if we can get it—than we would have had to pay in 1947, 1948, and 1949, when we still had a substantial supply of home-grown wool in the Department of Agriculture inventory.

The Agriculture Department, at the end of World War II, had 400,000,000 pounds of wool. The supply held by the British Empire came to 1,500,000,000 pounds. This was possible because such large consuming areas as Europe, Japan, China, and other sections of Asia were excluded from the market, due to war conditions.

Beginning in 1947, these reserves were used up rapidly and were exhausted by 1949.

This was no secret to the Munitions Board.

CLINTON P. ANDERSON, former Secretary of Agriculture, and present Senator from New Mexico, urged the Board to secure some of the Department's wool stock for the strategic materials stockpile in a letter dated February 11, 1947.

The Board vaguely replied that the matter was being studied.

On four separate occasions, from May 1947 to April 1950, the Interagency Textiles Committee, which operates as a lesser voice within the Munitions Board set-up, asked that wool or wool products be stockpiled.

On January 13, 1949, the experts on the Industry Advisory Subcommittee on Wool of the Munitions Board recommended the stockpiling of garments as well.

But the "study" went on, while the wool disappeared, and the war clouds gathered.

Even after the Korean war had started, the Board refused to get going.

Maybe the stockpiling funds were less than adequate, but that does not absolve the Munitions Board. The clear fact is that 460,000,000 pounds were offered to the Board, which it refused.

Why?

The answer to this is hidden in the labyrinth of bureaucracy.

If the Board failed to carry out the duties vested in it by the stockpiling law because it was the prisoner of some higher authorities who secretly instructed it to ignore the law, then those responsible must be searched out and discharged from the service of this Government.

The Senate Armed Services Subcommittee has warned that, if rapid mobilization is ordered, it might well result in inadequately clad troops.

The alternative to this is a mobilization insufficient for the security of our Nation should the international situation worsen.

All because of the tragic failure of the Munitions Board, and the failure to take action on H. R. 8707, which I introduced on June 5, 1950.

In the spring of 1950, with the able assistance and support of the Honorable James P. Meehan, mayor of Lawrence, Mass., and of Mr. John A. O'Hearn, chairman of the Greater Lawrence Citizens Committee for Industrial Development, I urged the stockpiling of worsted fabrics to insure that adequate supplies will be available for the common defense in any future emergency.

On December 20, 1950, I brought the seriousness of the wool situation to the attention of Dr. Steelman's office at the White House.

Gentlemen, the American people are looking for purpose and direction from those to whom they entrust leadership. They are disturbed by the fumbling indecision, of which the failure to stockpile wool and to stockpile worsted fabrics is a glaring example.

In the present state of emergency we cannot excuse a continuance of those failures.

It is up to this Congress to initiate a full-fledged program to make sure that we get adequate reserves of critical materials and to supervise those agencies delegated with the responsibility so that our authorizations will be obeyed.

It is time for the Munitions Board, in particular, to wake up to the fact that we are at war.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] is recognized for 15 minutes.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON LOBBYING ACTIVITIES

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, the House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities, of which I have the honor of being chairman, has completed its assigned task. Our committee was directed to conduct and did conduct an investigation of lobbying activities by private groups, and by Government agencies. As a result of our investigation, we have concluded:

First. The existing safeguards on lobbying by Government agencies are adequate. The General Accounting Office, the House Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, and the Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments are performing their assigned duties in an efficient manner, and no change is needed in the Federal law dealing with lobbying by Government agencies.

Second. The passage of the Federal Lobbying Act in 1946 was an important step toward the preservation of our system of representative government, since it provides for the identification of pressure groups which seek to influence Congress.

Third. During the 4 years since the passage of the Lobbying Act, America has been supplied with a wealth of information about pressure groups by the reports filed under the Lobbying Act.

Fourth. More information can and should be obtained about pressure-group operations. We have made specific recommendations to achieve this aim in our final report, as I will note more specifically later.

Fifth. There should not be regulation of attempts to influence legislation, but only identification of pressure groups and the sources of their support.

Sixth. Most of the money spent to influence legislation is spent in advertising and pamphleteering—attempting to influence legislation by use of the printed word to arouse public opinion, and thus influence legislation by indirect means.

Seventh. The Lobbying Act applies to direct lobbying and it applies to indirect lobbying. It covers advertising campaigns which seek to influence legislation, and it covers mass pamphleteering campaigns where thousands of leaflets or booklets are distributed to the public or Congress to affect legislation.

Eighth. The Lobbying Act applies to all attempts to influence legislation which involve substantial amounts of money. Some organizations and individuals, anxious to avoid revealing the identity of their financial backers or the way they spend money to influence legislation, had contended that the Lobbying Act applies only to those whose principal purpose is influencing legislation. Our committee made a careful study of the Lobbying Act, of its legislative history, and what is most important, of the legislative history of the bills from previous Congresses from which the Lobbying Act was drawn.

We have concluded that the principal-purpose section does not limit the coverage of the Lobbying Act.

Our complete legislative recommendations are as follows:

(a) Exemption of radio and television broadcasting from the act, which already excepts newspapers and other periodicals.

(b) Deletion of the word "lobbying" from the title of the act because the word has an evil connotation to many people.

(c) Repeal of the section which prohibits convicted lobbyists from attempting to influence legislation for a 3-year period after conviction.

(d) Simplification of reporting requirements to require less detailed reports of expenditures.

(e) Exemption from the provisions of the act for all persons spending or receiving less than $1,000 a year to influence legislation.

(f) Prohibition of contingent fee lobbying agreements.

We have also included in our report several administrative recommendations:

First. We urge that Congress designate subcommittees at the present time within existing committees to maintain constant surveillance over Lobbying Act compliance.

Second. The Legislative Reference Service should be utilized to provide Congress with more information based on Lobbying Act filings.

Third. The Justice Department should enforce the Lobbying Act as a positive law designed to furnish information, and not as a criminal statute designed to punish.

Fourth. Congress should conduct a special investigation of lobbying to influence action by agencies in the executive branch, a subject which was not within the assigned task of our committee.

Fifth. Congress should give consideration to the desirability of establishing a permanent Joint Committee on the Legislative Process, at some time in the future, to administer the Lobbying Act and the Corrupt Practices Act, since there is a closs relationship between the influencing of legislation and the influencing of elections.

I want to take this opportunity to express my sincere and heartfelt thanks to the members of the committee for their cooperation in the work of the committee. It has been a pleasure to work with my colleagues on the committee, and they have given a great deal of time and thought to these problems. Thanks again.

SENATE

TUESDAY, JANUARY 2, 1951

(Legislative day of Monday, November 27, 1950)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, as the gateway of an old year has noiselessly closed behind us with its final record of "what we have written, we have written," may its mistakes and failures be left in the merciful shadows of the past. With renewed powers and with renewed souls, returning to the high tasks of this national chamber of deliberation, to Thee we turn with a solemn sense of our own inadequacy. With the dim lamps of our own devising we cannot find a sure and clear path through the tangled maze of this stricken generation.

Be Thou the guardian and guide of the unbeaten way our feet must take. Above all, give us a consuming passion, not for our own way but for Thy holy will. May Thy kingdom come to us and through us. May no cherished resentments, no camouflaged selfishness, no ingrained prejudices choke and clog the channels of our public service. Enlarge our spirits to meet the stupendous dimensions of these epic days. We ask it in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

On request of Mr. LUCAS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Friday, December 29, 1950, was dispensed with.

GEN. WALTON H. WALKER

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the Nation has been deeply shocked by the tragic loss of a brave and gallant soldier, Lt. Gen. Walton Walker.

General Walker had served his country with devotion and distinction for more than 40 years. He was a soldier's soldier who was loved by all ranks. As a battlefield leader during World War II he was almost without a peer in his ability to strike with sudden and devastating force. He was George Patton's strong right arm.

His performance as commanding general, Eighth Army, in Korea, has been as brilliant as any in the history of American fighting men. The tragedy of his death occurred at the peak of his career and at a time when our country sorely needs every fighting heart and valiant spirit.

General Walton Walker was from Belton, Tex.

We from Texas take great pride in the achievements of General Walker. He was a true Texan.

The position of Army commander carries with it the rank of general. General Walker was serving in that capacity as commanding general, Eighth Army, with the rank of lieutenant general. His promotion had been recommended, but had not at the time of his death actually been officially processed.

Yesterday the House, by House Joint Resolution 556, unanimously approved authority for the President to issue posthumously to General Walker a commission as general, Army of the United States.

There is a very recent precedent for this action. Last year the Congress, by joint resolution, authorized the President to issue posthumously to the late John Sidney McCain a commission as admiral, United States Navy, to date from September 6, 1945. This joint resolution was adopted by the Congress in recognition of the late Admiral McCain's distinguished service to our country during World War II.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House Joint Resolution 556 so that our action will be taken before the time General Walker is laid to rest today in Arlington Cemetery.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the joint resolution by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 556) to authorize the President to issue posthumously to the late Walton Harris Walker, lieutenant general, Army of the United States, a commission as general, Army of the United States, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object, because I am heartily in favor of the joint resolution—I should like to ask whether the joint resolution has been reported unanimously by the committee?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I will say to the distinguished minority leader that the committee has not had an opportunity to consider the joint resolution. However, I did discuss it with the acting chairman of the committee, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], the ranking minority member of the committee, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE].

Mr. WHERRY. I merely wanted the RECORD to show that it is agreeable to the membership of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 556) was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has received a communication from the President of the United States in regard to the joint resolution passed a moment ago with reference to General Walker. Without objection, the letter and accompanying paper will be referred to the Committee on Armed Services, and the letter will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The letter is as follows:

DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: I recommend the enactment of legislation which would permit the posthumous appointment of the late Lt. Gen. Walton H. Walker to the grade of general in the Army of the United States. I believe that General Walker's outstanding accomplishments as commanding general of the Eighth United States Army in Korea fully entitles him to this recognition. He proved himself to be a brilliant military commander, and his indomitable courage was an inspiration to all the troops under his command.

Attached is a draft of a joint resolution which would authorize this appointment. I hope that it may receive prompt consideration by the Congress.

Sincerely yours,

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

ELMER BELLER—VETO MESSAGE (S. DOC. NO. 249)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Senate, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

JANUARY 2, 1951.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE:

Attached hereto is a sealed envelope from the President of the United States addressed to the President of the Senate of the United States, received by me at 12:48 p. m. on December 29, 1950, which purports to contain a veto message on the bill (S. 1528) for the relief of Elmer Beller.

Very respectfully,

LESLIE L. BIFFLE,
Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed:

To the United States Senate:

I return herewith, without my approval, S. 1528, for the relief of Elmer Beller.

This enrollment proposes to reimburse Mr. Beller for expenditure of his own funds paid to private physicians and hospitals for treatment of injuries received by him during the course of his civilian employment with the Federal Government.

Some time ago Mr. Beller filed a claim with the Bureau of Employees Compensation, Department of Labor, seeking the recovery of these same expenditures. I am informed that the Bureau of Employees Compensation is now in a position administratively to settle Mr. Beller's reimbursement claim under the terms and procedures of the Federal Employees Compensation Act.

Since the enactment of the present bill into law is unnecessary, I feel obliged to withhold my approval from it. As a matter of principle, I believe that it is always more desirbale to bring about recompense for obligations of the United States under the provisions of general law than to resort to the enactment of private legislation.

S. A. HEALY CO.—VETO MESSAGE (S. DOC. NO. 250)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Senate, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

JANUARY 2, 1951.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE:

Attached hereto is a sealed envelope from the President of the United States addressed to the President of the Senate of the United States, received by me at 12:48 p. m. on December 29, 1950, which purports to contain a veto message on the bill (S. 1816) for the reimbursement of the S. A. Healy Co.

Very respectfully,

LESLIE L. BIFFLE,
Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed:

To the United States Senate:

I return herewith, without my approval, the enrolled bill (S. 1816) for the reimbursement of the S. A. Healy Co.

The bill provides for payment to the S. A. Healy Co. of amounts not to exceed $51,485.99 and $40,887.97, under certain Navy contracts held by it, as reimbursement for and settlement of claims against the United States arising out of increases in the rate of wages payable under the contracts.

It appears that the increases in question resulted from action by the Wage Adjustment Board which granted an application of labor in the San Diego area authorizing the payment of higher wage rates. It was not a mandatory directive to do so. Furthermore, despite the fact that this application was pending at the time claimants' contracts were entered into, the one on August 14 and the other on August 22, 1945, the bids submitted were based on existing wage rates. While it appeared at this time that adjustments of wages and material prices were imminent so far as the immediate future was concerned there were many who believed that postwar conditions might subsequently produce a period of downward readjustment in prices and wages. The work to be done under the contracts was to require several years—it was actually completed in September 1947.

The contracts each provided, as required by the Davis-Bacon Act (49 Stat. 1011), that the contractor should pay laborers and mechanics employed directly upon the site of the work at wage rates not less than those specified therein. There was no prohibition against the payment of higher wage rates: there was no guaranty on the part of the Government that prevailing wage rates might not later be higher than those specified, and there was no agreement on the part of the Government, expressly or impliedly, that in the event of a change in labor conditions, the contract price would be adjusted accordingly.

From these facts it appears that claimant company, with respect to wage and price increases, occupied a position identical with that of thousands of other war contractors who voluntarily assumed a risk in making bids on the basis of existing costs. There were other contractors who, like the Healy Co., lost money, and no reason appears why claimant company should be singled out for preferred treatment in this regard.

The courts have consistently held that only those contractors who paid increased wages as a result of Government compulsion on contracts for the Government can obtain judicial relief and that any voluntary payment of increased cost is not compensable. Furthermore, while the action of the Wage Adjustment Board undoubtedly had considerable indirect effect upon the contractor's operations, nevertheless it was not such as to render inapplicable the general rule of law that the Government as a contractor is not liable for its acts as a sovereign performed by agencies carrying out general programs in the national interest.

Every contract, either private or governmental, represents a risk voluntarily assumed by the contractor for the purpose of profit. That some of these undertakings prove to be unprofitable is unfortunate, but the Government cannot be expected to assume the financial liability therefor. There are no facts in this case which would distinguish claimant's position from that of countless other war contractors who sustained similar losses.

I do not believe that there are any equitable considerations here involved which justify my approval of this bill or which justify the granting of any relief other than that which would be afforded in a claim brought before the Court of Claims under rules applicable to all.

Accordingly, I am withholding my approval of this bill.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

LOUIS E. GABEL—VETO MESSAGE (S. DOC. NO. 251)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Senate, which was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

JANUARY 2, 1951.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE:

Attached hereto is a sealed envelope from the President of the United States addressed to the President of the Senate of the United States, received by me at 12:48 p. m. on December 29, 1950, which purports to contain a veto message on the bill (S. 2702) for the relief of Louis E. Gabel.

Very respectfully,

LESLIE L. BIFFLE,
Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed:

To the United States Senate:

I return herewith, without my approval, the enrolled bill (S. 2702) for the relief of Louis E. Gabel.

The bill provides for payment of the sum of $38,956.42 to Louis E. Gabel, an individual trading as Gabel Construction Co., of Orlando, Fla., in full satisfaction of his claim against the United States for uncompensated losses and damages sustained by him in the performance of a contract for the construction of a water-softening plant at Florida City, Fla., for the navy yard at Key West, Fla., as a result of a delay in receiving materials and equipment provided for in the contract.

The claimant was the beneficiary of a private relief act (Private Law No. 450, 80th Cong., 2d sess., July 2, 1948), which conferred jurisdiction upon the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Florida to "hear, determine, and render findings of fact as to the amount of loss and damages, if any, sustained" by him in the performance of this contract, and directed the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to him the amount so ascertained. Claimant brought proceedings under this act seeking to recover $226,251.15 in alleged losses and damages. After a full hearing before the court during which the claimant was given ample opportunity to present his evidence, the court rendered an award in the amount of $26,132.69 as representing the amount of loss or damage suffered by the claimant in the performance of the contract, and this amount was paid to him on September 27, 1949. This judgment was not predicated on any liability of the United States for the losses or damages incurred, but was arrived at solely in accordance with the directive of the private act which limited the court to a determination of the amount of such loss or damage without regard to its causation.

Thus, the claimant has had his day in court under the terms of a previous private jurisdictional relief act most favorable to him. As previously stated, Private Law No. 450 of the Eightieth Congress directed the court solely to "render findings of fact as to the amount of loss and damages sustained" and consequently precluded the raising of any defense by the United States that it was not responsible for the losses claimant incurred. The favorable treatment thus afforded the claimant was in fact made the subject of comment by the district court in the rendition of its award to him. The court stated:

The private act, conferring jurisdiction on this court for the purpose above stated, is a most unusual act. All other private acts conferring jurisdiction upon the courts for such determination, have been based on a claim for damages resulting from some alleged act of the United States, or agency thereof. In this case, no contention is made that the Government is liable for any damages growing out of the contract the Government had with Gabel.

As stated, these proceedings resulted in an award to the claimant of $26,132.69. The award thus rendered constituted a judicial determination of the amount of losses or damages suffered by the claimant which is entitled to full respect. An additional appropriation such as is proposed by this bill for the purpose of making a further payment to claimant for his alleged losses must be regarded as a simple gratuity and is entirely unwarranted.

Accordingly, I am constrained to withhold my approval from the bill.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

By unanimous consent, the following routine business was transacted:

CIVIL DEFENSE COMPACT

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the secretary of state of New Hampshire, transmitting a compact with reference to civil defense, which, with the accompanying compact, was referred to the Committee on Armed Services, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The State of New Hampshire, through its governor, Sherman Adams, duly authorized, solemnly agrees with any other State which is or may become a party to this compact, as follows:

ARTICLE 1

The purpose of this compact is to provide mutual aid among the States in meeting any emergency or disaster from enemy attack or other cause (natural or otherwise) including sabotage and subversive acts and direct attacks by bombs, shellfire, and atomic, radiological, chemical, bacteriological means, and other weapons. The prompt, full and effective utilization of the resources of the respectives States, including such resources as may be available from the United States Government or any other source, is essential to the safety, care and welfare of the people thereof in the event of enemy action or other emergency, and all such resources, including personnel, equipment or supplies, shall be incorporated into a plan or plans of mutual aid to be developed among the civil defense agencies or similar bodies of the States that are parties hereto. The directors of civil defense of all party States shall constitute a committee to formulate plans and take all necessary steps for the implementation of this compact.

ARTICLE 2

It shall be the duty of each party State to formulate civil defense plans and programs for application within such State. There shall be frequent consultation between the representatives of the States and with the United States Government and the free exchange of information and plans, including inventories of any materials and equipment available for civil defense. In carrying out such civil defense plans and programs the party States shall so far as possible provide and follow uniform standards, practices and rules and regulations including:

(a) Insignia, arm bands and any other distinctive articles to designate and distinguish the different civil defense services;

(b) Black-outs and practice black-outs, air-raid drills, mobilization of civil defense forces and other tests and exercises;

(c) Warnings and signals for drills or attacks and the mechanical devices to be used in connection therewith;

(d) The effective screening or extinguishing of all lights and lighting devices and appliances;

(e) Shutting off water mains, gas mains, electric power connections and the suspension of all other utility services;

(f) All materials or equipment used or to be used for civil defense purposes in order to assure that such materials and equipment will be easily and freely interchangeable when used in or by any other party State;

(g) The conduct of civilians and the movement and cessation of movement of pedestrians and vehicular traffic, prior, during and subsequent to drills or attacks;

(h) The safety of public meetings or gatherings; and

(i) Mobile support units.

ARTICLE 3

Any party State requested to render mutual aid shall take such action as is necessary to provide and make available the resources covered by this compact in accordance with the terms hereof; provided that it is understood that the State rendering aid may withhold resources to the extent necessary to provide reasonable protection for such State. Each party State shall extend to the civil defense forces of any other party State, while operating within its State limits under the terms and conditions of this compact, the same powers (except that of arrest unless specifically authorized by the receiving State), duties, rights, privileges, and immunities as if they were performing their duties in the State in which normally employed or rendering services. Civil defense forces will continue under the command and control of their regular leaders but the organizational units will come under the operational control of the civil defense authorities of the State receiving assistance.

ARTICLE 4

Whenever any person holds a license, certificate or other permit issued by any State evidencing the meeting of qualifications for professional, mechanical or other skills, such person may render aid involving such skill in any party State to meet an emergency or disaster and such State shall give due recognition to such license, certificate, or other permit as if issued in the State in which aid is rendered.

ARTICLE 5

No party State or its officers or employees rendering aid in another State pursuant to this compact shall be liable on account of any act or omission in good faith on the part of such forces while so engaged, or on account of the maintenance or use of any equipment or supplies in connection therewith.

ARTICLE 6

Inasmuch as it is probable that the pattern and detail of the machinery for mutual aid among two or more States may differ from that appropriate among other States party hereto, this instrument contains elements of a broad base common to all States, and nothing herein contained shall preclude any State from entering into supplementary agreements with another State or States. Such supplementary agreements may comprehend, but shall not be limited to, provisions for evacuation and reception of injured and other persons, and the exchange of medical, fire, police, public utility, reconnaisance, welfare, transportation, and communications personnel, equipment, and supplies.

ARTICLE 7

Each party State shall provide for the payment of compensation and death benefits to injured members of the civil defense forces of that State and the representatives of deceased members of such forces in case such members sustain injuries or are killed while rendering aid pursuant to this compact, in the same manner and on the same terms as if the injury or death were sustained within such State.

ARTICLE 8

Any party State rendering aid in another State pursuant to this compact shall be reimbursed by the party State receiving such aid for any loss or damage to, or expense incurred in the operation of, any equipment answering a request for aid, and for the cost incurred in connection with such requests; provided, that any aiding party State may assume in whole or in part such loss, damage, expense, or other cost, or may loan such equipment or donate such services to the receiving party State without charge or costs; and provided further, that any two or more party States may enter into supplementary agreements establishing a different allocation of costs as among those States. The United States Government may relieve the party State receiving aid from any liability and reimburse the party State supplying civil defense forces for the compensation paid to, and the transportation, subsistence, and maintenance expenses of, such forces during the time of the rendition of such aid or assistance outside the State and may also pay fair and reasonable compensation for the use or utilization of the supplies, materials, equipment, or facilities so utilized or consumed.

ARTICLE 9

Plans for the orderly evacuation and reception of the civilian population as the result of an emergency or disaster shall be worked out from time to time between representatives of the party States and the various local civil-defense areas thereof. Such plans shall include the manner of transporting such evacuees, the number of evacuees to be received in different areas, the manner in which food, clothing, housing, and medical care will be provided, the registration of the evacuees, the providing of facilities for the notification of relatives or friends, and the forwarding of such evacuees to other areas or the bringing in of additional materials, supplies, and all other relevant factors. Such plans shall provide that the party State receiving evacuees shall be reimbursed generally for the out-of-pocket expenses incurred in receiving and caring for such evacuees, for expenditures for transportation, food, clothing, medicines and medical care, and like items. Such expenditures shall be reimbursed by the party State of which the evacuees are residents, or by the United States Government under plans approved by it. After the termination of the emergency or disaster the party State of which the evacuees are resident shall assume the responsibility for the ultimate support or repatriation of such evacuees.

ARTICLE 10

This compact shall be available to any State, Territory, or possession of the United States, and the District of Columbia. The term "State" may also include any neighboring foreign country or province or state thereof.

ARTICLE 11

The committee established pursuant to article 1 of this compact may request the Civil Defense Agency of the United States Government to act as an informational and coordinating body under this compact, and representatives of such agency of the United States Government may attend meetings of such committee.

ARTICLE 12

This compact shall become operative immediately upon its ratification by any State as between it and any other State or States so ratifying and shall be subject to approval by Congress unless prior congressional approval has been given. Duly authenticated copies of this compact and of such supplementary agreements as may be entered into shall, at the time of their approval, be deposited with each of the party States and with the Civil Defense Agency and other appropriate agencies of the United States Government.

ARTICLE 13

This compact shall continue in force and remain binding on each party State until the legislature or the governor of such party State takes action to withdraw therefrom. Such action shall not be effective until 30 days after notice thereof has been sent by the governor of the party State desiring to withdraw to the governors of all other party States.

ARTICLE 14

This compact shall be construed to effectuate the purposes stated in article 1 hereof. If any provision of this compact is declared unconstitutional, or the applicability thereof to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the constitutionality of the remainder of this compact and the applicability thereof to other persons and circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

Given at the executive chambers in Concord this 29th day of December in the year of our Lord 1950.

In witness whereof I hereby affix my signature, pursuant to the authority vested in me as Governor of the State of New Hampshire, by section 5, paragraph V, of chapter 304 of the New Hampshire Session Laws of 1949.

SHERMAN ADAMS,
Governor.

ALLOCATION OF DAIRY MACHINERY—RESOLUTION OF WISCONSIN ASSOCIATION OF ICE CREAM MANUFACTURERS

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I have received a very important resolution adopted by the Wisconsin Ice Cream Manufacturers Association at its thirty-sixth annual convention, pertaining to dairy machinery.

I believe that unfortunately it is not generally appreciated how absolutely essential it is that a continued flow of milk and related machinery be assured for the dairy industry, if it is to be adequate to its tremendous production requirements for the defense and health effort. I thoroughly endorse the sentiments expressed by the ice cream manufacturers' resolution on this score, and promise complete cooperation toward proper allocation of machinery. I ask unanimous consent that the text of this resolution as forwarded by Paul Carver, secretary of the association, be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To Our Representatives, Senators, and All Federal Agencies in Charge of Allocation of Vital Materials:

Whereas the membership of the Wisconsin Ice Cream Manufacturers Association, during its thirty-sixth annual convention, has given due and serious consideration to its responsibility of supplying the public uninterruptedly with one of the basic seven foods during any possible emergency; and

Whereas such uninterrupted supply of such dairy food is in the greatest interest of public health and safety; and

Whereas the manufacturing and distribution of such food is, and always will be, dependent on an uninterrupted flow of necessary machinery and media of transportation: Be it therefore

Resolved, That the membership of this industry, assembled at this convention respectfully requests the House of Representatives, the United States Senate, and all other Federal agencies, having jurisdiction over such allocations, that the needs of this industry be given full consideration in the interest of such public health and safety; and be it further

Resolved, That the International Association of Ice Cream Manufacturers, its officers and directors are hereby requested to work and cooperate with all Federal agencies toward a comprehensive study of this vital question in the interest of public welfare and this industry, and that a copy of this resolution be sent to every Wisconsin Member of the House of Representatives and Members of the United States Senate.

IMPORTATION OF FURS FROM RUSSIA—RESOLUTION OF EXECUTIVE COUNCIL, WISCONSIN CONSERVATION CONGRESS

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, at the December 19 meeting of the executive council of the Wisconsin Conservation Congress, there was adopted an important resolution affecting every fur farmer in Wisconsin and the Nation; but more important, affecting our entire relations with the Soviet Union. This resolution pertained to the continued dumping of Russian and satellite furs into the United States and Canada. I have previously commented on this issue on the floor of the Senate, pointing out the terrific damage that has been done to American fur farmers.

In recent months, many longshoremen have protested against being required to unload these furs—furs which involve payments of money to Russia and to her satellites, at the very time Russian funds and Russian guns are being used to kill American soldiers.

I present for appropriate reference and ask unanimous consent, therefore, that there be printed in the RECORD the resolution received from Richard Hemp, chairman of the executive council of the Wisconsin Conservation Congress. The council consists of three committeemen from each county, who are elected to represent the people of their area on conservation affairs.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION OPPOSING IMPORTATION OF FURS FROM RUSSIA AND ITS SATELLITES INTO UNITED STATES AND CANADA

Whereas the fur markets of the United States are constantly being demoralized by large importations of furs from Communist Russia and its satellites; and

Whereas the Russian Government in past years has sold millions of dollars' worth of fur in the United States, which fact has contributed materially to the low ebb in the market on furs produced in this country and at the same time provided American dollars which may be used to increase the military strength of Soviet Russia and her satellites: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the executive council of the Wisconsin Conservation Congress assembled in session at Stevens Point, Wis., this 9th day of December 1950, That this deplorable situation be called to the attention of the President of the United States, as well as the United States Senators and Members of Congress from the State of Wisconsin that this intolerable position be corrected at the earliest possible date.

ACTIVITIES AND ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the body of the RECORD a statement prepared by the chairman of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK] giving a summary of the activities and accomplishments of the committee during the Eighty-first Congress.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY OF ACTIVITIES AND ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE SENATE BANKING AND CURRENCY COMMITTEE DURING THE EIGHTY-FIRST CONGRESS

As chairman of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, I would like to submit for the RECORD a rather brief summary of the activities and accomplishments of your committee during this Congress. It is a record to which every member of the committee contributed heavily and one of which each can be deservingly proud. I wish to express my deep appreciation to every member of the committee for his loyalty, help, cooperation, and friendship throughout this Congress during which I was privileged to serve as chairman. We were confronted with difficult, complex, and controversial legislative proposals and it was only because of the real teamwork that existed that we were able to do our job as successfully as we have.

Under the Legislative Reorganization Act the Banking and Currency Committee is charged with the responsibility of considering and acting on all matters relating to the following subjects:

1. Banking and currency generally.
2. Financial aid to commerce and industry, other than matters relating to such aid which are specifically assigned to other committees under this rule.
3. Deposit insurance.
4. Public and private housing.
5. Federal Reserve System.
6. Gold and silver, including the coinage thereof.

7. Issuance of notes and redemption thereof.

8. Valuation and revaluation of the dollar.

9. Control of prices of commodities, rents, or services.

Broadly speaking your committee during 1949 and 1950 concentrated its efforts on legislation aimed at developing and maintaining a high level of peacetime economic activity. Certain wartime controls had to be continued temporarily, but were revised to encourage and hasten the return to normal conditions, others were allowed to lapse or were terminated. Housing, the shortage of which had become so acute previous to and during the war period, was a field of major legislative concern. The banking and credit machinery of the country was made to operate on a more efficient basis. The problem of small business was investigated and legislative and other means were devised and developed for its fuller participation in the economy of the country. As the Eighty-first Congress drew to a close we were once again confronted by a need for wartime controls on production, prices and credit and for devising methods of encouraging and inducing production for defense.

The major problems and the legislation considered by your committee were for the most part highly technical and complex and much of it was highly controversial, and of tremendous public interest and concern. In all, your committee had before it for consideration during the two sessions 168 bills and resolutions and 28 confirmations. Your committee held 145 sessions of hearings and 87 executive sessions. Fifty-one reports on bills and resolutions were presented to the Senate and seven special reports were issued. Thirty-six bills acted upon by the committee became public law.

HOUSING LEGISLATION

In 1950 over 1,200,000 housing units were started—some 500,000 more than the immediate prewar peak in 1941 of 706,000 units. Your committee deserves a share of the credit for this remarkable record, for to a large extent this phenomenal achievement can be directly attributable to the many and varied programs of Federal financial aid and assistance. In the main the Federal program operated through the traditional channel of private enterprise; to a very small but necessary extent through local public bodies. The aim of all the legislation was to provide an opportunity for a decent home for every citizen.

The Housing Act of 1949 (Public Law 171, approved July 15, 1949)

The Housing Act of 1949 provided the first over-all approach to the whole problem of housing. Your committee enacted proposals which had been under consideration by the Congress since 1945, and established for the first time national housing objectives and the policies to be followed in attaining them. The declaration of national housing policy states that the general welfare and security of the Nation require the realization as soon as feasible of the goal of a decent home and a suitable living environment for every American family. The act provides that private housing enterprise shall be encouraged to serve as large a part of the total need as it can; that local public bodies shall be encouraged to undertake positive programs to assist the development of well-planned residential neighborhoods, the development and redevelopment of communities, and the production at lower costs of housing of sound standards of design, construction, livability, and size for adequate family life; and that governmental assistance shall be given where the need is not being met through reliance solely upon private enterprise.

Title I of the act authorizes the Housing and Home Finance Administrator to make loans and grants to localities to assist locally initiated, locally planned, and locally managed slum clearance and urban redevelopment undertakings. The act authorizes $1,000,000,000 in loans and $500,000,000 in grants over a 5-year period. As a condition to Federal aid there must be a feasible method for the temporary relocation of families displaced from the slum clearance area and the permanent provision of decent, safe, and sanitary dwellings at prices and rents within the financial means of such families. (First preference to such displaced families of low income is required in low-rent public housing projects provided under title III of the act.)

Title III of the act amends the United States Housing Act of 1937 by authorizing Federal contributions and loans for local programs involving not to exceed 810,000 additional units of low-rent public housing over a 6-year period. (NOTE.—The President's letter of July 18, 1950, requested the Housing and Home Finance Administrator, as a measure to lessen inflationary tendencies and to conserve materials for national defense purposes, to limit the commencement of construction of public housing to not more than 30,000 dwelling units in the first 6 months of fiscal year 1951, pending a reexamination of the public housing program in terms of the international situation.)

The 1937 act was amended to strengthen the statutory safeguards to assure occupancy of the projects by low-income families in need of adequate housing. Eligible families displaced by slum-clearance projects aided under title I of the Housing Act of 1949 are given first preference for admission to low-rent housing, with preferences among such families to veterans and families of deceased veterans and servicemen. As among families who have not been displaced by slum clearance, preference shall be extended to veterans and servicemen, and among such, families of veterans with service-connected disabilities have first preference and families of deceased veterans and servicemen whose death was service-connected have second preference.

The act fixes the limitation on the cost of construction and equipment of dwelling facilities at $1,750 per room. An increase in the cost limitation of not more than $750 per room is authorized in areas where it would not be feasible without such increase to construct sound housing. In no event may a project be of elaborate or extravagant design or materials.

The housing-research program authorized by the Housing Act of 1948 was enlarged. The Housing and Home Finance Administrator is authorized by title IV of the Housing Act of 1949 to undertake and conduct technical research and studies which will promote reduction in housing construction and maintenance costs and stimulate the increased production of housing. The Administrator shall also prepare estimates of national housing needs and encourage and assist localities to make studies of their own housing needs and markets and plans for housing and community development.

Title II of the act provided for temporary extensions (through August 31, 1949) of FHA's title I and section 608 insurance operations; also for a $500,000,000 increase in FHA's title II mortgage insurance authorization. The extensions under title I relate to small loans for home alteration and improvement and new construction and under section 608 to rental housing. The title II mortgage insurance applies to owner occupied, small- and large-scale rental and sales housing, and cooperative housing.

Title V provided a new program in the Department of Agriculture of technical services, loans and grants, and an expanded farm housing research program for the improvement of farm housing and other farm buildings.

The act directed the Director of the Census to take a census of housing in 1950 and decennially thereafter.

INTERIM HOUSING AMENDMENTS—1949

Public Law 278, approved August 30, 1949, extended FHA title I authority to insure loans for home modernization and improvement until November 1, 1949, extended FHA section 608 rental housing mortgage insurance until November 1, 1949, and increased the title II FHA mortgage insurance authorization to $6,000,000,000.

Public Law 387, approved October 25, 1949, was enacted as interim legislation pending continued consideration by the second session of the Eighty-first Congress in 1950 of other phases of the housing problem which had not been covered by the Housing Act of 1949, notably the need for developing means of providing additional housing for middle- and lower-middle-income families, and revisions in the Federal Government's secondary market facilities for GI and FHA loans. It also extended FHA mortgage insurance authorizations as follows: Title I from November 1, 1949, to March 1, 1950, and from $200,000,000 to $225,000,000. Title II from $6,000,000,000 to $6,750,000,000. Section 608 from October 31, 1949, through March 1, 1950, and from $6,150,000,000 to $6,650,000,000. In addition, it exempted certain GI home loans from restrictions on the number of such loans which might be sold to the Federal National Mortgage Association by lenders.

HOUSING ACT OF 1950 (PUBLIC LAW 475, APPROVED APRIL 20, 1950)

The Housing Act of 1950 added a new section 8 to the national housing act providing a new FHA mortgage insurance program for low-cost homes in suburban and outlying areas. This program replaces the former class 3 FHA loans. The section 8 authorization is limited to $250,000,000.

The FHA title I authorization to insure lenders against losses on home modernization and repair loans was extended to July 1, 1955. A new formula was provided which limits the total amount of such outstanding insured loans to $1,250,000,000. This amounts to an increase in authorization of approximately $5,000,000.

The FHA title II home-mortgage-insurance authorization was increased by $2,250,000,000 to a total authorization of not more than $9,000,000,000, and the program was revised to stimulate more lower-cost homes of a size adequate for family life.

The section 207 FHA rental-housing-mortgage-insurance program was amended to continue the stimulation of rental-housing construction formerly provided by the temporary section 608 rental-housing program. Provisions were added to section 207 requiring certification by the mortgagor that there will be no discrimination in the selection of tenants by reason of the fact that there are children in the families.

New provisions were added to the National Housing Act liberalizing the FHA program of mortgage insurance for projects of housing cooperatives. The act required the appointment of a new Assistant Commissioner of FHA to administer cooperative housing mortgage insurance and to furnish technical advice and assistance to such housing.

An increase of $500,000,000 in the mortgage-insurance authority under section 608 of the National Housing Act was provided in order that applications for section 608 mortgage insurance on rental housing received in the FHA field offices on or before March 1, 1950, might be processed. (Section 608 authority was a temporary emergency program and no more applications can be processed under that section.)

Section 610 of the National Housing Act was amended to make mortgage insurance in connection with the sale of war housing by the Government or any public-housing agency applicable also to the sale of war housing constructed under Public Law 671, Seventy-sixth Congress.

The FHA mortgage-insurance authorization was liberalized covering insurance of loans to finance the manufacture of houses and to finance large-scale modernized site construction of housing.

The Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944 was amended by raising the maximum maturity of GI loans from 25 to 30 years; by raising the maximum home loan guaranty from $4,000 or 50 percent of the loan to $7,500 or 60 percent of the loan; to require all homes financed by GI home loans to meet construction requirements prescribed by the Veterans' Administration; to abolish combination VA-FHA loans effective December 31, 1950; and to provide for stand-by direct home loans to veterans unable to obtain loans under the terms of the act from private sources. (Note: Down payments and maximum maturities have been changed under new anti-inflation controls.)

The Housing Act of 1950 provided for the disposition of all war and veterans' housing under the jurisdiction of the Housing and Home Finance Agency and for the transfer of the farm labor camps under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture to the Public Housing Administration for management and disposal. (Program being reexamined due to international situation.)

The Housing and Home Finance Administrator was authorized to make loans to educational institutions of higher learning for the construction of housing for their students and faculties. To provide funds for the loans the Administrator was authorized to issue and have outstanding at any one time obligations for purchase by the Treasury in an amount not to exceed $300,000,000. (Program temporarily suspended due to international situation.)

An additional authorization of $250,000,000 was provided to the Federal National Mortgage Association for the purchase of home mortgages. The new section 8 FHA home mortgages were made eligible for purchase by the Federal National Mortgage Association. GI farm home mortgages were added to the home mortgages exempted from the 50 percent limitation on the amount of eligible mortgages in a lender's portfolio which may be sold to the Association.

MILITARY HOUSING ASSISTED BY FHA MORTGAGE INSURANCE

Public Law 211, approved August 8, 1949, added a new title VIII to the National Housing Act providing additional incentives through FHA mortgage insurance to rental housing for military and civilian personnel in areas adjacent to military installations. The act also permitted the armed forces to lease portions of military reservations and to furnish utilities on a long-term basis for such housing.

Public Law 498, approved May 2, 1950, amended title VIII to permit the military services to employ architects to draft plans for military housing projects. Upon the basis of these plans and specifications prospective sponsors of projects bid competitively for the privilege of supplying the housing so that the necessity of each prospective sponsor preparing separate plans and specifications is eliminated, thus expediting and encouraging the provision of military housing by private enterprise.

ALASKA HOUSING ACT

Public Law 52, the Alaska Housing Act, approved April 23, 1949, authorized more liberal FHA mortgage insurance in Alaska, housing loans and a more liberal secondary mortgage market through the Federal National Mortgage Association, construction of sales or rental housing by the Alaska Housing Authority, housing construction and certain repair loans by the Alaska Housing Authority, and $15,000,000 in loans to the Alaska Housing Authority through the purchase of the Authority's obligations) by the Housing and Home Finance Administrator.

HOME MORTGAGE SECONDARY MARKET OPERATIONS ENLARGED

Public Law 176, approved July 10, 1949, increased the Federal National Mortgage Association authorization to purchase FHA and GI home mortgages to $1,500,000,000. The Association's authorization was further increased to $2,500,000,000 by the interim housing amendments of 1949, supra, and to $2,750,000,000 by the Housing Act of 1950, supra. See the interim housing amendments of 1949 and the Housing Act of 1950 for other provisions enlarging secondary market operations.

SALE OF SUBURBAN RESETTLEMENT PROJECTS ASSISTED

Public Law 65, approved May 19, 1949, authorized the sale of the suburban resettlement projects known as Greenbelt, Md.; Greendale, Wis.; and Greenhills, Ohio, by means of negotiated sale and without competitive bidding or public advertising, with a sales preference being given to nonprofit organizations of veterans and tenants.

MISCELLANEOUS HOUSING AND DISPOSAL LEGISLATION

Public Law 827 approved September 23, 1950, authorized the HHFA to release the trustees of Columbia University and the Citizens Veterans' Home Association of Rockland County from obligations under their contracts for the operation of a veterans temporary housing project of 1,500 units.

Public Law 218 approved August 10, 1949, provided for the conveyance of a tract of land in Prince Georges County, Md., to the State of Maryland for use as a site of a National Guard Armory and for the training of the National Guard and for other military purposes.

Public Law 737 approved August 29, 1950, provided for the conveying of land and buildings at the Fort Phillip Kearney Military Reservation, without consideration, to the State of Rhode Island.

SECONDARY MORTGAGE CREDIT ACT (HEARINGS, JULY 12, 13, AND 14, 1950)

The bill provided among other things for a private secondary mortgage corporation and for the modification of the Government's secondary market for FHA-insured and VA-guaranteed residential mortgages. After 3 days of hearings it was generally agreed by the experts attending the last day of hearings that it would be agreeable to all who were interested in the legislation to report out a bill doing the following: (1) In order to provide a completely satisfactory cushion there should be an increase of $250,000,000 authorization; (2) That the FNMA be permitted to purchase other than from the originating lender; (3) That the FNMA be permitted to prescribe specific periods for which a mortgage be held before it purchases it; and (4) That it be empowered to purchase mortgages at a discount. There was a rather general agreement that the purchase of GI loans be restricted to 75 percent of the lender's portfolio rather than 100 percent as at the present, and 35 percent of their FHA mortgage portfolio rather than 50 percent. No further action was taken.

RENT CONTROL EXTENSION

The Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended, was extended until June 30, 1950 (Public Law 31 approved March 30, 1949). The veterans preference provisions of the act were continued with amendments designed to extend the preference to housing accommodations not heretofore included. The so-called local option provision for rent decontrol was provided, requiring the Housing Expediter to terminate rent control in any city, town, or village upon receipt of a resolution adopted in accordance with local applicable law and based upon a finding that a shortage of rental accommodations no longer existed, if the resolution was approved by the Governor. As a means of adjusting hardships and inequities and as a means of determining a maximum rent, a fair net operating income criteria was provided. Provision was made for the control of nontransient accommodations in nontransient hotels in cities of over 2,500,000. Recontrol by the Housing Expediter was permitted where he decontrolled an area or when there was a recommendation of a local board, except where the Emergency Court of Appeals approved a decontrol action, or in the case where decontrol resulted from the action of a State, city, town, or village. Provision was made for hearings and appeals by landlords and tenants to the Expediter and the Emergency Court of Appeals. The Housing Expediter was given authority to issue regulations governing the eviction of tenants from controlled accommodations, thus providing for uniformity in the operation of the eviction provisions throughout the country. The Expediter was directed to provide officers in local rent offices to assist tenants and landlords in preparing applications and properly informing them as to the various aspects of the law in relation to their problems.

Public Law 574, approved June 23, 1950, extended rent control from June 30, 1950, to December 31, 1950, at which time it would be terminated unless by affirmative action (by resolution or by popular referendum) of any incorporated city, town, or village which was still under Federal rent control, it resolved that it deemed the continuance of Federal rent control necessary in that area. It provided for the termination of rent control by concurrent resolution of the two Houses of Congress and upon a proclamation by the President. It also provided for the termination of rent control in any incorporated city, town, or village if a resolution was adopted by the local governing body after a public hearing, in accordance with local applicable law. Such a resolution recommending the termination of Federal rent control must be based on a finding that a shortage of rental housing accommodations no longer exists so as to require rent control.

Public Law 880, approved December 20, 1950, provided for a temporary extension of rent control to March 31, 1951, in those areas still under rent control which took no affirmative action to extend it beyond December 31, 1950. It also provided that the term "Resolution" in the Housing and Rent Act shall not be construed to be limited to ordinances or other legislative acts.

BANKING, CURRENCY, AND COINAGE

To amend the Federal Deposit Insurance Act (Public Law 797, approved September 21, 1950)

The principal provisions of the act:

1. Reduced the cost to banks of insuring accounts of depositors by 60 percent of net assessment income.

2. Increased maximum insurable deposit from $5,000 to $10,000.

3. Simplified the basis of calculating the amount of premium required of banks for insurance.

4. Permitted Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation examiners to make special examination of any insured bank, State or National, member or nonmember, "whenever in the judgment of the Board of Directors (of the FDIC) such special examination is necessary to determine the condition of any such bank for insurance purposes."

5. Required the payment by the Corporation to the Treasury of 2 percent simple annual interest on the capital advanced to the Corporation and retired in accordance with provisions of Public Law 363, Eightieth Congress.

Reduction in cost of insurance, at first sought by reducing the rate from one-twelfth to one-twenty-fourth of 1 percent, was finally accomplished by providing that present rate of assessment be continued, but that insured banks be allowed a refund against future assessments of 60 percent of net assessment income of corporation, defined as "the total assessments which became due during the calendar year less (1) the operating costs and expenses of the corporation for the calendar year; (2) additions to reserve to provide for insurance losses during the calendar year, except that any adjustments to reserve which result in a reduction of such reserve shall be added; and (3) the insurance losses sustained in said calendar year plus losses from any preceding years in excess of such reserves." It is estimated that this change will result in a reduction of approximately 55 percent in the amount insured banks will hereafter pay for insurance of deposits as compared with amounts heretofore paid.

Conversion, merger, and consolidation of national banks (Public Law 706, approved August 17, 1950)

Permitted the conversion of national banks into, and the merger or consolidation with, State banks, essentially on the same conditions that State banks may convert into or merge with national banks.

Amendment to the Federal Reserve Act (Public Law 589, approved June 30, 1950)

Extended from June 30, 1950, to June 30, 1952, authority of Federal Reserve banks to buy directly from the Treasury, rather than in the open market, direct obligations of the United States on obligations fully guaranteed by the United States, up to an aggregate of $5,000,000,000, to meet temporary needs which otherwise would cause unnecessary fluctuations in money markets.

To permit national banks to give security in the form required by State law for deposits of funds by local public agencies and officers (Public Law 715, approved August 18, 1950)

Amended section 5153, Revised Statutes, so as to permit national banks to accept and give security for deposits of States and political subdivisions thereof, and of officers, employees, or agents of States and political subdivisions thereof in their official capacities, to the same extent as is authorized in the case of other banking institutions in the State in which the national bank is located.

Amendment to the Federal Credit Union Act (Public Law 376, approved October 25, 1949)

Increased from 2 years to 3 years the limit for maturity of loans made by the Federal Credit Union. Increased the limit of unsecured loans from $300 to $400. Placed a ceiling on regular reserves of 10 percent to deposits and limited the transfer to the regular reserve fund to an amount not exceeding fees and fines and 20 percent of the net earning of the credit union in any one year. Provided that the reserve fund could be used in addition to covering bad loans to cover other losses that might be sustained.

Bank holding bill (S. 2318) (hearings 8 days in March 1950)

The purpose of the bill is to subject all bank holding companies to control and regulation. The present law is susceptible to abuse in that it enables holding company to evade limitation upon bank expansion by refraining from requesting a permit to vote stock held, by acquiring only nonmember banks or by causing member banks acquired to withdraw from the Federal Reserve System, by definition of holding company predicated upon ownership of a majority of voting shares whereas control is exercised through smaller ownership, by absence of definition of limits within which holding companies should be permitted to expand, and by permitting unlimited holdings of nonbanking company securities, etc.

The bill would subject all bank holding companies to control and regulation and not permit some of them to escape as is now possible because of the loopholes in the definitions and the voluntary nature of the regulation under existing law.

It gives Federal bank supervisory authorities the power to control the acquisition of banks by bank holding companies and describes the factors to be considered by them in acting upon applications involving the expansion of bank holding company groups.

It requires bank holding companies to divest themselves of control over enterprises unrelated to banking.

It provides generally a more effective supervision of bank holding companies and prescribes appropriate sanctions.

It does not abolish bank holding companies or prohibit the creation of new ones. It does not prohibit bank holding companies from expanding their control over banks within reasonable bounds. It does not require bank holding companies to divest themselves of any enterprises unrelated to banking where such investments are insignificant from the standpoint of control or influence over policies.

In addition to the hearings numerous conferences and executive sessions were held in consideration of th's bill. However, it did not reach the stage of final action and on May 5, 1950, Senator ROBERTSON introduced a substitute bill (S. 3547) to define bank holding companies, control their future expansion, and to require the divestment of nonbanking assets. Senators TOBEY and DOUGLAS introduced amendments to it. It was deemed desirable not to act upon the substitute until hearings could be had on it.

Amending the Federal Reserve Act (reported March 8, 1950; passed Senate April 19, 1950)

Amended Federal Reserve Act by increasing from $10,000,000 to $25,000,000 the aggregate amount permitted to be used for construction of branch Federal Reserve bank buildings.

State taxation of national banks (S. 2547—hearings, July 20, 1950)

To amend section 5219, Revised Statutes, relating to State taxation of national banks. Existing law, originally enacted in 1864, amended in 1923 and in 1926, permits States to tax national banks by only one of four specified methods. S. 2547 would legislate certain court decisions into statute law and would clarify and reaffirm methods long used without statutory authority, and would make other minor changes. The committee on Federal legislation of the American Bankers Association and the National Tax Association, which includes State taxing authorities, have agreed on the provisions of S. 2547 as desirable legislation.

Representatives of these associations were heard in favor of the bill. No opposing witnesses appeared. The bill was not reported as the session was drawing to a close and full attention of committee was then focused on Defense Production Act.

For establishment of the National Monetary Commission (S. 1559, reported June 1, 1949, passed Senate June 2, 1949)

Established a National Monetary Commission, to be composed of 18 members, 6 appointed by President, 6 by President of Senate, and 6 by Speaker of House. The Commission could make adequate studies to determine what changes are necessary or desirable in the banking and monetary system of the United States or in the laws relating to banking and currency.

Coinage (Public Law 508, approved May 10, 1950)

To amend section 3552 of Revised Statutes so as to permit reimbursement to appropriation for Bureau of the Mint of moneys received from sale of medals and proof coins, instead of covering such funds into Treasury's miscellaneous receipts.

Public Law 221 (approved August 12, 1949) authorized the coinage of a medal for Vice President.

Public Law 509 (approved May 10, 1950) provided that losses and wastage incident to recoinage of worn and uncurrent silver coins shall be charged to the silver profit fund arising from coinage of silver bullion into coins exceeding the value of the bullion.

INTERNATIONAL BANKING

Amendment to the National Bank Act and the Bretton Woods Agreement Act (Public Law 142, approved June 29, 1949)

The act is intended to aid the marketing in the United States of securities issued by International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (World Bank) as follows: (1) Allows national banks and State member banks of Federal Reserve System to deal in and underwrite such securities up to 10 percent of its paid-in and unimpaired capital stock and 10 percent of its unimpaired surplus fund; (2) exempts such securities from provisions of Securities Act of 1933 and Securities Exchange Act of 1934, with safeguards so that Securities and Exchange Commission can suspend such exemption as it deems necessary.

Foreign investment guaranties (reported September 22, 1949) (an amended bill passed the House)

The bill would allow the Export-Import Bank to guarantee United States private capital invested in productive enterprises abroad which contribute to economic development in foreign countries against risk peculiar to such investments (inconvertibility).

HOME LOAN BANK AND SAVINGS AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS

Savings and loan industry strengthened

Public Law 576, approved June 27, 1950. The provisions are designed to strengthen the savings and loan industry, thus further aiding in the financing of homes and the encouragement of savings.

The act requires lending institutions which are members of Federal home loan banks (principally savings and loan associations) to maintain a certain minimum liquidity. In order to assure a source of funds to savings and loan associations to meet demands upon them for mortgage funds and to meet withdrawal requests by savers and account holders, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to purchase the obligations of Federal home loan banks up to $1,000,000,000. The proceeds of these obligations would be used for advances by the banks to savings and loan associations and other members of the Federal home loan banks.

The insurance protection afforded by the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation to the accounts of savers in savings and loan associations is increased from $5,000 to $10,000 for each account. The Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation is also authorized by Public Law 576 to borrow from the Treasury such funds as in the judgment of the Home Loan Bank Board are required for insurance purposes.

The act also accelerates retirement of the Government-owned capital stock in the Federal home loan banks and the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation.

Conversion of Federal savings and loan associations to mutual savings banks (S. 1175, reported September 30, 1949; passed Senate October 17, 1949)

Permits Federal savings and loan associations to convert into mutual savings banks provided State law permits mutual savings banks to convert into Federal savings and loan associations.

Branches of Federal savings and loan associations (S. 2006, reported September 30, 1949)

Amends Home Owners' Loan Act so as to place the same restrictions upon establishment of branches by Federal savings and loan associations as are prescribed by law for establishment of branches of national banks. Branches could be established only if law or custom of State permitted establishment of branches by State savings and loan associations.

RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

Restriction on employment of RFC personnel by certain borrowers (reported July 11, 1950)

Any company hereafter obtaining financial assistance from the RFC would be required to execute an agreement undertaking not to employ within 2 years after the date such financial aid is extended any personnel of the Corporation exercising discretion with respect to the making of loans to that class of borrowers, with certain exceptions.

RFC investigation

The subcommittee on the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was designated by the Banking and Currency Committee to conduct a study of the operations of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation pursuant to the terms of Senate Resolution 219, adopted February 8, 1950.

The subcommittee undertook to consider the problem of availability of capital and credit to American industries, particularly small-business enterprises; the need, if any, and its extent and character, for direct lending by the Government during a peacetime, nonemergency period. It also explored the manner in which the lending powers, and limitations thereon, as described in the law, have been interpreted and applied by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. And it examined the organizational structure and administrative efficiency of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, its procedures and costs, as well as the extent to which its policies and activities were harmonized with the broader fiscal policies and programs of the Government.

The subcommittee made a study of specific loans, believing that a discussion of broad principles and purposes unrelated to a specific factual situation would be comparatively useless in obtaining an accurate picture of the character of the activities of a public agency. It was the subcommittee's hope that by observing the actual execution of congressional policy it could assist the Congress in formulating and expressing its future policy with respect to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation with greater clarity and in greater detail.

The first of these studies was the loan to the Texmass Petroleum Co. On this study the subcommittee issued its first interim report on May 19, 1950. Some 200 or so additional loans were studied and about 30 of them were discussed in public hearings, some in considerable detail. The hearings on the loan to Waltham Watch Co. occupied 2 days and covered 200 pages of printed record.

Public and executive hearings were also held to investigate the contract between Lustron Corp., an RFC borrower, and the corporation which contracted to transport its output of prefabricated houses. There had been allegations of impropriety in the administration of this contract. The subcommittee's second interim report, dated August 11, 1950, was issued with respect to this investigation.

Under an extension of its authority, the subcommittee is required to issue its final report on or before January 31, 1951.

War Damage Corporation Act of 1950 (H. R. 9802, reported December 21, 1950)

Extends the program undertaken during World War II to provide insurance against loss of, or damage to real or personal property resulting from enemy attack, including any action taken by the Armed Forces in resisting such ttack.

MATERIAL, PRODUCTION, PRICE, IMPORT AND EXPORT CONTROLS

Voluntary agreements and plans (Public Law 6, approved February 9, 1949)

The act extended to September 30, 1949, the President's authority to approve voluntary agreements by industry, business, and agriculture concerning allocation and control of inventory. If the President requested compliance with the agreements, persons entering them were exempted from provisions of the antitrust laws and the Federal Trade Commission Act in carrying out the agreements. This was a continuation of a voluntary allocation program pending expected enactment of mandatory allocation legislation as part of a stabilization program. The Defense Production Act of 1950, approved September 8, 1950, now provides the legislative basis for voluntary and mandatory allocations.

Continuation of export controls (Public Law 11, approved February 26, 1949)

The act authorizes President to impose export controls over articles, materials, or supplies. Policy is to use such controls to protect domestic economy from an excessive drain of scarce materials and to reduce the impact of abnormal foreign demand; to further United States foreign policy; and to safeguard national security. The Secretary of Agriculture is to determine when supply of any agricultural commodity exceeds domestic requirements. Maximum penalty of $10,000 fine or 1 year imprisonment or both prescribed for conviction after violation of act. Authority terminates June 30, 1951, or earlier if Congress by concurrent resolution or President so designates.

Continuation of tin allocation (Public Law 153, approved June 30, 1949)

It extended until June 30, 1950, power to allocate tin.

Diversification of tin facilities (Public Law 148, approved June 30, 1949)

The act authorizes RFC to sell to private industry for refining low-grade tin concentrates or tin-bearing material. The minimum sales price shall be such as to require the Government to take no more loss than it would if it refined the low-grade concentrates in the Government-owned tin smelter at Texas City, Tex. RFC is to replace any material so sold by placing future contracts for delivery within 4 months.

The committee was also consulted by the Armed Services Committee relative to legislation extending the authority of RFC to operate the Government-owned tin smelter at Texas City, Tex., and to supervise operation of synthetic-rubber facilities.

Import controls on fats and oils (Public Law 155, approved July 1, 1949)

Continued until July 1, 1950, import control authority affecting fats and oils (except petroleum and petroleum products) and rice and rice products. Controls may be exercised only upon Presidential decision that they are required for orderly liquidation of surplus Government stocks (applicable to fats and oils) or for proper distribution of products in world short supply (applicable to rice).

Public Law 590 (approved June 30, 1950)

It extends import control authority on the same basis as Public Law 155 until July 1, 1951, except that it removed coconuts and coconut products from the controllable list.

Defense Production Act (Public Law 774, approved September 8, 1950)

It provided for the imposition of price ceilings and wage stabilization generally, whenever ceilings are established on materials comprising a substantial part of all sales at retail and materially affecting the cost of living. Provision is made for adjusting ceilings and wages when the President deems it necessary to prevent hardships and inequities, and the President is authorized to give due consideration to the national effort to achieve maximum production in furtherances of the objectives of the act. Exempts functions of this act from all provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act except those relating to publication of rules, opinions, and so forth. Authorizes the President to employ additional persons in GS–16 and GS–18 to carry out this act.

A joint congressional committee to be known as the Joint Committee on Defense Production consisting of five members from the Senate Banking and Currency Committee and five from the House Committee on Banking and Currency is provided for. Provisions of the act are made applicable wherever the United States has jurisdiction and the authority conferred by titles IV, V, and VI are terminated on June 30, 1951, while the authority conferred by titles I, II, III, and VII are terminated on June 30, 1952.

MISCELLANEOUS LEGISLATION AND HEARINGS

Securities Exchange Act amendments (S. 2440) (hearings, February 7, 8, 9, and 10, 1950)

The bill would extend to the investors in companies having over $3,000,000 of assets and over 300 security holders, and where securities are not listed and registered on exchanges, the same protection available to investors in listed and registered securities. The purpose of the bill was to fill in the gaps in the SEC Act which had been built up in a rather piecemeal fashion since 1933. Amendments were proposed by the SEC Commission and by several witnesses.

Public Law 161 (approved July 9, 1949)

Directed the RFC to transfer to the Secretary of State without reimbursement or transfer of funds all of the corporations rights, titles, and interest in and to certain international broadcasting facilities and property.

Public Law 135 (approved June 28, 1949)

Repeals the provision relating to $12,500,000 made available to the FWA for public works advance planning which provided that no loans shall be made or participated in by any Federal agency for the construction of any public works, plans for which have been wholly or partly financed out of this appropriation, except in pursuance of specific appropriation.

Public Law 330 (approved October 6, 1949)

Increased authorization for Joint Committee on the Economic Report from $50,000 to $150,000.

Economic power of labor organizations

(Hearings 16 days during July–August 1949)

The purpose of these hearings was to inquire into the existence and extent of economic power over trade and commerce, its concentration in a few hands, and the effect of that power on the small-business man and on prices paid by the consumer.

The necessity for this investigation was originally suggested by the report that a single individual would be authorized to speak for the coal industry in contract negotiations and that he, with a single representative of labor in the industry, could determine not only wage but also production levels. The "stabilization" strikes, the 3-day week then imposed on the coal industry by the United Mine Workers of America, the then threatening strike in steel, and the then existing tie-up of shipping in Hawaii were current developments which reemphasized the need for such investigation.

Your committee extended invitations to be heard to all the labor organizations and the coal producers, as well as to industrialists affected by existing labor difficulties. None of the labor leaders chose to appear.

The committee gathered valuable data upon the extent of the power which industry-wide labor organizations have acquired, the manner in which the power is being exercised, the effects of the economic power of labor unions in the coal industry, and in industry generally upon banking and credit policies, small-business enterprises, consumers, prices, and national economic stabilization.

However, as the remedies suggested by the spokesmen for affected industries consisted of legislative proposals that are not normally committed to the jurisdiction of your committee, it was found expedient to forward your committee's hearings and accumulated data to the Judiciary Committee. This latter committee appointed a subcommittee to inquire further into the subject. The subcommittee made legislative recommendations based upon the data accumulated and these recommendations are pending before the Judiciary Committee.

OTHER HEARINGS

Your committee also conducted hearings on a number of intermediate coinage bills, the Gold Trading Act, the extension of consumer credit control, and provision for bank reserve requirements and held a number of hearings on legislation and problems relating to the welfare of small business. The latter is covered in a separate report.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF SUBCOMMITTEE ON SMALL BUSINESS OF THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a summary, prepared by the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK], of the work accomplished by the Subcommittee on Small Business of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY OF WORK ACCOMPLISHED BY THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON SMALL BUSINESS OF THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY

It is self-evident that independent small-business enterprises are indispensable to the free-enterprise system in the United States. Small business makes up more than 90 percent of our business enterprises, employs nearly 50 percent of those working in business, and handles nearly 35 percent of the total volume of business transacted. Your subcommittee has endeavored to strengthen the position of independent small business in our economy. It is happy to report that it has assisted small business to take long steps toward more equal opportunities in competition with big business. For a complete study of the subcommittee's accomplishments in the Eighty-first Congress, see the report with recommendations made on February 9, 1950, Senate Report No. 1263, Eighty-first Congress, second session.

ROUTINE COMMITTEE TASKS

The volume of mail received by the subcommittee is particularly heavy. Whenever a small-business man runs into difficulties of procurement or financial difficulties, he writes directly to the subcommittee or to a Member of Congress to suggest new legislation in aid of small business. As 80 percent of small-business problems fall categorically within the jurisdiction of the Banking and Currency Committee, these requests for legislation are directed to your subcommittee for consideration. Actually, very few of the problems encountered call for curative legislation. Very often they are based upon a misconception on the part of the owner of a small-business enterprise, or upon inadequate or faulty regulations by the administrative agency involved. The staff of the subcommittee can often verify the needs of a small-business entrepreneur by acquainting himself more fully with his problem and advising him of the status of the law and governmental regulations. The complainant, upon finding that a particular provision of the regulation applies to his case, is able to proceed to keep his business in existence.

On other occasions the particular problem necessitates on the part of the subcommittee staff a series of conferences with governmental officials. The difficulties of small business are thoroughly discussed in the light of existing circumstances, and adjustments in regulations are made to insure the survival and prosperity of small business.

On numerous occasions the subcommittee has intervened with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in the interest of independent small business. At times, the RFC could not, under existing law, make a loan to the particular business. This was fully explained to the applicant involved and the reason for the law was made known to him. At the very least, the applicant would secure through the intervention of your subcommittee a complete and instructive hearing. At times, he received financial advice of great value. In many instances, the small-business applicant was enabled to obtain a much-needed loan. This was helpful not only to him but to the national economy, as it placed small business in a more equal competitive position with big business rivals whose sources of credit were inexhaustible. A large number of small-business men were assisted by the simple process of placing their facilities and the nature of their products before the proper procurement officers. They later received bid invitations and often succeeded in becoming the successful bidders upon valuable Government contracts.

For instance, the Continental Electronics Co. of Dallas, Tex., a small company, wished to bid on the production of a very high-powered transmitter for the State Department. The invitation to bid was so worded that independent small-business enterprises found it difficult to qualify. The Continental Electronics Co. appealed to your subcommittee. After a series of conferences with small-business companies and officials of the State Department rebids were requested and the Continental Electronics Co. was a successful bidder on the transmitter.

The following letter addressed to a member of your subcommittee is typical of the gratitude expressed by small-business companies throughout the country:

"You will recall that several months ago I discussed with you the problem facing the Continental Electronics Manufacturing Co. in connection with its and RCA's bids with the State Department. At that time, you were good enough to refer me to Bill Stewart of your subcommittee.

"Mr. Stewart gave this matter very efficient and intense attention. In the course of what ensued, Mr. Stewart made several very valuable suggestions, which we followed. The State Department asked for rebids and the final outcome is that the Continental Electronics Manufacturing Co. has been awarded the contract. This is a distinct victory for small business and results in a substantial savings to the Government.

"I want to thank you and Mr. Stewart for your interest in the matter.

"Sincerely,

"MARCUS COHN."

Your subcommittee has assisted a large number of small-business enterprises either directly or at the request of Members of the Senate by enabling them to secure the information and financial advice necessary to qualify for Government contracts. The following letter is one example of the appreciation shown by a Senator in a case where your subcommittee successfully advised a small-business enterprise and assisted it in obtaining a $500,000 contract for chairs for the Chicago Quartermaster Depot of the United States Army:

"This is to thank you for your prompt and efficient service in assisting me to help the Hale Co., Inc., of East Arlington, Vt., to obtain the award of the Chicago Quartermaster Depot, United States Army, contract for 46,000 chairs.

"I also appreciate the very helpful information you obtained for my constituent, the Gordon M. Glier & Co. of Manchester, Vt. Enclosed find copy of an appreciative letter from Mr. Glier, president of the company.

"Sincerely yours,

"RALPH E. FLANDERS."

It would be impossible to enumerate the countless numbers of individual requests which have been received from various Senators and on which the difficulties presented have been resolved satisfactorily.

In every instance wherein a complaint was made by any small business, without regard to type, nature, or location, your subcommittee has endeavored to seek individual relief and at the same time has endeavored to ferret out the weakness in the over-all policy which would permit such malpractices, either from errors of omission or commission on the part of any official of the Government.

STUDIES AND INVESTIGATIONS

Although the bulk of the subcommittee's staff work is comprised of the routine work outlined above, a large number of continuous studies and investigations are conducted by your subcommittee. One of the greatest defects of the procurement program in World War II was the limited dissemination of procurement information. In many instances small independent companies were unable to obtain timely information upon Government contracts. These difficulties continued after termination of hostilities. The staff of your subcommittee held numerous conferences and conducted intense studies with the staff of the National Defense Department and the General Services Administration. Thanks to these efforts, timely information is now being distributed through all the Department of Commerce field offices and a large number of Chambers of Commerce. Radical changes were made in the procurement program on March 1, 1950. After protracted conferences, hearings, correspondence, and telephone calls from August 1949 to March 1950, finally a detailed program was approved by the Department of National Defense. The new program was nationally acclaimed by individual small-business men and small-business associations. The following letter received from a small-business owner is typical of the reaction to your subcommittee's accomplishment with respect to the dissemination of procurement information:

"DEAR SENATOR: This letter will serve as an anniversary celebration since finally after 1 year's work on the part of your committee and self we are now in a position to close our files on the matter of procurement information through the Department of Defense.

"Unbelievable as it may sound, during the past few weeks, the balance of the agencies that have not heretofore complied have reconsidered their previous position and are now furnishing us with the public information that had been denied us for so long. I cannot praise your efforts and those of your committee too highly; without your constant work on this matter we probably would still be on a nip-and-tuck basis with the procurement agencies.

"Particularly at a time like this, when more and more manufacturers are seeking defense orders we are now able to furnish them with the information that they need and are entitled to receive.

"Your willingness to personally intercede in this matter as often as you have was undoubtedly the guiding factor in bringing this matter to a satisfactory conclusion. I would like to thank you for your past favors.

"With very best regards,

"Sincerely,

"HENRY SCHARF."

In June of 1950, your subcommittee started receiving requests from small companies for assistance in securing much needed steel sheets in order that they could continue in business. These requests were greatly multiplied after the outbreak of war in Korea. Inasmuch as the voluntary steel-rationing program had ended some months before, and no allocation powers were in force at that time, your subcommittee held several conferences with several large steel companies to find a way out of the impasse. Informal agreements were made with these companies. As a result, requests for assistance from independent small-business enterprises were accepted by the large steel companies and channeled to the proper distributors for the orders to be filled. The large steel companies, upon investigation of the needs of these smaller companies, offered your subcommittee the fullest cooperation and in a great many instances made it possible for small-business enterprises to stay in business.

This informal arrangement remained in effect until Public Law 774 was approved on September 8, 1950. Since then all requests for critical materials are being channeled to the staff of the National Production Authority where they are being acted upon with great dispatch.

Through frequent negotiations with the various departments, your subcommittee has been influential in encouraging them to organize divisions devoted to the interests of independent small business. The Department of Commerce, the Department of Defense, General Services Administration, the National Production Authority, and the Department of Justice have Small Business Divisions designed to be of assistance to independent small businesses and promote their interests. Your subcommittee staff works in close harmony with the staffs of these various divisions.

In many instances complaints of small-business enterprises resulted in action by your subcommittee's staff in cooperation with the Federal Trade Commission. For instance the staff cooperated in investigations pertaining to small paint manufacturers. Many of these, especially in the Pacific Northwest are being hurt by the discriminatory distribution policies of producers of titanium dioxide, which is monopolized by certain large producers. This action by the subcommittee has resulted in much needed relief to a large number of small paint manufacturers and it is hoped that a permanent satisfactory solution may be worked out.

The staff of your subcommittee has also investigated the alleged discrimination in the sale of nylon yarn. Finding that this was a matter which could be handled efficiently by the Federal Trade Commission, it was referred to that Commission for necessary field work to determine the underlying facts. Several investigations have been conducted which pertain to situations within the chemical industry which threaten to exclude many small firms from participating in Government contracts. Many of these involve secret information pertaining to the Atomic Energy Commission or the Office of International Trade which cannot be discussed in a public document.

Assisting independent small business to participate in the program of the Economic Cooperation Administration and conferring with the ECA in designing its programs to be of the fullest opportunity to small business is a continuous activity of your subcommittee.

At present your subcommittee is investigating the effect of regulation W of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System upon the small taxi owner. In regulation W, exemptions are made for trucks, busses, funeral cars, vehicles for hire of 10 or more passengers, or equipment for business purposes. Taxicabs are not on the exempt list. The charge is made that this discriminates against the small taxi owner in favor of large corporations which own vehicles of 10 or more passengers. Another discrimination is found in the $5,000 limitation beyond which consumer credit controls do not apply. The staff of your subcommittee is meeting with the staff of the Board of Governors with a view to making proper adjustments designed to place the small taxi owner in a more equal competitive position with large rival taxi owners without vitiating the intended effect of regulation W.

Those are but a few of the large number of studies and investigations being currently conducted by your subcommittee. Most of them result in direct action being taken not only for the survival but for the increased vitality and prosperity of independent small-business enterprise the health of which is vitally connected with a vigorous national economy.

LEGISLATIVE FUNCTIONS

Besides the routine work, the studies and investigations which have been discussed above, your subcommittee has exercised its traditional legislative functions. It has examined the various bills and amendments pertaining to small business which have been introduced and referred to the Banking and Currency Committee. Many of the objectives of these bills were reached through the amendment of administrative regulations as has been explained previously. Your subcommittee and its staff have made valuable contributions to the work of the Banking and Currency Committee by injecting considerations of the interest of independent small-business enterprises in all pending legislation. For instance, your subcommittee assisted in drawing plans in aid of small business for the Economic Cooperation Administration in hearings held on June 6, 1949. Your subcommittee stressed the interest of independent small petroleum producers and petroleum distributors in the hearings on petroleum prices on June 29 and 30, 1949. In July and August 1949, your subcommittee brought out facts of interest to small-business enterprises in the hearings on the effect of economic labor organizations. Similar contributions to the understanding of the needs of small business were made in August 1949, in the hearings to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act and in January 1950, in the hearings to amend the Federal Deposit Insurance Act, and in March 1950, in the hearings on the Bank Holding Company bill. For instance, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation Act, increasing the insurance from $5,000 to $10,000, is expected to have a substantial beneficial effect upon small country banks in particular. Your subcommittee is determined to exert its influence to insert in any amendment to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act provisions designed to assist promising independent small-business enterprises to obtain adequate credit in their struggle for survival in the war conditions that inevitably favor monopolies. In short, there is no legislation emanating from the Banking and Currency Committee which is not scrutinized closely to determine its effect upon small business, and proper amendments are attached to all bills to insure favorable consideration of the interests of independent small-business enterprises.

An example of the influence of your subcommittee upon legislation is found in the Defense Production Act of 1950. In title 7, section 701, we find the following language:

"(a) It is the sense of the Congress that small-business enterprises be encouraged to make the greatest possible contribution toward achieving the objectives of this act.

"(b) In order to carry out this policy—

"(i) the President shall provide small-business enterprises with full information concerning the provisions of this act relating to, or of benefit to, such enterprises and concerning the activities of the various departments and agencies under this act:

"(ii) such business advisory committees shall be appointed as shall be appropriate for purposes of consultation in the formulation of rules, regulations, or orders, or amendments thereto issued under authority of this act, and in their formation there shall be fair representation for independent small, for medium, and for large business enterprises, for different geographical areas, for trade association members and nonmembers, and for different segments of the industry;

"(iii) in administering this act such exemptions shall be provided for small-business enterprises as may be feasible without impeding the accomplishment of the objectives of this act; and

"(iv) in administering this act special provision shall be made for the expeditious handling of all requests, applications, or appeals from small-business enterprises.

"(c) Whenever the President invokes the powers given him in this act to allocate, or approve agreements allocating, any material, to an extent which the President finds will result in a significant dislocation of the normal distribution in the civilian market, he shall do so in such a manner as to make available, so far as practicable, for business and various segments thereof in the normal channel of distribution of such material, a fair share of the available civilian supply based, so far as practicable, on the share received by such business under normal conditions during a representative period preceding June 24, 1950, and having due regard to the needs of new businesses."

INCREASING SMALL BUSINESS ACTIVITIES

The problems of small business under regulation W of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System have been discussed above. This is but a small part of the numerous difficulties that will be encountered by small business organizations in a controlled economy. The Defense Production Act of 1950 went into effect on September 8, 1950. Consumer credit controls were the first to be invoked under the act. The administrative machinery for the control of our national economy is in the process of organization. The new session of Congress will likely witness the invocation of all or many of the powers lodged in the President by the Defense Production Act of 1950. Among these powers we find priorities and allocations, authority to requisition, expansion of productive capacity and supply, price and wage stabilization, settlement of labor disputes, control of consumer and real estate credit. Under all of these, the difficulties of small-business enterprises will multiply. The assistance of your subcommittee and its staff will be called upon by small independent businessmen throughout the country who will be lost in the maze of governmental regulations, orders, and directives. Your subcommittee looks forward with enthusiasm and optimism to the continuance of investigations and studies already initiated. Your subcommittee stands ready to seek the solution to the innumerable problems besetting independent small business that are always born of a war economy.

RECORD OF THE EIGHTY-FIRST CONGRESS ON PREPAREDNESS

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a statement by the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK] covering the record of the Eighty-first Congress in the matter of the preparedness program.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I want to take this opportunity to make clear, in no uncertain terms, the record of the Congress in the interest of our entire preparedness program. Other Senators must have received mail from all over the Nation in equal volume to that which has come to my office and to the Banking and Currency Committee. Many of these letters are tirades against both the legislative and executive branches of our Government.

Once and for all I want the people of this country to understand what has been done and what is being done. I hope the news reporters and the radio commentators will help us in every way they can to get the message of truth across to their millions of readers and listeners. I hope the people will pay as close attention as they do to stories of sordid crime and other sensational news releases.

Many of our people have forgotten their civics lessons and their other classes in government. They should think back and remember that the Congress is the legislative branch of our Government. Surely everyone knows that the constitutional function of the executive branch is to execute and administer the laws enacted by the legislative branch.

With this admonition in mind, I would like to make clear the record of the Congress, and my own record, too, in the interest of our preparedness program—both military and domestic.

On July 19, 1950, I introduced the Defense Production Act. The Banking and Currency Committee held hearings beginning on July 24, 1950. Beginning on that date the committee was in almost constant session, many times well into the night, in an effort to expedite action on legislation which we recognized at that time to be of vital concern to every American. With the splendid cooperation of the committee members, from both sides of the aisle, I reported that legislation to the Senate on August 7, 1950. A similar bill was passed in the House of Representatives on August 10. The Senate acted on August 21. Following day and night sessions, the conferees agreed, and the Defense Production Act of 1950 was passed by both the House and the Senate on September 1. The act was approved and became Public Law 774 on September 8.

I cite this record of progress because so many people write and call me and ask, "Why don't you do something?" I say the Congress did do something. I say the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee did do something. Had I not felt the urgency of getting such a program under way as quickly as possible, I would never have asked my friends in the Senate and in the House to spend the many fatiguing hours in close, stuffy committee rooms that we devoted to this legislation.

Four months have now passed since the enactment of this bill which gave to the President complete and broad authority to institute a program of priorities and allocations for materials and facilities. The authority also extended to requisitioning materials and facilities, providing financial assistance for expansion of productive capacity and supply, providing for price and wage stabilization, the settlement of labor disputes, and the strengthening of controls over credit. Under this authority and by these measures, the President was directed to facilitate the production of goods and services necessary for the national security.

Now let's see what has happened. Prices have continued to spiral upward until they have reached an all-time high on the standard-of-living index which is kept by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. Labor unions have forced wages ever higher. Critical materials have again slipped under the counter into the black market. Fly-by-night firms are again entering the picture and hoarding scarce items and materials, diverting them from normal business channels and seriously affecting the production of goods for both the civilian and military market.

This must not be allowed to continue. We are dealing in human lives. We are dealing in the security of our Nation. We are juggling, with butterfingers, the future of our way of life.

The time has come for firm, positive action. I hope it is not too late. We have had enough of pussyfooting and cowtowing. Our very lifeblood depends now on swift, mail-fist determination. We must sacrifice luxuries and soft living. Business as usual must take a back seat until we have forever repelled the constant threat of invasion and internal disruption.

I have charged the Department of Defense in sessions of the Appropriations Committee to spend their money wisely and more effectively. Since 1945 I have urged the adoption of a program of universal military training. I warned in 1945 and 1946 against too rapid demobilization of our Armed Forces. I have strenuously supported the stockpiling program.

These things are basic. They are fundamental issues to a Nation to whom the free and the would-be free turn for spiritual and moral guidance. Our strength now, as in times past, must stem from a unified effort of all our people. We have no room for petty, partisan politics or any other selfish interests.

During this period of international crisis when the alinement of global powers consists of a bulwark of Christian nations on one side opposed by a clique of godless despots on the other, we must move forward with our preparedness at an ever-increasing tempo of production. A program of less than maximum effort at this time would be a breach of faith with the ghosts of GI's who know the full meaning of "supreme sacrifice."

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, certain conference reports are in order to be taken up. A motion is in order to proceed with one of the conference reports to which reference has been made. Under the unanimous-consent agreement there is no precedence as to which one shall be taken up first.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have been asked to await the arrival of another Senator who is opposed to the motion I am about to make, so I shall wait until that time. It will be only a few moments.

FEDERAL CIVIL DEFENSE PROGRAM—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] is in the Chamber. Will he kindly state what was done with reference to the amendments of the Senate to the internal-security bill?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I submit the conference report on House bill 9798.

The report was read.

(For conference report, see House proceedings of CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for January 1, 1951, on pp. 17034–17040.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the conference report? The Chair hears none. Without objection, the conference report is agreed to.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I understand that we are considering the conference report on the Internal Security Act.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair had already declared the conference report agreed to, without objection.

Mr. McCARRAN. I apologize to the Chair. My attention was distracted at the time. I wished to make an inquiry of the Senator from Tennessee as to what was done with reference to the amendments which were adopted by the Senate with regard to sections 304 and 305?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair withdraws his announcement.

Mr. KEFAUVER. As to section 304, as it was passed by the House it provided that suit should not be brought against any employee following the instructions of the Administrator. I should like to make a brief statement with reference to several matters which were agreed to by the conferees. This statement will cover the questions of the distinguished Senator from Nevada.

The House and Senate conferees sat through two lengthy sessions before arriving at the agreement set out in the conference report. Generally speaking, I believe it is safe to say the Senate language prevailed. However, I desire to call attention to the more material matters which were decided by the conferees.

It will be recalled that during the debate on this legislation considerable attention was given to the conditions under which the emergency powers of this bill could be invoked. The senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] and the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] collaborated in amending the Senate bill. During the colloquy on this section several Senators were disturbed about using the word "imminent" to define the proximity of an attack which would permit the President to proclaim the existence of a civil-defense emergency. After considerable discussion the conferees agreed on language which would permit the proclaiming of such emergency by the President or by the Congress if there is an attack on the United States, or if it is anticipated that an attack is about to take place. Prior to the proclamation of this national emergency a finding would have to be made that the national safety required the invocation of the provisions of this title. Insofar as that portion of the language which was proposed by the junior Senator from Florida is concerned, it is believed that the language of the conferees substantially carries out the intent that he had by inserting such language. The conferees are confident that the change is a little tighter than the Senate version and a little more liberal than the House version. In any event, the right to terminate such emergency by concurrent resolution by the Congress was retained.

During the debate on the passage of the bill, there was considerable discussion headed by the able senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] concerning the provisions of sections 304 and 305. The deletion of these two sections from the Senate bill was agreed to with the reservation that it was hoped that the conferees would discuss the matter at considerable length and make a final determination as to the properness of including the provisions of these two sections. Section 304, which was deleted from the Senate version, in effect removed the requirements of the Federal Tort Act insofar as the emergency powers of the Administrator were concerned, and further appeared to take away from an individual his right of legal redress. The conferees, after considerable discussion, agreed that the constitutional questions raised by the Senator from Nevada deserved much further study. Accordingly, section 304 was rewritten to provide only for the removal of the effects of the Federal Tort Act during the periods of an emergency, but does not include any denial of the right of an individual to sue another. It is believed that this rewritten version should satisfactorily overcome the objections that have been raised to the prior language, and the conferees feel that the material now included in this section is without question insofar as constitutionality is concerned. Further, it is the belief of the conferees that if an individual is sued for damages caused while he is engaged in such activities, that such a fact would probably serve as a good defense in court.

In further amplification of that point, the Senator from Nevada raised a sound point, as to whether the sovereign could prevent someone from suing an agent of the sovereign in carrying out an act. It was our opinion that if a person were ordered to do something, upon direct orders by the Government, he would probably be relieved even from suit. At any rate, that language has been stricken out, so that as matters now stand a person can be sued, but he is still left with his defense that he was following directly the order of the Government in the act which he did, which probably, under the law and the cases, would be a good defense.

Section 305 as contained in the House bill was reinstated in its entirety. This section merely excludes during an emergency the requirements of the Administrative Procedure Act with the exception of the requirement for publication. Careful study of the requirements of this act indicated no area where the conferees believed that the Administrator should be impeded by the requirements of this act. Of course, neither of these sections applies other than during a civil defense emergency as defined in title III.

On December 28 the chairman of the conference committee received a very cogent letter from the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] which was fully considered. In that letter the Senator from Nevada pointed out that the Administrative Procedure Act, by its own terms, was not supposed to apply under unusual circumstances, but the conference concluded that during a time of emergency the Civilian Defense Administrator should not have to make the particular finding that he could not apply the sections of the Administrative Procedure Act, and, therefore, decided to reinstate the provision exempting the Administrator from the Administrative Procedure Act during a time of emergency.

The amendment submitted by the Senator from New York [Mr. IVES], designed to make certain that the broad powers contained in section 303 of this bill do not work undue hardship or injustice upon any individual, was retained by the conferees, but was moved into title III where it was believed it should more properly be placed. It was moved into title III because under the normal functioning of the law the Administrator is required to go through the usual procedures in making reimbursement for property taken and in making any sort of redress during normal operations.

During the debate on the floor of the Senate it was proposed by the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] that a termination date be written into this bill. The House version had a termination date of June 30, 1954. After debate on the floor the Senator from Ohio withdrew his proposed amendment, but the subject was discussed fully in conference. While the conferees decided not to put a termination date in the bill as a whole, it did believe that the broad powers conferred by title III—that is, the emergency provision—should be terminated and require new congressional examination. Accordingly, the termination date of June 30, 1954, contained in the House bill, was inserted in title III by the conferees. This was the agreement or the compromise proposed by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL], and I think it provides a satisfactory solution.

The floor amendment proposed by the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] concerning the method through which security regulations would be enforced was retained by the conferees in substantially the same form as it passed the Senate.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BRIDGES. The Senator from Tennessee said the amendment was essentially in the same form as adopted by the Senate. Because of the fact that there was some discussion about the matter, will the Senator indicate what changes were made in it?

Mr. KEFAUVER. As adopted by the Senate, it was changed to provide that if anything derogatory was found about the security risk of an applicant for a position upon examination by the Civil Service Commission, the examination should cease at that time, and that the Administrator should certify the file of the particular person to the Federal Bureau of Investigation for a full personal check. Under the amendment the Administrator does not have to wait for something derogatory to show up respecting a person by the civil-service examination. If the Administrator wants to make another examination, or if he has any personal grounds to believe that there might be some question of disloyalty respecting an applicant, he himself may refer the matter to the Federal Bureau of Investigation. That is, he does not have to obtain his information solely from the Civil Service Commission. That is the change which was made.

Mr. BRIDGES. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KEFAUVER. The Senate provision permitting the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans for civil-defense purposes under its normal loaning procedures and after certification by the Administrator that the project was necessary to civil defense, was retained with a clarifying sentence to make it clear that the amounts authorized to be used for this purpose were in addition to the other loaning authorities held by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

It was agreed by the conference that the Administrator would make no contribution to self-liquidating projects. The only inducement to self-liquidating projects is that the period of amortization or repayment, in case the money is borrowed from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, is extended from 40 to 50 years. It was agreed by the conferees that the ability to rehabilitate basements of existing offices or to add certain civil defense features to proposed structures should result in a considerable saving to the taxpayer, and at the same time offer adequate shelter in the event of attack. The House bill had contained a flat provision against such a matching provision, whereas the Senate version was silent on the subject. It is believed that this compromise will give a more economical solution to the problem of shelters.

The other changes made were on relatively minor points, and it is believed the conferees have agreed upon an improved version which should meet the general requirements of the civil defense program.

Mr. President, it is the opinion of the conferees that the bill constitutes a well worked-out proposal which will enable the Civilian Defense Administrator to begin his work with the main burden placed upon the States, and through the States on the local communities; that the Civilian Defense Administrator will be the coordinator and will try to guide the program, and that the bill as now framed meets the insistent demands on the parts of the States and local communities as to what type of legislation should be passed. While we agree that it is not perfect, we have worked out these compromises with the House and I think the conference committee has done a very good job.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, if the bill becomes law it will be one of the most drastic and far-reaching laws ever placed on the statute books of our country. It goes further toward curtailing the rights and liberties of the individual than any act Congress has passed, to my knowledge. The question of what is an emergency, and how long it can last, is a serious proposition. We see emergencies arising overnight. We do not know when they will come to an end any more than we know when the war which was declared some years ago will be ended. Were the bill not so drastic, were it not for the fact that it does impinge upon the rights of the individual, one would not take it so seriously.

There is now on the statute books, and in operation, what has been known as the Administrative Procedure Act. It stood as a sentry, if you please, as a guidepost, as a protection, between the bureau and the bureaucrat, and the individual. It was the only recourse in solving problems involving an individual in his contacts with an administrative bureau. That law was put on the statute books after long and continuous study. If there ever was a time when that act should come into effect and be operative it seems to me it is on the occasion of an emergency, and, as I have said, an emergency can be declared overnight; and God only knows when the emergencies are going to end.

The conferees have not seen fit to follow the amendment which was adopted by the Senate striking out section 305, and allowing the Administrative Procedure Act to remain in full force and effect.

No delay of moment would result from the operation of the Administrative Procedure Act. It can move as rapidly as desired. It calls upon individual arbiters to decide between a bureau and an individual seeking to redress his wrongs or to sustain his rights. That is all the act does, in reality, and no delay would be occasioned by its application.

Here, however, we have a bill, which is about to become the law, which first of all would take from the individual the right to sue, and it would take from him the right to have the benefit of the Administrative Procedure Act.

Mr. President, I am glad to see that the conferees followed the suggestion of the Senate in changing section 304. Had that not been done, the situation would have been ever more serious.

The right of the individual to sue is a property right which should not be taken from him, either in time of emergency or at any other time.

Mr. President, while the conference report undoubtedly will be approved, I repeat, the act will be one of the most drastic, dangerous laws ever put on the statute books of America, because it is something which impinges upon the rights of the individual. An individual must face an individual, not a court; he must face an individual and have his rights determined, without the right of appeal, without the right to sue, without the right of redress in the courts of the land.

Mr. President, following the discussion upon the floor of the Senate when the bill was before this body, I addressed a letter to the chairman of the conferees, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], together with a memorandum covering my researches with respect to the law relating to the points involved, which I hoped would be of guidance to the conferees. I am glad to know that the able Senator from Tennessee made note of the fact that this memorandum was received and considered. I now ask that my memorandum and letter be inserted in full in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter and memorandum were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DECEMBER 28, 1950.

Hon. ESTES KEFAUVER,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: So that the record may be clear with respect to the Senate's action in striking out sections 304 and 305 of the proposed Civil Defense Act, and because it was on my motion that the Senate so acted, I believe it is both proper and desirable that I should give you this statement, and I ask that you convey it to the other Senate conferees.

The Civil Defense Act of 1950 will be a law under which tremendous powers will be conveyed to an agency which the law will set up, to be used by that agency in time of emergency. The powers of the agency, under the law, will impinge upon many if not all of the civil rights of individuals.

It is easy to say that in time of great emergency, it is proper that the rights of the individual be subjugated to the good of the majority; but, of course, any proposal which involves subjugating the rights of individuals to the welfare of the state should be most carefully examined.

It was on the basis of both legality and policy that I objected to the provisions of section 304 (a).

Whether it is necessary, or even desirable, during a period of emergency, to give Government employees of a certain class a degree of immunity from suit by persons whom they may injure by their own wrongful acts is an arguable question to which my own answer would be negative.

Whether the Congress may constitutionally provide for such immunity is a rather complex legal question involving a number of factors. I have examined some of the authorities with respect to points involved, and submit herewith a memorandum on the subject which may be of some value to the conferees, and as a part of the legislative history of the Federal Civil Defense Act of 1950.

In this connection, the following conclusions appear justified:

1. The right of action for a tort committed by an agent of the sovereign, even though in the course of his official duties, is well recognized; and this is a property right.

2. Under the fifth amendment of the Constitution no person may, by Federal action, be deprived of property without due process of law.

3. Tort liability generally is controlled by State law; and a person within the jurisdiction always is amenable to the law unless shielded by a constitutional rule of law which exonerates him.

4. Congress has no power to legislate respecting the personnal tort liability of its employees for acts performed outside the scope of their employment.

5. When the rules of law are changed so as to take certain rights away from a class of persons, the question always arises whether special remedies have been provided to replace those that would otherwise be available; whether there is "a reasonable substitute for the legal measure of duty and responsibility previously existing."

6. If Federal employees can be exempted from tort liability for acts performed within the scope of their employment, on the theory of extending to them the Government's own immunity from suit without its consent, the exemption so extended must be limited to acts performed under actual authority, in behalf of and in the name of the Federal Government.

7. Section 304 (a) of H. R. 9798 can be legally justified, if at all, only on the theory that it changes a general rule of law, has no ex post facto effect, is applicable to all persons alike, and purports to grant no immunity from suit with regard to any acts not performed strictly within the scope of authority, in behalf of and in the name of the Federal Government.

With respect to section 305, the question is entirely one of policy.

Congress is here creating a new agency and vesting in it broad powers, necessarily on the assumption such powers will be used only as needed in the natural interest, and only in a proper manner, never arbitrarily or unreasonably. Why should Congress then say to the new agency, in effect: "There is to be no person, no entity, which can challenge, in any legal way, the validity or propriety of anything you do."?

There is no provision in this statute for court review of any action of the new agency. In the absence of any provision for such review in another statute and under the Administrative Procedure Act exemption contained in section 305, there would be no such provision applicable—there is no way (other than by habeas corpus or some other extraordinary writ not of general application) in which the validity or propriety of any action by this agency can be called into account in any court in the land.

It has been pointed out that the Defense Production Act contains a provision exempting the agency there created from the Administrative Procedure Act, except with respect to the requirement of publicity under section 3. But the Defense Production Act contains alternative safeguards in the form of specified provisions for administrative and judicial review.

The Administrative Procedure Act is not a strait-jacket. It is sufficiently flexible to permit an emergency operation.

If it be argued that in an emergency there would not be time to give advance notice and permit hearings upon proposed rules and regulations, it need only be noted that in section 4 (a) of the Administrative Procedure Act, concerned with rule-making, it is provided that the requirements of the section shall not apply "in any situation in which the agency for good cause finds * * * that notice and public procedure thereon are impracticable, unnecessary, or contrary to the public interest."

In subsection 4 (c), concerning effective dates of new agency rules, the Administrative Procedure Act provides that:

"The required publication or service of any substantive rule * * * shall be made not less than 30 days prior to the effective date thereof except as otherwise provided by the agency upon good cause found and published with the rule."

In other words, under the Administrative Procedure Act, hearings are not mandatory in connection with emergency rule-making, and the prescribed period of notice before new rules become effective may be shortened or eliminated as the exigencies of a situation may require.

The procedural section of the act with respect to adjudication provides that:

"The agency shall afford all interested parties opportunity for (1) the submission and consideration of facts, arguments, offers of settlement, or proposals of adjustment where time, the nature of the proceeding, and the public interest permit."

Again, in the section of the act dealing with appearance, it is provided that:

"So far as the orderly conduct of public business permits, any interested person may appear before any agency or its responsible officers or employees for the presentation, adjustment, or determination of any issue, request, or controversy in any proceedings (interlocutory, summary, or otherwise) or in connection with any agency function."

The Administrative Procedure Act is the Bill of Rights for the private citizen in civil litigation before Government departments and agencies. It is not to be lightly discarded.

One of the important guaranties in the Administrative Procedure Act is the right of any person compelled to appear in person before an agency or representative thereof, to be accompanied, represented, and advised by counsel.

Another is the right of every person compelled to submit data or evidence to be entitled to retain, or, on payment of lawfully prescribed costs, to procure a copy or transcript thereof.

Another is the right of a person suffering legal wrong because of an agency action to have judicial review thereof.

Surely, there is nothing about the prospective civilian defense program which requires the suspension or abolition of these rights.

The Administrative Procedure Act provides that "no sanction shall be imposed or substantive rule or order be issued except within jurisdiction delegated to the agency and as authorized by law."

Surely, not even the civilian Defense Establishment would desire to be freed from the operation of that requirement.

On the basis of the above, it is respectfully submitted that:

1. Unless alternative provisions for administrative and judicial review are written into the bill, the exemption from the Administrative Procedure Act, which was stricken from the bill in the Senate should not be restored.

2. If the conferees restore section 304, the first sentence thereof should be changed so as to read:

"During the period of such emergency the Federal Government shall not, by virtue of any act or omission, by any officer or employee thereof while complying with or attempting to comply with any provision of this act, or of any rule, regulation, or order issued pursuant to this act, be liable to any person, whether or not such person is engaged in civil defense, for death, injury, or property damage resulting therefrom."

Thanks for your cooperation in presenting this matter to the conference committee, and kindest personal regards.

Sincerely,

PAT MCCARRAN.

MEMORANDUM RE SECTION 304, H. R. 9798

COMPARABLE PROVISIONS IN OTHER STATUTES

A comparable provision will be found in District of Columbia Code, title 6, section 6–1012 (55 Stat. 859, ch. 625); amended August 6, 1942 (56 Stat. 740, ch. 548, sec. 1), which reads as follows:

"Neither the District of Columbia nor any officer, agent, employee, or regularly appointed volunteer worker in the service of said District, nor any individual, receiver, firm, partnership, corporation, association, or trustee, or any of the agents thereof, in good faith and without willful or gross negligence carrying out, complying with, enforcing, or attempting to carry out, comply with, or enforce this chapter, or any order, rule, or regulation issued or promulgated pursuant to this chapter, shall be liable for any damage sustained to any persons or property as the result of such activity."

A search reveals no litigation challenged this section of the socalled Blackout Act (the civil-defense law for the District of Columbia in World War II). It will be noted that the above-quoted provisions are broader in scope than the comparable section of H. R. 9798, but it appears that the District of Columbia Blackout Act was used as a model for parts of the National Civil Defense Act.

Except for two sections of the District of Columbia Blackout Act its provisions were terminated by Public Law 239, Eightieth Congress, approved July 25, 1947.

In view of the fact that litigation has not tested the validity of this section of the District Code, its brief existence as a statute justifies no conclusions respecting the validity of section 304 (a) of H. R. 9798.

The Defense Production Act of 1950 (Public Law 774, 81st Cong.) contains no mention of the Federal Tort Claims Act, and does not appear to affect tort claims in any way.

A comparison between section 304 of H. R. 9798 and the provisions of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Relief Act seemed desirable because the latter affords benefits to members of the armed services in legal proceedings or otherwise due to such service.

The Soldiers' and Sailors' Relief Act, in paragraph 4 of section 511 (title 50, U. S. C.), provides that "the term 'court' as used in this act shall include any court of competent jurisdiction of the United States or any State, whether or not a court of record." Section 520 states that "in any action or proceeding commenced in any court, if there shall be a default of any appearance by the defendant, the plaintiff, before entering judgment shall file in the court an affidavit setting forth facts showing that the defendant is not in military service. If unable to file such affidavit, plaintiff shall in lieu thereof file an affidavit setting forth either that the defendant is in the military service or that plaintiff is not able to determine whether or not defendant is in such service. If an affidavit is not filed showing that the defendant is not in military service, no judgment shall be entered without first securing an order of court directing such entry, and no such order shall be made if the defendant is in such service until after the court shall have appointed an attorney to represent defendant and protect his interest, and the court shall on application make such appointment. Unless it appears that the defendant is not in such service, the court may require, as a condition before judgment is entered, that the plaintiff file a bond approved by the court conditioned to indemnify the defendant, if in military service, against any loss or damage that he may suffer by reason of any judgment should the judgment be thereafter set aside in whole or in part. And the court may make such other and further order or enter such judgment as in its opinion may be necessary to protect the rights of the defendant under this act."

In Jurilla v. Roth (38 A 2d, 862), the court stated that the Soldiers' and Sailors' Relief Act does not suspend the exercise of the judicial power to acquire jurisdiction in personam for adjudication of civil controversies, but applies a policy of noninterference in this regard.

It will be further noted that the court is given discretion to use its judgment as to the application in a proper case of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act. In the case of Neu v. McCarthy (33 N. E. 2d, 570), the court held that a person who enters the military service is not thereby relieved from the obligation to observe the laws of the jurisdiction in which he finds himself and generally he is liable for his torts as are other persons.

The holding in this case would seem to indicate that while the Soldiers' and Sailors' Relief Act was passed for the benefit of the men in the service, it did not give them a blanket right to abuse any privileges granted therein and was only passed for their protection. The Soldiers' and Sailors' Relief Act deals primarily with contractual obligations that existed prior to their entry into the service. In the case of Ellis v. Smithers (174 S. W. (2d) 568) it was held this act protects only those entering Armed Forces who were already obligated when said sections were approved and became effective, and do not apply to those who became obligated after their effective date and then go into the Armed Forces. In the case of Brooklyn Trust Company v. Papa (33 N. Y. S. (2d) 57) it was held that this act has application only when the military service in fact has prevented or is preventing a man of the military service from meeting the obligations imposed on him by the instrument sued on. (See also Twitchell v. Home Owners' Loan Corporation, 122 P. (2d) 210.)

From the foregoing, it would appear that while the Congress can pass legislation for the express benefit of the armed services in time of emergency, which imposes a duty on all courts, jurisdiction of the courts was not impaired and discretion was given them in the exercise of their functions under the Soldiers' and Sailors' Relief Act. It cannot be concluded therefore that the Soldiers' and Sailors' Relief Act in any way abolished, or deprived any person of, a cause of action, but merely in the proper case suspended temporarily the enforcement of the right of action.

Since section 304 (a) of H. R. 9798 goes far beyond merely suspending the enforcement of the right of action in a proper case, the conclusion must be reached that the Soldiers' and Sailors' Relief Act is not a precedent therefor.

STATE AUTHORITIES RELATING TO LIABILITY OR SUIT OF MUNICIPAL OFFICERS

In Christopher v. City of El Paso (98 S. W. (2d) 394) a case involving personal injury to an infant who was lawfully present at an airport observing stunt flying, etc., the court, having distinguished between proprietary and governmental functions of municipalities, held that the legislation there in question could not waive the liability of the municipality for negligent acts occurring in connection with its proprietary functions.

The specific provisions of a statute (dealing with municipal airports) which exempted cities from liability for injuries to persons caused by negligence of their operating agents was held unconstitutional, despite the presumption in favor of the validity of legislative acts, as violating both the protection clause of Federal Constitution (amendment 14, section 1) and the due process clause of State constitution.

The case of Stocker v. The City of Nashville (126 S. W. (2d) 339) involved a plaintiff who had tripped on a wire stretched across a path to protect a grass plot. The suit was defended by the municipality on the ground that the State legislature had by statute exempted the municipality from liability from accidents such as that occurring here. The plaintiff raised the issue of repugnance of the State statutes to the fourteenth amendment to the United States Constitution. After discussion of the difference between cases in which the sovereign acts in a proprietary interest and in those in which a governmental interest is exercised, the court decided that a sovereign may pass on to an agency of the sovereign its rights to immunity from suit within violation of the fourteenth amendment, citing Keifer and Keifer v. RFC (59 S. Ct. 516).

A rather exhaustive study of the constitutionality of statutes which relieve municipalities from liability for torts is contained in the annotation 124 ALR 350. The case of Batdorf v. Oregon City (53 Oreg. 402, 100 P. 937), cited in the annotation, discusses a provision of a city charter which exempted the municipality and its officers from any liability for any loss or injuries growing out of an accident due to the condition of its streets except that the officers were liable individually, where the accident was caused by the willful neglect by any officer of any duty or where it was caused by his gross negligence or his willful misconduct. (It will be noted that this exception to the limitation of liability roughly parallels that of H. R. 9798.)

The court in the Batdorf case held that the exemption from liability with this exception "practically denies a remedy to any person injured" and that it contravened article 1, section 10 of the Oregon State Constitution. That particular provision of the Oregon State Constitution provides that "every man shall have remedy by due course of law for injury done in person, property, or reputation." This roughly parallels the provisions of the fifth amendment to the Federal Constitution which states that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

An analogy may be drawn between the holding of the court in the Batdorf case, on the constitutionality of a municipal charter, and the possible holding of a Federal court on section 304 (a) of the proposed civil defense act, if it becomes law.

Shepard's citator shows that the above case has been cited with approval in a number of Oregon decisions as well as in other jurisdictions, notably Minnesota and North Carolina. Tholkes v. Decockk et al. (147 NW 648 (1914) (the Minnesota case)) contains a fairly good review of the attitude of the other States on this problem.

EXISTENCE OF RIGHT OF ACTION FOR TORT COMMITTED BY AGENT OF THE SOVEREIGN

The Supreme Court has held repeatedly that a suit may be maintained against an officer or agent of a State or the United States, and that it is not a suit against the sovereign to recover damages at law, for a past act of tort by a State official or instrumentality, done in good faith in the name of the State under color of office, where the officer, having no personal interest, was mistaken in thinking he had the lawful right to take the action he did, Bates v. Clark (95 U. S. 204, 209); White v. Greenhow (114 U. S. 307); Chaffin v. Taylor (114 U. S. 310); Mitchell v. Harmony (13 How. 114, 137); Scott v. Donald (165 U. S. 58, 67–70); Hopkins v. Clemson College (221 U. S. 636, 645); Johnson v. Lankford (245 U. S. 541, 546); Belknap v. Schild (161 U. S. 10, 18, 23, 26); as to the damages at law, arguendo see Cunningham v. Macoon & Brunswick R. R. Co. (109 U. S. 446, 452); and a fortiori where the official's act was arbitrary, capricious and in disregard of the law, Johnson v. Lankford (245 U. S. 541, 546).

Federal cases which appear to merit special attention include the Fleet Corporation cases, the Texas Power case, Brady against Steamship Company, and Luther against Borden. These cases are discussed hereafter under separate subheads.

Sloan Shipyards Corp. et al. v. U. S. Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corp. and the United States (249 U. S. 150)

This was an action against the Fleet Corporation, involving the question of whether the Corporation, as an agent of the United States could be sued. In deciding this and two other related cases, the court said:

"These provisions sufficiently indicate the enormous powers ultimately given to the Fleet Corporation. They have suggested the argument that it was so far put in place of the sovereign as to share the immunity of the sovereign from suit otherwise than as the sovereign allows. But such a notion is a very dangerous departure from one of the first principles of our system of law. The sovereign properly so-called is superior to suit for reasons that often have been explained. But the general rule is that any person within the jurisdiction always is amenable to the law. If he is sued for conduct harmful to the plaintiff his only shield is a constitutional rule of law that exonerates him. Supposing the powers of the Fleet Corporation to have been given to a single man we doubt if anyone would contend that the acts of Congress and the delegations of authority from the President left him any less liable than other grantees of the power of eminent domain to be called upon to defend himself in court. An instrumentality of government he might be and for the greatest ends, but the agent, because he is agent, does not cease to be answerable for his acts. Osborn v. Bank of United States, 9 Wheat, 738, 843, 842; United States v. Lee, 106 U. S. 196, 213, 221. The opposite notion left some traces in the law, 1 Roll. Abr. 95, Action sur Cast, T., but for the most part long has disappeared."

Continuing, the Court said:

"If what we have said is correct it cannot matter that the agent is a corporation rather than a single man. The meaning of incorporation is that you have a person, and as a person one that presumably is subject to the general rules of law. The only serious question is whether special remedies have been provided by statute that displace those that otherwise would be at the plaintiff's command. The acts of April 22, 1918 (ch. 62, sec. 3, 40 Stat. 535), and of July 18, 1918 (ch. 157, sec. 13, 40 Stat. 913, 916), give compensation for a plant taken by the President under the powers conferred by the act of June 15, 1917 (ch. 29, 40 Stat. 182), and otherwise, with a resort for claims exceeding $10,000 to the Court of Claims; in the later act, by a suit against the United States. But the taking possession of the plaintiffs' plants on December 1, 1917, is alleged to have been unlawful and it cannot be assumed at this stage that the act of the Fleet Corporation was in pursuance of any powers then delegated to it or was within the ratification of December 3, 1918. The plaintiffs are not suing the United States but the Fleet Corporation, and if its act was unlawful, even if they might have sued the United States, they are not cut off from a remedy against the agent that did the wrongful act. In general the United States cannot be sued for a tort, but its immunity does not extend to those that acted in its name."

In a minority opinion, Mr. Chief Justice Taft, with the concurrence of Mr. Justice Van Devanter and Mr. Justice Clarke said:

"The question presented is one of the interpretation of the will of Congress. No one can contend that Congress is using the Fleet Corporation for its purposes might not have given it express immunity from suit as a representative of the United States. What we have to decide is whether in the mass of urgent legislation in respect to the Government's construction and operation of shipping made indispensable by the peculiar exigencies of the Great War, Congress intended that this corporate agent should be subject to suit only as its principal is. I concede that the legislation originally creating this corporation, without express immunity from suit, naturally gives rise to the inference that Congress concluded that the greater freedom of action secured by carrying on business in corporate form was desirable and that in the absence of express provision for it, and in respect to what the corporation was originally intended to do, immunity cannot be reasonably implied from the relation of the Government to the corporation and its interest in its business. As I read the record, however, the transactions in the two cases I am discussing, and which we have to consider, took place after the situation prompting the creation of this corporation had greatly changed and after much additional legislation. The power to do the things which were here done, and which are the subjects of these suits, is not to be found in the act creating the Fleet Corporation or in legislation expanding its original faculties. It was power vested directly in the President himself, the exercise of which he was given express authority to delegate to an agent, who might be the Fleet Corporation. The act conferring this Presidential power provided a specific remedy for compensation to those whose property rights were invaded by its exercise through award by the President and immediate payment of part due thereunder, with the right to the claimant to litigate the justice of the whole award in the Court of Claims. The Fleet Corporation in the arrangements which it forced upon the claimants in these two cases to their detriment expressly declared that it acted as a representative of the United States. I think the proper construction to be put upon the facts and the law is that these suits are in fact against the United States and cannot be brought except in the manner and under the procedure provided by the statute for claims for compensation for acts done by authority of the President under the act vesting him with it."

All the Chief Justice says here is that since Congress could create a corporation as an arm of the Government and give that corporation immunity from suit, the Court is not precluded, by the simple fact that Congress did not expressly grant such immunity, from finding in a specific case an intention that a corporation so acting as an arm of the Government should be immune from suit.

Only one of the cases referred to by the Chief Justice involved any allegations of tort, and the minority opinion appears to concern itself with contract rights.

Middleton v. Texas Power and Light Company (249 U. S. 150)

This was a case testing the validity of the Texas Workmen's Compensation Act. The plaintiff was a worker who had been injured and who sued outside the Compensation Act, such act then being pleaded as a defense.

The question presented, the Supreme Court said, was whether the Texas employer's liability act was in conflict with the due process and equal protection provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. (The similar constitutional question with respect to a Federal status would arise under the fifth amendment.)

After disposing of all contentions made under the equal-protection clause (by holding that the act's discrimination between different classes of workers was neither arbitrary nor unreasonable), the Court said (at p. 162):

"It is argued further that there is a deprivation of liberty and property without due process of law in requiring employees, willingly or unwillingly, to accept the new system where their employer has adopted it. Of course, there is no suggestion of a deprivation of vested property in the present case, since the law was passed in April and took effect in September, while the plaintiff's injuries were received in the following December, after he had been notified of his employer's acceptance of the act. What plaintiff has lost, therefore, is only a part of his liberty to make such contract as he pleased with a particular employer and to pursue his employment under the rules of law that previously had obtained fixing responsibility upon the employer for any personal injuries the plaintiff might sustain through the negligence of the employer or his agents. But, as has been held so often, the liberty of the citizen does not include among its incidents any vested right to have the rules of law remain unchanged for his benefit. The law of master and servant, as a body of rules of conduct, is subject to change by legislation in the public interest. The definition of negligence, contributory negligence, and assumption of risk, the effect to be given to them, the rule of respondent superior, the imposition of liability without fault, and the exemption from liability in spite of fault—all these, as rules of conduct, are subject to legislative modification. And a plan imposing upon the employer responsibility for making compensation for disabling or fatal injuries irrespective of the question of fault, and requiring the employee to assume all risk of damages over and above the statutory schedule, when established as a reasonable substitute for the legal measure of duty and responsibility previously existing may be made compulsory upon employees as well as employers. New York Central R. R. Co. v. White (243 U. S. 188, 198-206), Mountain Timber Co. v. Washington (243 U. S. 219, 234)."

Language used in this decision is susceptible of misinterpretation. What the Court is saying here is not that due process is not required under the circumstances, but only that in this case there was due process, in view of the fact that there was a change in the rules of law, affecting everyone alike, and also a reasonable substitute for the legal measure of duty and responsibility previously existing.

Brady, Administratrix, v. Roosevelt Steamship Company (317 U. S. 575)

This case came up on certiorari to review a reversal of judgment for the plaintiff in suit against the steamship company to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate. The deceased was a United States customs inspector who died as a result of injuries sustained when the rung of the ship's ladder broke under him while he was, in the course of his official duties, boarding a vessel owned by the United States.

The Court said: "We agree with the court below that this was a maritime tort over which the admiralty court has jurisdiction. * * * The sole question here is whether the Suits in Admiralty Act makes private operators such as respondent nonsuable for their torts." (It should be noted this case arose prior to the effective date of the Federal Tort Claims Act.)

Continuing, the Court said: "There is ample support for the holding in the Johnson case that section 2 of the Suits in Admiralty Act was intended to provide the only available remedy against the United States or its wholly owned corporations for enforcement of maritime causes of action covered by the act. But there is not the slightest intimation or suggestion in the history of that act that it was designed to abolish all remedies which might exist against a private company for torts committed during its operation of Government vessels under agency agreements.

"Section 1 of the Suits in Admiralty Act provides that no vessel owned by the United States or a governmental corporation or 'operated by or for the United States, or such corporation' shall be 'subject to arrest or seizure by judicial process in the United States or its possessions'." That section was designed to avoid the inconvenience, expense, and delay resulting from the holdings in The Florence H. (248 F. 1012), and The Lake Monroe (250 U. S. 246), that libel in rem would lie against vessels owned by the United States. (See S. Rept. No. 223, 66th Cong., 1st sess.; H. Rept. No. 497, 66th Cong., 2d sess.) The wording of that section makes clear that the right to arrest or seize the vessel was taken away whether the vessel was operated by the United States or its wholly owned corporation or for either of them by a private company. To that extent the act affects remedies which would otherwise exist on maritime causes of acting arising out of operation of Government vessels by private companies for the United States or its wholly owned corporations. Yet there is no indication whatsoever that it went further and took away any personal remedy which a tort claimant might have against such a private operator. While section 1 abolishes the right to arrest or seize the vessel, section 2 provides that 'a libel in personam may be brought against the United States or against such corporations' in cases where 'if such vessel were privately owned or operated * * * a proceeding in admiralty could be maintained.' Section 2, however, does not mention private operators. Nor do the committee reports advert to private operators, except as they may be affected by section 1. The liability of an agent for his own negligence has long been embedded in the law. Quinn v. Southgate Nelson Corp. (121 F. 2d 190), is a recent application of that principle to a situation very close to the present one. But the principle is an ancient one and applies even to certain acts of public officers or public instrumentalities. As stated in Sloan Shipyards Corp. v. Emergency Fleet Corp. (258 U. S. 549, 567), 'An instrumentality of Government he might be and for the greatest ends, but the agent, because he is agent, does not cease to be answerable for his acts.' In that case the Fleet Corp. was held to be amenable to suit. And that policy has been followed. * * * Congress adopted that policy when it made corporations wholly owned by the United States suable on maritime causes of action under section 2 of the Suits in Admiralty Act. That it had the power to grant or withhold immunity from suit on behalf of governmental corporations is plain. Federal Land Bank v. Priddy (295 U. S. 229); Reconstruction Finance Corp. v. Menihan Corp. (312 U. S. 81). We may also assume that it would have the power to grant immunity to private operators of Government vessels for their torts. But such a basic change in one of the fundamentals of the law of agency should hardly be left to conjecture. The withdrawal of the right to sue the agent for his torts would result at times in a substantial dilution of the rights of claimants. * * * We can only conclude that if Congress had intended to make such an inroad on the rights of claimants it would have said so in unambiguous terms."

Luther v. Borden et al. (7 Howard, at p. 45)

This early (1849) case, in which Mr. Chief Justice Taney delivered the opinion, was an action of trespass brought by Martin Luther against the defendants for breaking and entering the plaintiff's house. The defendants pleaded justification in that their actions were those of soldiers acting by command of their superior officers.

In the course of his opinion, Mr. Chief Justice Taney said: "The remaining question is whether the defendants, acting under military orders issued under the authority of the government, were justified in breaking and entering the plaintiff's house. In relation to the act of the legislature declaring martial law, it is not necessary in the case before us to inquire to what extent, nor under what circumstances, that power may be exercised by a State. Unquestionably a military government, established as the permanent government of the State, would not be a republican government, and it would be the duty of Congress to overthrow it. But the law of Rhode Island evidently contemplated no such government. It was intended merely for the crisis, and to meet the peril in which the existing government was placed by the armed resistance to its authority. It was so understood and construed by the State authorities. And, unquestionably, a State may use its military power to put down an armed insurrection, too strong to be controlled by the civil authority. The power is essential to the existence of every government, essential to the preservation of order and free institutions, and is as necessary to the States of this Union as to any other government. The State itself must determine what degree of force the crisis demands. And if the government of Rhode Island deemed the armed opposition so formidable, and so ramified throughout the State, as to require the use of its military force and the declaration of martial law, we see no ground upon which this court can question its authority. It was a state of war; and the established government resorted to the rights and usages of war to maintain itself, and to overcome the unlawful opposition. And in that state of things the officers engaged in its military service might lawfully arrest anyone, who, from the information before them, they had reasonable grounds to believe was engaged in the insurrection; and might order a house to be forcibly entered and searched, when there were reasonable grounds for supposing he might be there concealed. Without the power to do this, martial law and the military array of the government would be mere parade, and rather encourage attack than repel it. No more force, however, can be used than is necessary to accomplish the object. And if the power is exercised for the purposes of oppression, or any injury willfully done to person or property, the party by whom, or by whose order, it is committed would undoubtedly be answerable."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the conference report?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] has 30 minutes, if he wishes to take it, and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] has 30 minutes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I move that the conference report be agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The only question is on agreeing to the conference report presented by the Senator from Tennessee. There are two other matters in disagreement.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, before the report is agreed to, will not the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, for the benefit of those who might desire to debate the matters which have been compromised, give an explanation of what the conference report does? Will the Senator not make a brief statement?

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. President, the conferees have agreed on every item in the bill except two. I believe a larger number of Senate amendments than House amendments were adopted.

As the Senate will recall, for a number of years there has been brought before the Senate and the House an item for the Buggs Island Dam. It was finally agreed to, and the dam is being constructed.

Amendment No. 8 has to do with the following provision:

For construction and acquisition of transmission lines, substations, and appurtenant facilities, and for administrative expenses connected therewith, in carrying out the provisions of section 5 of the Flood Control Act of 1944 (16 U. S. C. 825s), as applied to the southeastern power area, including purchase (not to exceed five) and hire of passenger motor vehicles, $1,850,000, to remain available until expended.

The House inserted that language for the reason that the Government has spent a very large sum of money in building this great enterprise in the State of Virginia at Buggs Island.

As I understood, the Senators from that State were strongly in favor of it. At all events, the Government has built the dam, as it has built other dams, at great cost.

Under this measure the Virginia power company will build the transmission lines from this project to Langley Field; that is the purpose. The Government now has built the dam; the Government owns it. The proposal is that the Government turn it over to the private power company.

We have had this fight with the private power companies for a number of years, as all Senators know.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. Does this mean that a single power company will get the full benefit of the power generated there?

Mr. McKELLAR. I cannot say that. They claim that if they are allowed to build lines to Langley Field, they will provide the power as cheaply as the Government could do so.

Mr. AIKEN. Will the private power company have control of the lines from the bus bar?

Mr. McKELLAR. The private company will have the only transmission lines.

Mr. AIKEN. That means, does it not, that the private company will get all the power?

Mr. McKELLAR. In my judgment, that will happen.

Mr. AIKEN. And it will be power that will be generated at Government expense.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to say that this matter was brought out before our committee. Incidentally, the committee was opposed to my view that we should let the Government develop these lines. The dam will not be completed for 2 or 3 years.

Mr. President, why should we allow these proposed contracts to be made? If this language is retained, the Government will still have control. If not, the Virginia power company will control; it is a private power company, and it will control this business to Langley Field. I do not think that should be done. I opposed it; but a majority of the members of my committee are against me, and voted the other way.

This matter went to the House, and the House refused to accept the Senate amendment. So the first proposition before the Senate is whether we shall move to recede from the Senate amendment and concur in the action of the House.

Later on I shall move that the Senate recede and concur. I do not think this important bill should be held up in order to aid a private power company at this time.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I simply wish to become acquainted with what the conferees did with reference to the Buggs Island power plant. As I recall, in the committee the idea was that inasmuch as the Government had constructed the power plant it would be advisable to have some control of the distribution of the power by the private concern. Is that correct?

Mr. McKELLAR. This provides that the company will control it.

Mr. CHAVEZ. But the taxpayers paid for the plant; the Government built it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. CHAVEZ. The Senate amendment provides for the distribution of the power under private control; is that correct?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes. After the Government has built the dam this amendment provides that the power shall be turned over to the private power company.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Do I correctly understand that if we accept the language the House has provided the Government will continue to have control?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; it will continue to have absolute control of it, and in my judgment it should have.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. I did not quite understand the explanation. How much did the Government spend for the dam and the improvements?

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall have to supply those figures.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to answer that question?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I shall be glad to have the Senator from New Hampshire do so.

Mr. BRIDGES. The estimated Federal Government cost is $78,800,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; $78,800,000. Yet it is now proposed that we turn it over to the Virginia Power Co.

The committee estimated that the cost will be approximately $80,000,000. Of course, the work has not yet been finished, but fifty-odd-million dollars have actually been appropriated.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. Will the Government have anything to say about the rates, or will the rates be fixed by the State of Virginia?

Mr. McKELLAR. Very high rates have been charged in the State of Virginia—rates approximately double what the Government would charge under this project, I believe.

At the present time, although the company has made no contract, it says it will do better than it has in the past, so far as rates are concerned.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. Did any other member of the committee take the same position that the distinguished chairman of the committee took?

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator mean in regard to the motion to concur?

Mr. LANGER. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes; there are at least five that I know of. Would the Senator like me to name them?

Mr. LANGER. Yes, please.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be glad to: the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], by proxy, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY]. They are the ones among the conferees. Those five have signified to me that they do not wish to hold up this bill and they do not wish this bill to fail because of this provision.

The House has passed on it twice. The chances are that if we vote to insist upon the Senate amendment, we may not be able to enact this bill at this session, and then in the next session the new Congress will have to go over this measure again. I hope to heaven the Senate will not permit that to occur.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will my good friend from Tennessee yield to me for a moment?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I attended the discussion and the consideration of this item before the Appropriations Committee, and there is no question as to the state of mind of the committee as a whole. The members of the committee wanted to be fair with the private power company; but as the evidence developed, it appeared that for what could be done now for 3 cents the private power company was charging 10 cents.

Of course, the representatives of the private power company said, in effect, "If we are permitted to do this, we will reduce the rate." However, that reduction could have been made by now.

Mr. McKELLAR. There is no contract or agreement to that effect; is there?

Mr. CHAVEZ. That is correct.

The private power company could reduce the rate from 10 cents to 9⅔ cents or to 9 cents, of course, and still act in accordance with that statement; but still there would not be a reduction to the 3-cent rate.

I personally think we should accept the conference report insofar as the House language is concerned.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I now turn to the next item, amendment No. 17, on page 13 of the bill. This is language in what is known as the Tennessee Valley Authority item in the bill. The language is as follows:

Provided, That purchases and contracts for supplies or services may be made by the Authority during the fiscal year 1951 without regard to any provision of law relating to advertising or competitive bidding.

The Tennessee Valley Authority is largely in my State; but in order to get the bill through, and because I believe in competitive bidding, I am going to move that the Senate agree with the House action. The House has passed on this item twice. I do not believe the House will change its position. Unless we agree to the motion to recede and concur, insofar as these two amendments are concerned, I doubt that any bill of this sort will be enacted at this session, and I am quite sure that the Senate wants this bill enacted. We have done a tremendous amount of work on the bill, and at this late day, it ought not to be defeated in the Senate.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. HAYDEN. I understand the time is limited. I should like to have about 5 minutes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes. I promised to yield to the Senator from Illinois, but I will yield to him later.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest that the debate on the amendments has taken place on the motion to agree to the conference report. The report must be agreed to before any motion can be made in regard to the amendments which are in disagreement.

Mr. HAYDEN. Let us agree to the conference report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, is this a vote on the conference report?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. BRIDGES. It is not a vote on the amendments which are still in disagreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The vote is on agreeing to the conference report, which has been agreed to by the conferees. The two amendments will have to come up separately.

Mr. BRIDGES. Is the division of time to hold on the amendments?

The VICE PRESIDENT. One hour is permitted on the report, and that includes the amendments.

Mr. BRIDGES. So there will be a full half hour allocated to the Senator from New Hampshire on the amendments, then, is that correct?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct, if the Senator does not take any of it on the motion to agree to the conference report. The question now is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives announcing its action on certain amendments of the Senate to House bill 9920, which was read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, U. S.,
January 1, 1950.

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 4, 6, 12, and 15 to the bill (H. R. 9920), making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, and for other purposes, and concur therein;

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1 to said bill and concur therein with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert:

"PAYMENT OF SUMS DUE DECEASED CONGRESSIONAL PERSONNEL

"When any person dies while serving as a Senator or officer or employee of the Senate, the disbursing officer of the Senate shall pay to the widow or widower of such person, or, if there is no widow or widower, to the next of kin or heirs at law of such person, any unpaid balance of salary or other sums due such person at the time of his death.

"Section 50 of the Revised Statutes shall not be effective as to persons included within the foregoing."

That the House recede from its disagreements to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5 to said bill and concur therein with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum of $10,000,000 named in said amendment, insert: "$7,000,000,"

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 22 to said bill and concur therein with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment, insert:

"CHAPTER VIII

"DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

"(Out of revenues of the District of Columbia)

"Office of Civil Defense

"For an additional amount, for 'Office of Civil Defense,' $250,000; and appropriations granted under this head for the fiscal year 1951 shall be available for personal services without reference to the civil-service laws as related to recruitment."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23 to said bill and concur therein with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the words "5 per centum" named in said amendment, insert: "3 per centum."

That the House insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 8 and 17 to said bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should like to have the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate, to which there is no objection, namely, those numbered 1, 5, 22, and 23, agreed to; following which I shall yield to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 5, 22, and 23.

The amendments were agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee yields 5 minutes to the Senator from Arizona.

The Chair suggests that a motion should be made at this time in regard to amendment No. 8.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I desire to move——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the Senator from Arizona now making that motion?

Mr. HAYDEN. I move that the Senate recede from its amendment No. 8.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arizona that the Senate recede from its amendment No. 8.

Mr. McKELLAR. Amendments Nos. 8 and 17 are both in disagreement.

Mr. HAYDEN. I will include them both.

I should like to discuss No. 8 for a moment.

The situation as I see it is this: Until the House of Representatives made an actual appropriation of money for the construction of this transmission line, the Virginia Electric Power Co. did not submit any kind of satisfactory agreements to wheel the power from Buggs Island to Langley Field, but it has now submitted something which upon its face looks like a fairly satisfactory contract. I think, however, it is the part of wisdom to arm the Department of the Interior with the money with which to commence construction of a transmission line, pending the time when an agreement of that kind indicated is finally consummated. I base that statement upon experience.

The first experience we had was when the power companies in Arkansas, Oklahoma, and Texas opposed the hooking together of the various Government dams in that area, with the idea that each power company would go to the particular dam nearest it to get the power at the bus bar. The dams in the Southwest area were hooked together. The Texas Power & Light Co., we may say, then saw the light, and made a proper wheeling contract with the Government. Subsequently, Congress made the same kind of arrangement, whereby the Government would build transmission lines in the Southwestern Power area, unless the private power companies agreed to wheel the power to municipalities, cooperatives, and to Government agencies. A satisfactory agreement was reached and last year Congress rescinded $6,000,000 appropriated for those transmission lines.

A similar situation prevailed in Colorado in the case of the Colorado public utilities. We appropriated the money for transmission lines, conditioned upon the inability of the power company to make a proper contract with the Government. The utility company made a contract. We appropriated money last year to the Bonneville Administration, for the purpose of building transmission lines in western Montana, with the understanding that if a proper agreement were made with the Montana Power Co., the money would not be spent. The agreement has been made. There is one agreement of that kind still pending between the Montana Power Co., and the Reclamation Service which I am satisfied can be adjusted on the same basis.

If Congress arms the Department of the Interior with the money to build this line, we shall, in my judgment, get from the Virginia Power Co. a satisfactory agreement to wheel and distribute the power at a reasonable cost, an arrangement which will materially reduce the price paid by the Government heretofore for power at Langley Field.

I now yield to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON].

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, the Senator, of course, knows that the Senators from Virginia, North Carolina, and other States are very much opposed to this item, yet all of us have been disturbed by the statement of the distinguished chairman of the committee that unless the Senate recedes he feels that there will be little chance of completing action on this bill. Certainly every Member of the Senate wants to put the defense needs first. Senators do not want to delay for 1 day, much less for a month, the letting of a contract, if such delay would involve bringing forward a new bill at the next session and holding the necessary hearings thereon.

The distinguished Senator from Arizona has said, if I understood him correctly, that if we get a satisfactory contract from the Virginia Electric & Power Co. to wheel the power from Buggs Island to Langley Field, or wherever the Government might want it delivered, he does not think this money should be spent for a Government transmission line to parallel the existing lines of a taxpaying utility.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, in substance, I agree with what the Senator says. In the absence, however, of authority to build the transmission line, this company has shown no indication of doing anything even resembling a fair wheeling agreement. If we get a fair wheeling agreement, we ought to treat them just as we did the Oklahoma and Texas power companies, just as we have treated the Colorado power companies, and the Montana power companies. If the contract is advantageous to the Government, if we can get a rate which will move the power to the preferred customers of the Government—and Langley Field is, of course, the outstanding preferred customer—it will save the Government money; it will avoid the necessity of constructing a new transmission line. If the private company will deliver the power in necessary quantities whenever it is needed and at a reasonable price, there would then be no necessity of making this appropriation. But I say the Government must have the ability to build the transmission line in order to assure that it gets the kind of contract which should be written.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Would it be a fair statement of the Senator's position to say that, if those of us who are putting defense needs first do not continue this fight, but yield to the proposal, as I understand made by the distinguished Senator from Arizona, that there will be a moral obligation upon the Department of the Interior not to spend this money until it has determined whether it can obtain a desirable contract?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is exactly what was stated, in all the other cases.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield some of his time?

Mr. BRIDGES. Yes, but before yielding, I shall use a minute myself. The general provisions of the bill have been agreed to, and it comes down to two amendments, as to one of which I do not think there will be any controversy. The other relates to the question of a development in Virginia involving the transmission of power to Langley Field, and so on. There is an honest difference of opinion on the approach to this issue, but the committee, after hearing all the evidence, voted 13 to 5 in favor of striking out the House provision. In conference, the Senate conferees insisted on the position of the Senate. The House, yesterday, without any consideration and without any time for discussion, took the other position; so the bill now comes back to the Senate and the question is whether we will accept the House version, or will insist upon our position. That is the parliamentary situation. As to the details of the situation, I should like to yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Virginia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I should like to summarize the issues involved. We are having a power plant built at Buggs Island, which is partly in Virginia and partly in North Carolina. It has been a long pull to get the plant built. It was sponsored by the Roanoke River Development Basin. Every sponsor and every supporter of the program contemplated that the power would be used in the basin.

Last fall, when a supplemental defense bill came up, the Department of the Interior had inserted in the bill an item for the construction of 146 miles of transmission line from Buggs Island to Langley Feld. The line would parallel for the most part existing lines of a privately owned, taxpaying utility, which has always served Langley Field and will always be glad to do so. The claim was asserted that it was a defense move. However, the Defense Department said they never heard of it. The NACA said they did not sponsor it. They said they knew nothing about it. They said, "We want the power and we want it at a cheap rate. It is immaterial to us whether we get it from the Virginia Electric & Power Co. or from Buggs Island." They are now getting it from the private company.

Buggs Island would not come into production until early 1953. Unless the projected development at Buggs Island is doubled the current consumed at Langley Field would take every kilowatt of power from Buggs Island, and the rural areas and the REA's in Virginia and North Carolina would be completely denied the cheap Government power which we plan to make available to them. There would be no power left, because it would produce less than 100,000 kilowatts, and it would not be firm power. Representatives of Langley Field have stated that in 1953 there would be times when they would need 150,000 kilowatts.

On December 12, before the House acted, the Virginia Electric & Power Co. offered a new contract to the Government at Langley Field. They testified before us that in their opinion the rates under that contract were less than the contract offered by the Southeastern Power Administration. On December 20, the power company wrote a letter to Langley Field and said, "Since we offered you this agreement on December 12 you have received a proposal from Southeastern. We will give you the exact terms that Southeastern has offered to you."

That is the reason we asked the Committee on Appropriations not to appropriate the money in the present emergency, particularly in view of the scarcity of copper.

What happened in the House? The subcommittee was divided 3 to 3. A motion was made to take the item out of the bill, but it failed. The full committee voted to put it into the bill by a vote of 21 to 17. It came up on the floor of the House, and not a word was said about it. It went through. Then it came to the Senate. The Senate committee voted to delete the item. That action was confirmed without a record vote on the floor of the Senate. The House conferees would not accept the action of the Senate. The item went back to the House yesterday. What happened there? Not a word was said about it. Someone in the gallery said that when the House acted on the amendment on a voice vote, Representative CANNON voted "aye," Representative TABER voted "no," and the Speaker said, "The ayes have it." That is all there was to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Virginia has expired.

Mr. ROBERTSON. May I have an additional half minute?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield an additional minute to the Senator from Virginia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia is recognized for 1 minute.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I do not want to take too long. I feel that we are called upon to compromise on a very fundamental principle. I believe that if we had the time to explain the merits of the case the item would be completely eliminated from the bill.

However, we do not have the time to do so. All of us must leave in approximately an hour to attend our respective caucuses. We must finish action on the bill today. I merely wish to say that if in the present emergency we are forced to compromise in behalf of our defense on a principle for which we have stood I hope it will be clearly understood that there will be no shilly-shallying with us by the Department of Interior if we say, "You are not to spend this money until we have seen whether you can get a suitable contract." We expect them not to spend the money until such time, and the contract has already been offered.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Oregon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, I wish to say first to my colleagues that I hope they will keep in mind that we have before us a $20,000,000,000 supplemental appropriation bill for defense purposes. The amendment now under discussion provides funds for a first installment of some $7,000,000 for the construction of parallel transmission lines from Buggs Island generating plant to Langley Field, for the purpose of supplying electric energy to a Government defense installation at Langley Field.

Two offers have been made by the Virginia Electric & Power Co. The undisputed testimony before the committee was that the total necessity at Langley Field could be met by the Virginia Electric Power Co. from generating sources which it now has in existence or under construction, at a time prior to the time the electricity would be needed, for less money than the Federal Government could supply it from Buggs Island.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CORDON. I have only 10 minutes. If the Senator will ask a question, I shall be glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator said there is no proof to the contrary. The Senator remembers the proof to the effect that the Virginia Co.'s lines cannot at present carry the required power to Langley Field, and the company would have to construct new lines in order to do so.

Mr. CORDON. The testimony is that two additional lines are now being constructed which would carry the power, and another would be constructed if the offer were accepted.

Mr. President, I think the RECORD should show that I believe I know as much about the situation as any other Senator on the floor. I have studied the subject, and am prepared to prove any statements I make with respect to it. When I say an offer has been made, I mean an offer has been made in writing to the NACA, and the offer is good at this minute. If we look at the issue solely from the standpoint of defense, there is nothing which would back up or justify this kind of appropriation.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CORDON. I am sorry I cannot yield within the time I have allotted to me.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I merely wanted to keep the record straight.

Mr. CORDON. I am sorry. If I had the time, I would be very happy to yield. There are some other factors involved. There is the Buggs Island Dam, where some 208,000 kilowatts will be generated in 1953. The Government does have the investment. Some lines ultimately will be needed, whether they are built by the Government or by the Virginia Electric Power Co. under a wheeling agreement, as has been done in Montana, Oklahoma, and Texas. Those factors are all in this picture; but from the standpoint of the defense factor, the undisputed testimony with reference to the offer which has been made is that the company is ready, able, and willing to furnish the necessary power at a rate less than the Government's rate. That is in the record.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President——

Mr. CORDON. Coming to the next point, the question of the transmission of the Buggs Island power, the testimony is that the company has offered to enter into a wheeling agreement on the basis of the Montana, Colorado, and Oklahoma contracts. Let me say at this point that in my mind the testimony is equally clear that the company could have made the offer long ago and did not. Unquestionably the company was forced into making the offer by the fact that the Government power was there and was going to be moved.

I have no brief whatever for the Virginia Electric Power Co. However, it is an institution which is financially able to carry out its commitments. It has a record of carrying out its commitments. It has made an offer in writing which would answer the necessities of the Government for power at Langley Field. Whether we can rely on the testimony as to the contents of the offers being exactly the same, I cannot tell the Senate. I am not an electrical engineer. The testimony was that they were. The testimony will be found on pages 342 and 343 of the hearings.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President——

Mr. CORDON. I am sorry I cannot yield, because I do not have the time. I regret it.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I am just wondering whether the Senator——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon declines to yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Very well. He is not required to do so.

Mr. CORDON. I wish I could yield. I regret that I do not have the time to go into the facts. We are face to face with this question. This is the last day of the session. On two occasions the House acted without any knowledge of the facts. In my opinion, the thing that ought to be done is to save to the Federal Government $7,000,000 which it does not need to spend at a time when it is called upon to spend billions of dollars for defense purposes.

On the other hand, if at this time we take the action which I believe is the proper action, the bill must go back to the House and probably into another conference. That cannot be done. I recognize that fact when I say that I feel that we should have before us at this time the status of the matter as the record itself discloses it. I have tried in a few words, probably with oversimplification, to present it. I shall not oppose the motion to recede. I do not think it ought to be done. However, I understand that there is a $20,000,000,000 bill hanging in the balance. That is more important than even the total of $7,000,000 involved in building some transmission lines in Virginia.

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] and I have worked on these problems time after time. I join with him in voicing the hope that when this money is made available the Interior Department will understand that it is made available solely for the purpose of building lines if the contracts mentioned cannot be executed. When we say that we mean contracts based upon the Texas, Oklahoma, Colorado, and Montana wheeling contracts. That does not mean giving control over Government power to anyone but the United States Government. The people get the benefit of the power just as they would if the Government were to spend its dollars to do the same thing.

Having made that statement, I shall not oppose the motion, although I regret that we do not have time to present the entire case and reach a decision which, in my opinion, the facts warrant.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. HOEY].

Mr. HOEY. Mr. President, I was very strongly in favor of the amendment which was adopted by the Appropriations Committee. I thought it was very proper action. The amendment was adopted by a vote of 13 to 5. I do not happen to be a member of that committee, but I am familiar with the entire situation.

I am opposed to the Government building transmission lines or engaging in private business anywhere if private enterprise will meet the conditions and respond to the needs.

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] has very strongly stated the position of the Senate with reference to the other contracts. I believe that the same policy should be pursued in this case. At this time I shall not oppose adopting what the House has done, because I think to do otherwise would jeopardize the entire appropriation bill. However, I think it ought to be distinctly understood that the mind and thought of the Senate is not that the Government should go into private business and build transmission lines when private enterprise is willing to do it and wheel the power at a price comparable to that which the Government could achieve by its own action.

The reason I say that is that there is a very definite disposition in the Interior Department to go after private utilities and interfere with private companies. In my opinion, no one can dispute that fact. I think it is going too far in my own State, where we are served by the Bugg's Island development, which is in Virginia. We have all supported that development.

There is a proposal pending by which the Virginia Electric Power Co. would build a big power plant in North Carolina at Roanoke Rapids. The Power Commission has heard the case, and the examiner has approved the project. Yet the Interior Department is going before the Power Commission and trying to defeat the effort of this company to build a dam to furnish power which is very greatly needed. The State of North Carolina, the State of Virginia, the REA's, and many private owners need the power. This company has offered to build a dam. The Federal Power Commission examiner, after hearing the case for weeks and months, decided that it should be built. Yet the Interior Department has intervened before the Federal Power Commission and is trying to stop the private company from building the dam, because that is one of the projects which it had hoped some day to include in the Bugg's Island project. The beginning of construction would not be reached before 1952 or 1953. It is said that there is a great scarcity of power in that section; yet the Department of the Interior is deliberately stalling and trying to prevent the building of a dam at Roanoke Rapids. I believe that the policy of the Interior Department is contrary to the policy which the Senate has adopted, which the Congress has heretofore approved, and which the public welcomes.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOEY. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. As one of those who voted in support of the position which the Senate originally took, I have listened with great interest to what the Senator has just said. What I cannot understand is this: If we now recede, as the Senator from North Carolina has urged, how can the position which we have heretofore taken be retrieved? Will it not be completely water over the dam? If we authorize the first appropriation, we must authorize the remaining appropriations, must we not?

Mr. HOEY. I agree with the Senator. However, I feel that probably we ought not hold up the entire appropriation bill at this late hour merely because of this item.

As the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] has said, there should be an understanding that this money shall not be used for the purpose of building transmission lines if satisfactory contracts can be obtained.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOEY. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. Why should the Senate yield, rather than the House?

Mr. HOEY. I thoroughly agree with the Senator. However, the question is one of limitation of time.

Mr. TAFT. The House is in session. It has not yet passed the War Powers Act. I see no reason why it cannot recede.

Mr. HOEY. I should be entirely willing to take that position. The only thing I was interested in was not jeopardizing the entire appropriation bill.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOEY. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. If the Senator's position is correct, what steps are going to be taken toward getting the additional power in his State about which he is talking, and the dam which he wishes to see built?

Mr. HOEY. That is not involved, I will say to the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. HOEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Hampshire yield me half a minute more?

Mr. BRIDGES. Yes.

Mr. HOEY. As I said, that is not involved in the appropriation. What I was talking about was the fact that the Interior Department is taking an attitude of antagonism to private enterprise and private utilities, and undertaking to undermine them wherever it has the opportunity. In my State the additional dam which the private company wants to build is not involved in this appropriation at all. That is merely a thing for which it hopes to obtain an appropriation in the future, which I shall oppose when it comes up.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] to address a question to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, the question I wish to ask the Senator from Tennessee, is this: Would it be possible for the Senator from Tennessee to talk to the Secretary of the Interior and obtain from him an understanding that before he will proceed to build this line with the Government's money he will notify the Senate, and wait at least 30 days? Can the Senator obtain such an understanding so the Senate may act today on the emergency legislation?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have not talked with the Secretary of the Interior at all on the subject.

Mr. FERGUSON. Can the Senator talk to him and come back to the floor with an answer?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think so. We have just a few minutes left. If the Senator wants to vote against the report, he can do so; that is all.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time is divided between the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES]. The Senator from Tennessee has 13 minutes left. The Senator from New Hampshire has 5 minutes left.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I promised to yield to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS]. I wish to make that statement for the benefit of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me 1 minute?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Why should we ask the Secretary of the Interior what he is going to do? We are passing the law. Is that not correct? I should like to have some Senator answer that question. Why should we ask any Cabinet member what he is going to do?

Mr. FERGUSON. If the bill is passed as it now reads there would be no strings attached to the money. He could use it tomorrow.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Except that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] has told us over and over—and I trust him to the full extent—that unless actions are taken in a certain way they cannot be taken at all. Is that correct?

Mr. HAYDEN. If I had time——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from New Mexico has expired.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, has the Senator from Michigan concluded?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I now yield to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois is recognized for 12 minutes.

FAREWELL ADDRESS BY SENATOR LUCAS

Mr. LUCAS. May I ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he has any time left?

Mr. BRIDGES. I think I have 5 minutes.

Mr. LUCAS. I may want to ask the Senator to yield me a minute.

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield to the Senator from Illinois the additional time he may need.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, the most interesting and fruitful period of my life will be concluded on tomorrow. For 12 years I have had the high honor of representing the State of Illinois in the foremost Legislative Hall in all the world.

The people of the great State of Abraham Lincoln and Stephen A. Douglas were kind enough to entrust to me legislative power and authority that can only come to one living in a democracy such as ours.

Tomorrow I relinquish that trust. I return it to the people. They are the Government. They give—they also take away. May such a cherished and fundamental right remain inviolate forever. If so, our Republic will approach immortality.

In leaving this hallowed chamber, consecrated so long ago to the cause of liberty, I do so with many solemn recollections. When I entered the Senate in 1939 the world was moving into the shadows of a global war. Since that hour I have been privileged to take part in many great decisions involving the welfare of my fellow Americans and the fate of mankind. In lifting my voice and casting my vote upon every occasion, I have kept one great objective before me—the cause of world peace.

Mr. President, I shall never forget the strong and affectionate ties which bind Members of this body, irrespective of their political affiliations. There is a feeling of fellowship which permeates this Legislative Hall that does not exist in any other body of men in all the world. To Members on both sides of the aisle I express my gratitude for their years of tolerance, forebearance, and cooperation.

However, I would not for one moment want to leave the impression that all my legislative days have been filled with sunshine and joy. I have had some painful collisions with some of my distinguished colleagues. But, in the main, the colloquies and debates have been tempered with a strict observance of justice and public faith and in keeping with the best traditions of the past.

So, Mr. President, as I say farewell, I do it knowing that my long association with so many able public servants has made me a better and more useful American. A study in government over such a long period of time has given me wide knowledge of national and international affairs. The experience gained in these troubled years qualifies me to compare our beloved country with strife-torn, poverty-ridden, and tyrannical nations in other parts of the world. Any thoughtful and wide awake patriot who thoroughly understands that sharp contrast between our Nation and others, lives with the words in his heart, "Thank God, I am an American." But to those of us upon whom has rested the grave responsibility of solving the world-shaking problems brought about by despots, tyrants, and dictators, the great privilege of being an American penetrates to human depths which cannot accurately be measured.

Yes, to be an American is the greatest privilege that can come to a human being. Millions behind the iron curtain, millions in far-off desolated lands, tortured and miserable souls, yearn for an opportunity to find a refuge from their sorrows and troubles on the blessed soil of America.

But, Mr. President, the things that have made this country the envy of the world—our cherished institutions, our respect for the dignity of the human being, our high standard of living—are in mortal danger of destruction. Communism, the antithesis of democracy, is on the march throughout the world. The Communist ideology is striving desperately for supremacy everywhere. The seriousness of this cannot be underestimated. The smug, the complacent, the selfish, and the obstructionist must awaken to the grave dangers which lie ahead. We cannot live on the glories and the accomplishments of the past, renowned as they are. Free peoples everywhere face a supreme challenge by those cruel forces which are pledged to destroy our destiny. The lofty principles of God and the rights of man demand that we meet and defeat that challenge.

Mr. President, if we have faith in the future of our country and can find a formula for unity, I submit that another great war is not inevitable. With this combination, we can preserve our Nation through sacrifice and toil so that the generations yet to be born will be endowed with a heritage which equals or surpasses that which was handed down to us by our fathers.

Mr. President, one of the ways to reach this coveted goal is for those high in the councils of the Nation, whether they be Democrats or Republicans, in concord and in unity, to fight the hideous creeping creature of communism wherever it may be found threatening directly or indirectly the safety and security of our Republic. If such an ungodly concept of human affairs should ever find its wicked and monstrous way into a republic that was founded on the theory that we are a nation of laws and not of men, then the last best hope of freemen is doomed. Folly and madness will be the forerunner to a life of slavery. I believe with all of my heart that "resistance to tyrants is obedience to God."

Mr. President, it took the Pearl Harbor disaster to bring about national unity in 1941. Will it be necessary for the Kremlin to drop a bomb on Washington before we obtain the unity we ought to have in this crisis? Is there a Senator who does not believe that the Communists, working out of Moscow, seek to dominate the world? Do not the huge land army and air force of the Russians, along with the Soviet-armed and dominated satellite nations, admonish us to take all fair and honorable means to meet such potential aggression?

With the liberty of every loyal American at stake in this cold and hot war, it seems to me that the time for idle chatter is over. The hour has passed when men in high positions can, for the sake of some political advantage, without jeopardizing their country's safety, fire the imagination of the emotional and the uninformed with reckless and irresponsible charges. The hour has passed when assessment of blame for yesterday's purported mistakes on foreign policy should be constantly resurrected. If some must condemn, I respectfully request that such pronouncements be withheld until a less dangerous day arrives. I ask this not in the interest of any political party but in the name of a united America—yes, in the interest of the soldiers in Korea who now are bearing the brunt of battle with their blood and their lives. In this international crisis the political veneer corroding our foreign policy should be removed lest the body politic suffer a national disaster.

In the conduct of our foreign policy, we are dealing with the lives of our fellow Americans, and we are under a deep obligation to live up to the highest standards. When men are dying in the wastelands of Korea in defense of a great principle based upon world peace and justice, we should disavow every prejudice, forget personal pique and ambition, remove every political roadblock, and strike a blow for national unity that will resound for years in the capitals of those nations where tyrannical masterminds are plotting to destroy us all. Such unity will remove frustration and fear at home and will tell those who scheme against us that they can expect no aid or comfort from a divided country. It will lift the morale of our allies in the western democracies, as well as the morale of those in other parts of the world who believe in our cause. While unity at home is indispensable, unity among our allies, both in Europe and Asia, is also vital to the success of the free world.

Mr. President, I am one who believes that at this hour we cannot refuse to accept the responsibilities of world leadership. We cannot fail to fulfill the international commitments and obligations we have made. If we should falter and fail at this crucial hour of history, we would hand over the world to Stalin and his ruthless lieutenants. We would lose our friends and allies everywhere. Never before in the history of this Republic has America needed friends and allies as America needs them now. If Europe and the Asiatic nations should fall into the hands of the Communists, America would ultimately stand alone—a garrison state, surrounded by a military wall of iron. Regimentation and austerity over a long period of time would be inevitable. We would bear the crushing burden of an immense army, navy, and air force without any military assistance from our friends across the sea. Such a course would enable the Soviet leaders to attain one of their great objectives in their master plan for world domination. So long as Europe remains free, the Western Hemisphere is safe from Communist domination.

Never let it be said by future historians that Americans—free Americans, if you please—abandoned the freedom-loving peoples throughout the world by failing to unite on our foreign policy.

Mr. President, I would not attempt to say to the Members of this august body that any one man or group of men has the complete answer to what our foreign policy should be. We all understand that under our Constitution the Commander in Chief has the principal responsibility for the formation of our foreign policy. I recognize the different views which honorable men have upon the most intricate and delicate questions which this Nation has ever faced. I also recognize the fact that Congress has a voice in the making of the foreign policy, through both the treaty-making power and the appropriations. I firmly believe that the administration, through its leaders, and the leaders of the minority in Congress should lay aside every political or other consideration, and should compromise their differences on foreign policy. I doubt that there are 10 Members of the United States Senate who today would agree on every detail of a program to solve our international problems. But, Mr. President, we cannot win a war, nor can we win a peace, hopelessly divided. If we remember that, we can, as Americans, unite and achieve a noble victory for all mankind.

Mr. President, this may be a voice crying in the wilderness, but I speak from long experience and the deep conviction that unity is indispensable if permanent peace is to be obtained. I plead in this hour—in this desperate hour—of our existence that politics stop at the water's edge, both in the executive and the legislative branches of our Government. Give us clear thinking, cool heads, high purpose, firm resolve, unselfish cooperation in the uncertain days ahead. Let the Executive give to the American people all of the information which is possible without jeopardizing our safety and security. Surely there must be a common denominator upon which virtually all members of both branches of Congress could agree with the executive branch of the Government in the solution of European and Asiatic problems.

Mr. President, some may say that I have painted a pessimistic picture, but to me it is a tragically realistic one. Nevertheless, I am and always will be an optimist about the future of America. I could not be otherwise, having been the recipient of her great opportunities. Throughout my career in the Senate and in public life, I have opposed those who preached the gospel of despair. I have opposed the little men of little faith who lack confidence in the strength and the destiny of America. I have opposed the cynics and the disbelievers—those who declared that we could not build 100,000 planes a year; those who declared that we could not defeat Germany and Japan; those who wanted to get down on their knees and surrender to the forces of evil. Mr. President, I have no doubts about our ultimate victory over any ungodly and uncompromising foe if we maintain essential unity and our brotherhood as Americans. If we can have that kind of unity, there is no aggressor wicked and powerful enough to be capable of standing against the resourceful, determined, and intelligent efforts of 150,000,000 free Americans who have faith in Almighty God and the flag. This is the kind of unity that will bring about an everlasting peace based upon law and justice.

Mr. President, we are passing through the most extraordinary and dangerous days since the birth of this Republic. We can destroy all of the things that made America great if we continue to quarrel among ourselves. Let us unite and face the tremendous task which must be done in the spirit of patriotism and forbearance. Let us unite under a flag which has stood, and will ever stand, for the liberties of the human race.

[Applause, Senators rising.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Illinois has expired.

ADDITIONAL SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS, 1951—CONFERENCE REPORT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. HAYDEN that the Senate recede from its amendments Nos. 8 and 17, to the bill (H. R. 9920) making additional supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, the issue involved here is a question of private enterprise versus operation by the Federal Government.

Insofar as public power is concerned, when private enterprise refuses to give service for a comparable figure, then, of course, the Federal Government is entitled to enter the field, and should do so. However, when private enterprise is willing to render the same service for a comparable price, in these days of war in Korea, when there is such a tremendous burden on the finances of the Federal Government, we have no obligation to have the Federal Government enter the field, and, in my judgment, no right to have the Government do so.

That is the issue; and on that issue I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Does the Senator, in voting on this question, understand that the House is still in session, so that there is an opportunity for further discussion of this subject without holding up the entire military appropriation bill?

Mr. BRIDGES. I do. This is not a question of being for or against the military bill, but it is a question of giving the House another opportunity to pass on this issue.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I take issue with the Senator on that point, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the Chair state the question.

Does the Chair correctly understand that the motion includes both amendments?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; both amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion——

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I think the only request for the yeas and nays has been in regard to amendment numbered 8.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I made the request for the yeas and nays in regard to both amendments, and so did the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I suggest that both amendments be acted on at the same time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Only by unanimous consent can both amendments be voted on at the same time.

Is there objection?

Mr. BRIDGES. No, Mr. President——

Mr. WHERRY. Let us vote on the amendments one at a time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is heard.

The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Arizona that the Senate recede from its disagreement to amendment numbered 8, which is the Southeastern Power amendment.

On this question the yeas and nays have been demanded. Is there a sufficient second?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WHERRY. Am I correct in saying that a vote "nay" means a vote to maintain the Senate's position?

The VICE PRESIDENT. A vote "nay" means not to recede from the Senate's position.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McKELLAR. A vote "yea" is a vote that will mean passage of the bill, is it not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks Senators are intelligent enough to know what they are voting on.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Will the Chair inform the Senate whether the House of Representatives is still in session?

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the view of the Chair, that is not a parliamentary inquiry. Furthermore, the Chair does not know.

The yeas and nays having been ordered, the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. LUCAS. I announce that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON] is unavoidably detained on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] to recede from amendment No. 17.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That completes action on the conference report.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. NEELY obtained the floor.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia yield to me for a moment, without his losing the right to proceed?

Mr. NEELY. On that condition, I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia permit me to make an announcement before Senators leave the Chamber?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. LUCAS. Some time ago the Democratic Members of the Senate arranged for a caucus to be held this afternoon at 2 o'clock. However, it may be that the Senate will remain in session a little beyond that hour. I have conferred with a number of the Democratic Members of the Senate, and it is agreeable with all of them that we meet in our conference at 20 minutes after the adjournment this afternoon. It may be 3 or 4 o'clock before we get into the conference.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the majority leader permit a question?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WHERRY. Does the majority leader wish to make any statement about a call of the calendar?

Mr. LUCAS. I do not believe we will have time to call the calendar today.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. May I ask the majority leader how long he expects the Senate to remain in session?

Mr. LUCAS. I do not have any particular hour in mind. We have one more conference report to consider.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Did I understand the majority leader correctly to say that when the Senate adjourns for the caucus, it will mean final adjournment?

Mr. LUCAS. That is correct.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. There is the war powers bill, which the Senate passed a few days ago and which the House is considering today, and I do not believe it would be advisable for an adjournment to be taken until there had been opportunity to act on that measure.

Mr. LUCAS. I thank the Senator for that information. Under those circumstances we will merely recess, to meet at the call of the Chair.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. I believe that would be advisable, because that legislation is important.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia permit me to present a unanimous consent request?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. WHERRY. As all of us know, the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] underwent a rather serious operation in mid-December. It will please his friends to know that his recovery has been rapid, and that he will soon be fully recovered.

It is necessary, however, that the Senator from Washington take some rest before returning to his work in the Senate. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Washington may be absent from sessions of the Senate until January 22 next.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not certain that the Senate can in one session of Congress grant a Senator leave of absence for the next session.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I ask that the Senator from Washington be granted permission to be absent from the Senate during the remainder of the Eighty-first Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT OF SECTION 120 OF THE INTERNAL REVENUE CODE

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Calendar No. 2183, House bill 7303, to amend section 120 of the Internal Revenue Code.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Georgia?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7303) to amend section 120 of the Internal Revenue Code, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments, on page 1, line 8, after the word "by," to strike out "this act" and insert in lieu thereof "section 1," and after line 10, to insert:

SEC. 3. (a) Section 3930 (a) of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to salary, etc., of the General Counsel for the Department of the Treasury) is amended by striking out "$10,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$15,000."

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask that the Senate reject the committee amendments to the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The amendments were rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the third reading and passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHILDREN BORN OUT OF WEDLOCK

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1122) relating to children born out of wedlock, which were, on page 3, line 4, strike out all after "Counsel" down to and including "truth" in line 7, and insert "to determine the validity"; on page 3, line 9, strike out all after "believe" down to and including "believe" in line 14; on page 3, line 15, strike out "thereof" and insert "of the child in question"; on page 3, lines 15 and 16, strike out "by such officer"; on page 3, line 24, after "necessary" insert "by the court"; on page 4, lines 13 and 14, strike out "Washington Asylum and" and insert "District"; on page 5, line 4, strike out "shall" and insert "may"; on page 5, line 5, after "public", insert a comma and "and shall do so"; on page 5, line 15, strike out "shall" and insert "may"; on page 5, lines 15 and 16, strike out "the payment of annual amounts, equal or varying," and insert "payments"; on page 5, line 21, strike out "the", where it appears the first time, and insert "a"; on page 5, line 21, strike out "wherein he resides through" and insert "of"; on page 6, lines 2 and 3, strike out "upon petition of any party in interest,"; on page 6, line 5, strike out "child. Hearing on such petition" and insert "child: Provided, however, That a hearing"; on page 6, line 18, strike out "may" and insert "shall"; on page 6, line 21, after "of", insert "any"; on page 6, line 22, after "may", insert "revoke probation and"; on page 6, line 23, after "year", insert "at any one time"; on page 6, line 23, strike out "the" where it appears the second time and insert "a"; on page 7, line 1, after "judgment", insert "or for commitment for further default"; on page 7, line 3, strike out "suspend sentence" and insert "set aside commitment"; on page 7, line 3, after "and", insert "again"; on page 7, line 15, strike out "for"; on page 7, line 15, strike out "provided" and insert "ordered"; on page 8, line 3, strike out "at any time"; on page 8, line 6, strike out "the" and insert "and"; on page 8, line 21, strike out "the precinct wherein he resides, through the" and insert "a precinct of the"; on page 9, line 11, strike out "approved voluntary agreements" and insert "accept voluntary payments"; on page 9, lines 12 and 13, strike out "and to accept payments made pursuant thereto"; on page 9, line 13, after "and", insert "to"; on page 11, line 12, strike out "attorneys, and the" and insert "attorneys. The"; and on page 11, line 16, after "act", insert a comma and "and to the Bureau of Vital Statistics as provided in section 16 (a) hereof."

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate concur in the House amendments to the bill (S. 1122) relating to children born out of wedlock.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I do not intend to object—I hope the Senator will state the reason why it is necessary to bring up the subject at this time.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, it is not absolutely necessary but it is entirely proper to dispose of this matter today. The bill was passed by the Senate several weeks ago. It was amended by the House. This morning the Committee on the District of Columbia unanimously instructed me to request the Senate to concur in the House amendments.

Mr. WHERRY. Is the report of the committee unanimous?

Mr. NEELY. It is.

Mr. WHERRY. Were the minority members of the committee present?

Mr. NEELY. Yes; the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HENDRICKSON] and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DWORSHAK] were present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendments of the House.

The amendments were agreed to.

INTERNAL SECURITY ACT OF 1950

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, the differences of opinion between the Department of Justice and the Department of State respecting interpretation of certain portions of the Internal Security Act of 1950 have become known to us largely through hearings before the Joint Subcommittee on Immigration and Naturalization.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the body of the RECORD copies of letters, which are self-explanatory, respecting the interpretation of certain provisions of the Internal Security Act of 1950.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DECEMBER 21, 1950.

Hon. J. HOWARD MCGRATH,
The Attorney General,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: The differences of opinion between the Department of Justice and the Department of State respecting the interpretation of certain portions of the Internal Security Act of 1950 have become known to us, largely through joint hearings of the Senate and House Subcommittees on Immigration and Naturalization.

We have read with interest the attached file of correspondence, made a part of the record at such hearings, and including—

1. Letter transmitted by you to the Secretary of State under date of October 20, 1950.

2. Three letters transmitted to you from the Department of State dated respectively November 28, 1950, December 5, 1950, and December 6, 1950.

3. Letter transmitted to you under date of November 17, 1950, by Representative FRANCIS E. WALTER, chairman of the Subcommittee on Immigration and Naturalization of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives.

After careful study and consideration of (a) certain language of the act of October 16, 1918; (b) identical language which appears in section 22 of the Internal Security Act of 1950, which amends the foregoing act of October 16, 1918; and (c) the judicial and administrative interpretations of such language, it is the opinion and judgment of the undersigned, who were members of the conference committee on the Internal Security Act of 1950, that the interpretations of such langauge contained in the above-quoted letters dated respectively November 28, 1950, December 5, 1950, December 6, 1950, and November 17, 1950, are in accord with the established body of judicial and administrative interpretations upon which was premised the reenactment of such language in the Internal Security Act of 1950.

In view of the great importance to this country of a proper administration of the Internal Security Act of 1950, in accordance with the intent of the Congress, we deem it not improper to express our opinion as noted above and most respectfully to urge that you give renewed consideration to this matter.

We each of us extend to you our kindest personal regards and assurances of our highest esteem.

Respectfully,

JOHN S. WOOD, FRANCIS E. WALTER, BURR P. HARRISON, JOHN MCSWEENEY, RICHARD M. NIXON, HAROLD H. VELDE, BERNARD W. KEARNEY, who were Managers on the Part of the House on the Internal Security Act of 1950; PAT MCCARRAN, JAMES O. EASTLAND, HERBERT R. O'CONOR, ALEXANDER WILEY, HOMER FERGUSON, who were Managers on the Part of the Senate on the Internal Security Act of 1950.

OCTOBER 20, 1950.

Hon. DEAN G. ACHESON,
Secretary of State,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: It is believed that the following may help to clarify this Department's views as to the administration of the immigration features of the Internal Security Act of 1950.

As you know, the following three general classes of aliens are excluded from admission to the United States by section 22 of the act.

1. Those who would engage in activities which would be "prejudicial to the public interest, or would endanger the welfare or safety of the United States."

2. Those who "at any time, shall be or shall have been members * * * of the Communist or other totalitarian party * * * or organization."

3. Those who are "likely to * * * engage in activities which would be prohibited by the laws of the United States relating to espionage, sabotage, public disorder, or in other activity subversive to the national security."

Those in classes 1 and 3 are excluded from admission under any circumstances. As you know, aliens in these categories were excluded from admission under law and regulations and as a matter of policy (22 U. S. C. 223; 8 C. F. R. 175) prior to the Internal Security Act of 1950.

Communists in class 2 were also excludable from admission (8 U. S. C. 137) prior to the Internal Security Act of 1950. Hence, the main new class of aliens excluded by the act are those who are or have been members of any "other totalitarian party * * * or organization." This class, i. e., mere membership, past or present, in a totalitarian party or organization has not heretofore been excluded by law, regulations, or policy.

Hence, the test as to those excluded in category 2 is not whether the alien is considered dangerous to the national security (which is covered by categories 1 and 3) but simply whether or not he is or has been a member of a totalitarian party or organization, regardless of whether or not he may now be harmless, antitotalitarian, pro-American, or the circumstances under which he is or was a member of such totalitarian party or organization.

Section 3 (15) of the Internal Security Act of 1950 defines totalitarianism as "systems of government not representative in fact, characterized by (A) the existence of a single political party, organized on a dictatorial basis, with so close an identity between such party and its policies and the governmental policies of the country in which it exists, that the party and the government constitute an indistinguishable unit, and (B) the forcible suppression of opposition to such party."

The Nazi, Fascist, and Falangist Parties and organizations have been determined (by reason of immediate cases involving these parties) to be within the class of "other totalitarian party or organization" proscribed by category 2, and consequently there is no alternative to regarding present and former members of such parties or organizations as excludable from admission to the United States in accordance with section 22 of the act.

However, in order to enforce the law and at the same time alleviate undue hardship, the Attorney General has exercised his discretionary authority under the ninth proviso of section 3 of the Immigration Act of February 5, 1917 (8 U. S. C. 136 (q)), to grant temporary admission to aliens in category 2 where the only ground of exclusion is the alien's nominal membership, whether present or past, in either the Nazi, Fascist, Falangist, or other totalitarian party or organization, and it appears that the alien has a good and legitimate reason which would justify such temporary admission.

Such action is authorized by the ninth proviso of the 1917 act (supra) and section 22 of the Internal Security Act of 1950. In each case the Attorney General is obliged by section 22 of the Internal Security Act of 1950 to make a detailed report of such action to the Congress.

It is realized that temporary admission under the ninth proviso of the 1917 act does not furnish a permanent solution to the problem, especially where the alien seeks to enter the United States for permanent residence. However, it is the only expedient available for temporary relief, and it is hoped that it will alleviate undue hardship in legitimate cases until the Congress may consider appropriate amendments to furnish a permanent solution.

This temporary relief is extended by the Attorney General to aliens who departed for the United States prior to the enactment of the Internal Security Act of 1950, those who have arrived after its enactment, and to those who have not yet departed for the United States, subject, of course, to the discretion of the Department of State in the issuance of visas, whether the aliens seek either temporary admission or permanent admission as quota immigrants. As to the latter, however, the immigrants should be advised that their admission, if granted, can only be for a temporary period under the law and that they must assume the risk of having to depart from the United States at the end of such temporary period.

By "nominal" membership, whether present or former in the Nazi, Fascist, Falangist, or other totalitarian party or organization, is meant mere membership during infancy under 16 years of age, or for purposes of obtaining employment, food-ration cards, general education, or through military service, or similar circumstances, and the alien has not actively engaged in advocating totalitarianism or voluntarily taken part in any atrocities committed by such totalitarian party or organization.

By good and legitimate reasons for wanting to enter the United States, is meant for purposes of health, business relations affecting the national economy, in the national interest from a standpoint of foreign relations, or similar considerations.

In cases where the alien has not yet departed for the United States, it is proposed that he should request consideration for advance exercise of the ninth proviso through the appropriate consul and the Department of State. Upon receipt of the request from the Department of State, the Department of Justice will consider the request in the light of the above criteria and advise the Department of State of its decision which may be relayed to the consul. It is anticipated that this procedure may be carried out without any appreciable delay.

The foregoing is respectfully submitted for your consideration as a temporary means of alleviating undue hardship in deserving cases under existing law.

Sincerely,

J. HOWARD MCGRATH,
Attorney General.

NOVEMBER 28, 1950.

The Honorable J. HOWARD MCGRATH,
Attorney General.

MY DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: I refer to your letter of October 20, 1950, in which you outline some of the views of your Department concerning certain provisions of the Internal Security Act of 1950.

While the Department has some doubts concerning several of the propositions enunciated in your letter, it seems necessary for the present to refer only to the provisions of section 1 (2) (C) of the act of October 16, 1918, as amended by the Internal Security Act of 1950, which you state, authorize the exclusion from the United States of aliens who "at any time, shall be or shall have been members * * * of the Communist or other totalitarian party * * * or organization."

For convenience the full text of 1 (2) (C) is herewith quoted:

"(C) Aliens who are members of or affiliated with (i) the Communist Party of the United States, (ii) any other totalitarian party of the United States, (iii) the Communist Political Association, (iv) the Communist or other totalitarian party of any State of the United States, of any foreign state, or of any political or geographical subdivision of any foreign state; (v) any section, subsidiary, branch, affiliate, or subdivision of any such association or party; or (vi) the direct predecessors or successors of any such association or party, regardless of what name such group or organization may have used, may now bear, or may hereafter adopt."

The quotation in your letter seems to have been based upon a combination of two separate provisions of section 1 (2) (C) (iv) and (vi). The word "organization" is clearly separated in the text of the act from the first part of the quotation by an intervening clause, (v), which refers to a "section, subsidiary, branch, affiliate, or subdivision" of the Communist Political Association or of the Communist or other totalitarian party.

Section 1 (2) (C) appears to be composed of categories which are not necessarily alike, beginning with (i) through (iv), which lists the parent or principal association or party followed by secondary or subsidiary groups thereof (v), and thirdly a listing of predecessors or successors of such parent or secondary groups (vi). In this connection (vi) reads:

"The direct predecessors or successors of any such association or party, regardless of what name such group or organization may have used, may now bear, or may hereafter adopt."

It is clear that the German Wehrmacht was not the predecessor of the Nazi Party and that it could not be considered as a successor of the Nazi Party since both ceased to exist for all practical purposes with the downfall of the German state.

Attention is also directed to the words "such group or organization," underscored in the above quotation. The word "such," it is believed, should be taken to refer to "predecessors or successors" of the two groups outlined in (i) through (iv) and (v), as previously indicated.

You state that the Nazi, Fascist, and Falangist Parties and organizations have been determined (by reason of immediate cases involving these parties) to be within the class of "other totalitarian party or organization," and you conclude that "there is no alternative to regarding present and former members of such parties or organizations as excludable from admission to the United States." It is not clear, however, whether by condensing and telescoping the language of the statute into the phrase "other totalitarian party or organization" its original and true meaning has been preserved, i. e., that the word "party" refers to the principal or parent organization, while the word "organization," as technically used in the statute refers to the offspring or creation which is subsidiary to the principal or parent party.

In this connection reference is made to the practice of the Immigration and Naturalization Service in holding that aliens who served in the military forces of Germany and Italy were at one time members of, or affiliated with, the Nazi or Fascist Parties or with a totalitarian party or organization, within the meaning of the act. This practice has been discussed by officers of the Department with the officers of the Immigration and Naturalization Service. It has been agreed that neither the German nor the Italian Army under Hitler or Mussolini constituted a totalitarian party within the meaning of the act. In order to hold that aliens who served in those armies are excludable, therefore, it would seem to be necessary to find that the German and Italian armies were "totalitarian organizations" within the meaning of the act.

In a sense, all armies are totalitarian, or at least authoritarian. It obviously was not the intention of Congress to exclude aliens who had served in the French or British Armies. In order to place the German and Italian Armies within the category of a "totalitarian organization" within the meaning of the act, it would seem to be necessary to find that these military organizations were a "section, subsidiary, branch, affiliate, or subdivision" of the parent Nazi or Fascist Parties.

I respectfully submit that this was not the fact. The military forces were arms of the German and Italian Governments and were of a military nature only. They were not in themselves political or party organizations. Membership in the party did not mean affiliation with the military forces, or vice versa. The German and Italian Armies were not created by the Nazi or Fascist Parties, but existed long before these parties came into power. They were not a "section, subsidiary, branch, affiliate, or subdivision" of any party, political or otherwise. In fact the military forces resisted the attempts of the Nazi and Fascist Parties to control them. They were never completely subjugated by, nor subservient to, the Nazi or Fascist Parties, and as late as 1944 there was concluded in the German Army an attempt to assassinate Hitler, the head of the German state and the Nazi Party. It would be a grave error of fact to hold that the German and Italian Armies were "sections, subsidiaries, branches, affiliates, or subdivisions" of the Nazi or Fascist Parties.

On the other hand, there were, of course, some members of the armed forces of Germany and Italy who were members of, or affiliated with, the Nazi or Fascist Parties, and some were members of, or affiliated with, the "sections, subsidiaries, branches, affiliates, or subdivisions" of the Nazi or Fascist Party. The Nazi Party records are in our hands. In the case of such personal membership or affiliation it may be that the aliens could properly be held to be excludable under the act, but to hold that members of the armed forces, which constituted the nonpolitical arms of these two governments, which governments in turn were controlled by the Nazi and Fascist political parties, makes them members, through the governments, of the parties, or even affiliated with the parties, would be so contrary to the facts that such a construction of the act might possibly be regarded by Congress as an attempt to give it an absurd interpretation in an effort to sabotage or discredit it.

The Department should appreciate your further consideration of, and advice on, this particular question as soon as practicable.

Sincerely yours,

CARLISLE H. HUMELSINE,
Deputy Under Secretary.

DECEMBER 5, 1950.

The Honorable J. HOWARD MCGRATH,
Attorney General.

MY DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: In accordance with your respect the Department has considered your letter of October 20, 1950, in which you set forth some of your views concerning the provisions of the act of October 16, 1918, as amended by the Internal Security Act of 1950.

Having communicated to you the views of this Department regarding the question whether service in the armed forces of Germany or Italy during the Hitler and Mussolini regimes constituted membership in, or affiliation with, the Nazi or Fascist Parties, or a totalitarian organization within the meaning of the act, and having requested a reconsideration and a further ruling on that question, the Department now desires to invite your attention to certain questions relating to the following statements in your letter:

"The Nazi, Fascist, and Falangist Parties and organizations have been determined (by reason of immediate cases involving these parties) to be within the class of 'other totalitarian party or organization' prescribed by category 2, and consequently there is no alternative to regarding present and former members of such parties or organizations as excludable from admission to the United States in accordance with section 22 of the act.

"However, in order to enforce the law and at the same time alleviate undue hardship, the Attorney General has exercised his discretionary authority under the ninth proviso of section 3 of the Immigration Act of February 5, 1917 (8 U. S. C. 136 (q)), to grant temporary admission to aliens in category 2 where the only ground of exclusion is the alien's normal membership, whether present or past, in either the Nazi, Fascist, Falangist, or other totalitarian party or organization, and it appears that the alien has a good and legitimate reason which would justify such temporary admission.

* * * * *

"By 'nominal' membership, whether present or former, in the Nazi, Fascist, Falangist, or other totalitarian party or organization, is meant mere membership during infancy under 16 years of age, or for purposes of obtaining employment, food ration cards, general education, or through military service, or similar circumstances, and the alien has not actively engaged in advocating totalitarianism or voluntarily taken part in any atrocities committed by such totalitarian party or organization."

This Department has no doubt that the statute must be considered as authorizing the exclusion of aliens who were members of, or affiliated with, the proscribed parties and organizations described in the act, even though such membership or affiliation was not evidenced by activities on behalf of such parties or organizations. The Department is also of the view that there is no objection to granting ninth proviso admission in the cases of "nominal" members, but in considering the minimum elements which must be present to constitute even nominal membership there are certain considerations on which the Department would like to have an expression of your views.

The Department concurs in the view that an alien who may have voluntarily taken part in any atrocities committed by a totalitarian party or organization is to be considered to be more than a "nominal" member of an excluded class. Conversely, however, if an act done involuntarily in connection with the commission of an atrocity is to be used as a basis for excusing the perpetrator from that degree of culpability which the statute requires to exclude upon a basis of more than "nominal" membership in, or affiliation with, a proscribed party or organization, why could not the involuntary act of becoming a member of a proscribed party or organization be likewise considered as vitiating the effects of the action? The principle involved seems to be the same in each instance, and the distinction in favor of a person involuntarily participating in the commission of an atrocity, but against a person who involuntarily became a member of a proscribed party or organization, is not clearly understood.

This Department has applied the well-established rules relating to the recognition of duress as a proper means of ameliorating the harsh and unreasonable application of the strict letter of other statutes. Section 401 (c) of the Nationality Act of 1940 provides that a citizen of the United States shall lose his nationality by "entering or serving in, the armed forces of a foreign state unless expressly authorized by the laws of the United States, if he has or acquires the nationality of such foreign state." However, it has been held administratively and by the courts that nationality is not lost under that statute when the military service was involuntary. (In re Asgal (75 F. Supp. 268 (1947)); Dos Reis ex rel. Camara v. Nicolls (161 F. 2d 500 (1947).)

In the case of Inouye v. Clark (73 F. Supp. 1000 (1948)), the court held that where the parents of a 17-year-old son were deportable as Japanese aliens, the son's renunciation of American citizenship, under parental pressure and because of his desire to accompany his parents, was voidable as having been made under duress, coercion, or undue influence.

In the case of United States v. Reiner (79 F. (2d) 315, 317 (1935)) the Circuit Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, reviewed the denial of a petition for a writ of habeas corpus which challenged the detention of an alien under an order of deportation based upon his membership in, or affiliation with, the Communist Party under the act of October 16, 1918, as amended, but prior to the amendment contained in section 22 of the Internal Security Act of 1950. The court said:

"In deciding this case, we shall not attempt to give a comprehensive definition of the word 'affiliation' as used in the statute. Very likely that is as impossible as it is now unnecessary. It is enough for present purposes to hold that it is not proved unless the alien is shown to have so conducted himself that he has brought about a status of mutual recognition that he may be relied on to cooperate with the Communist Party on a fairly permanent basis. He must be more than merely in sympathy with its aims or even willing to aid it in a casual intermittent way. Affiliation includes an element of dependability upon which the organization can rely which, though not equivalent to membership duty, does rest upon a course of conduct that could not be abruptly ended without giving at least reasonable cause for the charge of a breach of good faith."

In Colyer v. Sheffington (Fed. 17, 72 (D. C. Mass. 1920)) the court, in considering petitions for writs of habeas corpus of aliens held under warrants of arrest for deportation, made the following statement with respect to membership in an organization that advocates the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force or violence proscribed by the act of October 16, 1918:

"Assuming for the purposes of the present point that the Secretary's construction and application of the act to the Communist Party may be held to be correct, I accord with what I understand now to be the view of the Department of Labor, that such membership must be a real membership in or an actual affiliation with the proscribed organization. I do not think that Congress meant to authorize the expulsion of aliens who pass from one organization into another, supposing the change to be a mere change of name, and that by assenting to membership in the new organization they had not really changed their affiliations or political or economic activities. For illustration: When, at meetings of a local of the Socialist Party, notice was given that the local had been expelled or had seceded from the Socialist Party and would thereafter take the name 'Communist', and that signatures for membership in the new organization were requisite, nothing more appearing, I could not hold that such new membership, thus created, brings the new members within the purview of the act of Congress. Congress could not have intended to authorize the wholesale deportation of aliens who, accidentally, artificially, or unconsciously in appearance only, are found to be members of or affiliated with an organization of whose platform and purposes they have no real knowledge."

In the case of Bridges v. Wixon (326 U. S. 135 (1945)) the Supreme Court of the United States reviewed the denial of a petition for a writ of habeas corpus challenging the detention of an alien under an order of deportation under the act of October 16, 1918, as amended, but prior to the amendment contained in section 22 of the Internal Security Act of 1950, on the ground that the alien was a member of, or affiliated with, the Communist Party of the United States. In its opinion, the Supreme Court stated:

"The legislative history throws little light on the meaning of 'affiliation' as used in the statute. It imports, however, less than membership but more than sympathy. By the terms of the statute it includes those who contribute money or anything of value to an organization which believes in, advises, advocates, or teaches the overthrow of our Government by force and violence. That example throws light on the meaning of the term 'affiliation.' He who renders financial assistance to any organization may generally be said to approve of its objectives or aims. * * * Whether intermittent or repeated, the act or acts tending to prove 'affiliation' must be of that quality which indicates an adherence to or a furtherance of the purposes or objectives of the proscribed organization as distinguished from mere cooperation with it in lawful activities. The act or acts must evidence a working alliance to bring the program to fruition."

If the rulings mentioned above are deemed to be relevant, and the term "affiliation" as used in previous statutes means something less than "membership" in, but more than sympathy with the aims of, an organization, and if the term "affiliation" as used in the statute in question can be given the same meaning, it would seem to be clear that not all infants under 16 years of age may be said to be even "nominal" members of, or affiliated with, one of the proscribed parties or organizations mentioned in the statute in question. Similarly, it would appear that an alien who was under compulsion, coercion, duress, or force majeure, when involuntarily impressed into a party or organization, or who was inducted without his proper knowledge, particularly into a party or organization with which he has had no ideological affinity and in behalf of which he has not rendered active ideological support, even if he could be considered to be only a "nominal" member of the organization, could also be considered as not being the kind of member which the Congress intended to exclude from the United States under the statute in question, particularly in the absence of evidence of such a specific intent.

It is believed that it would be possible to hold that the statute was not designed or intended to exclude aliens who found themselves under various kinds of coercive pressure to join a proscribed party or organization. The emphasis in the statute is upon security, coupled with the lack of faith in the reformation, conversion, or defection of aliens who, once classifiable as undesirable, may not be trusted to maintain their professed opposition to what they previously had stood for, and therefore would constitute a security risk if permitted to come to the United States. In the case of a person who was not a voluntary member or affiliate of a proscribed organization, and who never believed in what it stood for, but who was made an involuntary member or an affiliate of the organization under some form of duress, there may have been no security risk in the first place and, particularly when the forced membership or affiliation has ended, the reason for exclusion because of such former connection with a proscribed organization becomes obscure and questionable. Instead of such "membership" or "affiliation" being held to be "nominal," and to work exclusion in the absence of ninth proviso action, it is believed that it would be quite permissible and appropriate and wholly desirable, under the statute, to hold that aliens in such cases were not actually members of, or affiliated with, the proscribed organization, either nominally or otherwise, within the meaning of the statute. No ninth proviso action would therefore be required in such cases.

If such a construction of the statute should be considered appropriate, it would mean that aliens as much under 16 years of age as from birth to the age of reason would not be excludable from the United States because of having been inducted into the Hitler Youth, or other similar organizations; that aliens who, unwittingly and without their knowledge or consent, were impressed into the labor front are not excludable; and that the rank and file of non-Nazi and non-Fascist members of a proscribed party or organization, never having become connected with a proscribed party or organization through the exercise of their own free will, would not be excludable from the United States under the statute.

It would be appreciated if you could review the questions hereinbefore presented and advise the Department of your opinion and conclusions.

Sincerely yours,

CARLISLE H. HUMELSINE,
Deputy Under Secretary.

DECEMBER 6, 1950.

MY DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: The Department refers again to your letter of October 20, 1950, concerning the Internal Security Act of 1950 and invites the attention of the Department of Justice to the provisions of section 22, subdivision 2 (C) (v), of the act which authorize the exclusion of aliens "who, at any time, shall be or shall have been members of * * * any section, subsidiary, branch, affiliate, or subdivision" of the Communist Party or other totalitarian party.

In considering the question of what the Congress intended by the words "any section, subsidiary, branch, affiliate, or subdivision" of the parties concerned, the Department has come to the conclusion that all organizations created by the Nazi or Fascist Parties of Germany and Italy for political propaganda, or subversive purposes may fall within the intent of the statute. However, organizations which existed long before the Hitler or Mussolini regimes, and particularly those which have also survived those regimes, such as the medical association, engineers society, or other business or professional organizations and clubs, are not comprehended within the intent of the statute.

If the conclusion above stated is the proper one it would mean that an alien who was a voluntary member of such organization or club would not be excludible because of such membership. On the other hand, an alien who voluntarily joined the Nazi or Fascist Parties, or any organization created by those parties for political, propaganda, or subversive purposes, would be held to be excludible under the statute, as such a person would appear to be classifiable within an ideological category which Congress intended to be excluded.

It would be appreciated if the Department of Justice would advise this Department of its opinion and conclusion on the question hereinbefore presented.

Sincerely yours,

CARLISLE H. HUMELSINE,
Deputy Under Secretary.

NOVEMBER 17, 1950.

Hon. J. HOWARD MCGRATH,
The Attorney General, Department of Justice, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: During recent weeks the attention of this subcommittee has been directed to the increasing number of cases in which nonimmigrant and immigrant visas have been withheld, or admission into this country denied to aliens on the basis of certain rulings issued by the Department of Justice pursuant to the Internal Security Act of 1950.

In the majority of the cases brought to our attention—many of which involve spouses of servicemen—the reason most frequently given for the denial of admission appears to be the applicant's past membership of or affiliation with organizations such as Hitler Youth (HJ), Fascist Youth (Balilla), German Girls' Union (BDM), German Labor Front (AF), certain trade and professional unions and organizations, or his service in the German or Italian Armies.

It is believed that this situation, creating undue personal hardship and greatly damaging our international relations, requires urgent rectification. It is further believed that it has been caused by misinterpretation of the Internal Security Act of 1950.

I am familiar with the contents of your letter to the Secretary of State, dated October 20, 1950, but it is not believed that the policy therein outlined, would provide the desired remedy. Moreover, the policy of admitting temporarily under the ninth proviso certain immigrants who apply for permanent admission, does not appear to have been authorized by the new law.

In order to assist you in the promulgation of regulations designed to correct the interpretation which is obviously erroneous and detrimental to the national interest, the following is respectfully submitted for your consideration:

1. In providing for a better protection of our internal security and in making a determined but carefully weighed effort to eliminate from our body politic the subversive elements, both presently and potentially dangerous and undesirable, the Congress has diligently tried to write the new law so as to preclude unfairness, exaggeration, or abuse in its enforcement.

2. The large group of us lawyers, entrusted with the drafting of this legislation, was fully familiar with the considerable volume of judicial and administrative interpretations of the existing immigration and naturalization laws, as they have accumulated—unchallenged—through the years.

3. With these binding interpretations in our minds, we have carefully and studiously avoided including into the new statute any language which would nullify the existing jurisprudence and open the doors to new interpretations.

4. Comparison of the pertinent language of the old and the new statutes will, I hope, prove my point:

(a) The act of October 16, 1918, as amended by the act of June 28, 1940, reads in part as follows:

"That any alien who, at any time shall be or shall have been a member of any one of the following classes shall be excluded from admission into the United States:

"(c) Aliens who believe in, advise, advocate, or teach, or who are members of or affiliated with any organization, association, society, or group that believes in, advises, advocates, or teaches * * *" etc.

(b) Section 22 of the act of September 23, 1950 (Internal Security Act of 1950), in amending the foregoing act of 1918, incorporates the subsection (c) above and adds, among other provisions, the following:

"Aliens who are members of or affiliated with * * *" (list of proscribed organizations follows).

This pertinent language, identical in both statutes, reads: "members of or affiliated with." As stressed above, the preservation of this language—tested as it is in courtrooms and in administrative rulings—was intentional.

5. The unchallenged interpretations referred to above, pertain both to the definition of "membership" and of "affiliation." To cite only a few of them:

In Colver v. Skeffington (Fed. 17, 72 (D. C. Mass. 1920)) the Court, in considering petitions for writs of habeas corpus of aliens held under warrants of arrest for deportation, made the following statement with respect to membership in an organization that advocates the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force or violence proscribed by the act of October 16, 1918:

"I accord with what I understand now to be the view of the Department of Labor, that such membership must be a real membership in or an actual affiliation with the proscribed organization * * *. Congress could not have intended to authorize the wholesale deportation of aliens who, accidentally, artificially, or unconsciously in appearance only, are found to be members of or affiliated with an organization of whose platform and purpose they have no real knowledge."

In Bridges v. Wixon (326 U. S. 135 (1945)), the Supreme Court of the United States said:

"The legislative history throws little light on the meaning of 'affiliation' as used in the statute. It imports, however, less than membership but more than sympathy. * * * But he who cooperates with such an organization only in its wholly lawful activities cannot by that fact be said as a matter of law to be 'affiliated' with it. Nor is it conclusive that the cooperation was more than intermittent and showed a rather consistent course of conduct. * * * Whether intermittent or repeated, the act or acts tending to prove 'affiliation' must be of that quality which indicates an adherence to or a furtherance of the purposes or objectives of the proscribed organization as distinguished from mere cooperation with it in lawful activities. The act or acts must evidence a working alliance to bring the program to fruition. * * * But close cooperation is not sufficient to establish an 'affiliation' within the meaning of the statute. It must evidence a working alliance to bring the proscribed program to fruition."

I wish also to refer to the decision rendered in United States v. Reiner (79 F. (2d) 315, 317 (C. C. A. (2d), 1935) and to the following, as it appears in the Immigration Manual of the Immigration and Naturalization Service, Department of Justice:

" 'Affiliation' is a working alliance to bring to fruition the proscribed program of an organization, as distinguished from mere cooperation with the organization in its lawful activities or in the attainment of its wholly lawful objectives. The word imports less than membership but more than sympathy, and includes an element of dependability upon which the organization can rely that, though not equivalent to membership duty, rests upon a course of conduct that could not be abruptly ended without giving at least reasonable cause for the charge of a breach of good faith.

"The act or acts tending to prove affiliation must be of that quality that indicates an adherence to or a furtherance of the purposes or objectives of the proscribed organization as distinguished from mere cooperation with it in wholly lawful activities."

There is also available a convincing outline of the Department of State's policy—concurred in by the Department of Justice—regarding the membership in the Nazi or Fascist Party or service in the German or Italian Armies, as presented in an address delivered on February 26, 1949, by Mr. Herve J. L'Heureux, Chief, Visa Division, Department of State.

Further, there is a ruling of the Department of State regarding the membership in the People's Front of Yugoslavia which was induced for the purpose of obtaining food rations, job, or housing permits, etc. Although I am not ready to express my personal approval of the ruling regarding this particular organization which has declared itself to be a part of the Communist Party of Yugoslavia, I nevertheless see in this decision an attempt at a differentiation between real Communists and those who might have joined a proscribed organization under duress.

6. In the consideration of cases in which membership of or affiliation with proscribed organizations occurred during the alien's childhood or his early youth, the following Court decision discussing the validity of legal acts exercised by minors, deserves attention:

In the case of Inouye v. Clark (73 F. Supp. 1000 (1948)) the Court held that where the parents of a 17-year-old citizen were subject to deportation as Japanese aliens, the boy's renunciation of American citizenship under parental pressure and because of his desire to go with his parents was voidable as having been made under duress, coercion, and undue influence. The Court stated:

"Freedom of will is essential in the exercise of an act which is urged to be binding, and the right of citizenship being an important civil one can only be waived as the result of free and intelligent choice. The mere fact that some of the plaintiffs having stated that they knew the results of their renunciations does not remove the primary force and effect of duress, coercion, and undue influence that caused them to renounce.

"For the reason thus stated, the results of the plaintiffs' renunciations having been made under undue influence, duress, and coercion and not of their free will and act, and the further thought as to the plaintiff, Albert Yuichi Inouye, not being competent of legal age at the time he made his application for renunciation, who also acted under undue influence, duress, and coercion, their renunciations are declared to be null and void and canceled and they are restored to their rights of citizenship."

It certainly appears that these wise considerations are equally applicable in cases where the child's education and welfare, indeed its very subsistence, was made by the totalitarian regimes of Germany and Italy dependent on its membership in the various youth groups and organizations.

7. Similarly, membership of adult persons who had to join the proscribed organizations for the purpose of obtaining or preserving their employment, food ration cards, general education, etc., clearly falls within the purview of the term "duress" as defined and interpreted in numerous judicial and administrative decisions only perfunctorily mentioned in this letter, but certainly available to you, as they were available to us during our work on the Internal Security Act of 1950.

Mr. Attorney General, let me briefly recapitulate what is in our minds. It was, and it invariably remains, our intention to bar from admission and to eliminate from our midst the Communist subversive element, the active advocates of a totalitarian form of government. We want to exclude the alien who comes to our shores or remains in our country in order to attempt to overthrow our form of government by subversion, by deceit, by force, and by violence, and to replace it by a dictatorial rule controlled from abroad. Similarly, we want to close our doors to those who as Nazis or Fascists actively, knowingly, and willingly helped in the perpetration of the most appalling crimes ever recorded in human history, and who—if permitted to live among us—would undoubtedly spread the totalitarian poison of hatred and intolerance.

We have made it, however, abundantly clear in the carefully chosen and clear language of the Internal Security Act of 1950, that we do not want to exclude immigrants or visitors who as children had to wear fancy shirts of various colors, or who as adults, under threat of imprisonment, of starvation or of violent death, reluctantly joined the auxiliaries of the Nazis or Fascist parties.

Hoping that these thoughts could be speedily conveyed to the personnel charged with the administration of the new law I remain,

Sincerely yours,

FRANCIS E. WALTER,
Chairman.

TRIBUTES TO RETIRING SENATORS

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I desire to take this opportunity, on the closing day of the Eighty-first Congress, to say a brief word with respect to those of our colleagues whose service in this body ends today.

SCOTT W. LUCAS, OF ILLINOIS

On a prior occasion, I joined with other Members of this body in felicitating our retiring majority leader, the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois, SCOTT W. LUCAS. I doubt that I can add to the encomiums made then. It seems to me, however, that our friend from Illinois should know the warm place he holds in each of our hearts. His has been a difficult, thankless, and at times an almost impossible task. He has performed his duty with zeal, ability, and a fine sense of public duty. The responsibility which his colleagues laid upon him was always uppermost in his mind. I believe that I am bespeaking the regard and affection of every Member of the Senate, on both sides of the aisle, when I wish him well in whatever endeavors he undertakes in the future. He has our sincere personal regards and good wishes for good health and prosperity in the years ahead.

FRANCIS J. MYERS, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Holding no less a place in our esteem is the retiring majority whip, Senator FRANCIS J. MYERS, of Pennsylvania. It was my great good fortune to have the privilege of serving on the same committee with the distinguished Senator from the Keystone State throughout his term in the United States Senate, and I believe I am expressing the viewpoint of every one of his colleagues on that committee when I say that no Senator has been more zealous in his duties, more alert and responsive to the problems before us, more conscientious in his attention to business, and more considerate and pleasant to work with than has Senator MYERS. Perhaps some measure of his ability and the high regard in which he is held by Democrats and Republicans alike is evidenced by the assertions I have heard made on numerous occasions that it is unfortunate that Senator MYERS does not come from a border or Southern State, where his tenure in office might be more reasonably assured, since he and his abilities are an adornment to the Senate and of great value to the public interest. The Senator from Pennsylvania, fortunately, is a young man, and I am sure that the people of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania will again call on his great ability and devoted service. In the meantime, in this holiday season, I extend to him and his family cordial good wishes for their happiness and prosperity.

MILLARD E. TYDINGS, OF MARYLAND

It is with regret that I note the departure of the distinguished senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. His length of service has made him one of the truly great and experienced legislators of our time. He has distinguished himself by his fine mind, his great capability for work, and his wise counsel in difficult times of stress. He has brought honor and respect not alone to himself but to the citizens of the great Free State of Maryland, whom he has represented so ably and devotedly in this body for nearly a quarter of a century. That his abilities and experience will be sadly missed goes without saying. He has, I am sure, our best wishes for the future and our hope that we may see him frequently and call on his store of experience to help us over some of the hurdles we will have to surmount in the troubled times ahead.

ELMER THOMAS, OF OKLAHOMA

It is with a sharp feeling of personal sorrow that I allude to the departure of the distinguished senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS]. As one who was born and raised in Oklahoma Territory, I have maintained a sort of proprietary interest in the problems and representation of the Sooner State and I have no hesitation in saying that ELMER THOMAS has been a great and devoted servant of his people and State. He, too, had long service in this body, and, out of the fullness of that experience, his wisdom and counsel were helpful to many of us. His service in behalf of agriculture particularly, will not soon be forgotten by those who fill the granaries of the country. I transmit to him our friendly regard and sincere affection and wish him well.

ELBERT D. THOMAS, OF UTAH

The intellectual attainments and scholarly devotion to his duties of the able senior Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] are well known to all of us. He has given valuable service as a member and chairman of the important Committee on Labor and Public Welfare and the men and women of labor are losing a fast friend and warm supporter of their ideals and objectives. Moreover, his knowledge and study of international relations made him an equally valuable member of the Committee on Foreign Relations where his counsel also will be sorely missed. I feel sure that the ability and experience of the senior Senator from Utah will be taken advantage of by our Government as he leaves this body with our good wishes and warm regards.

TRIBUTE TO OTHER RETIRING SENATORS

In addition to these five eminent Senators, the majority loses the services, the ability, and the friendly companionship of six other Members of this body to whose character and attainments I have previously alluded. I have specific reference to the able Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], whose felicity of public expression was never more ably demonstrated than last week; to the gifted Senator from North Carolina, Mr. Graham, whose friendliness and charm has endeared him to all of us; to the forceful Senator from California, Mr. Downey, with whom I have personally differed on some irrigation and reclamation matters but whose forensic ability I most humbly respect; to the gracious Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WITHERS], whose stay with us has been all too brief; to the respected Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LEAHY], whose quietness and humility has not cloaked his legal ability and who we all know will make an able jurist; and to the able and gifted Senator from Idaho [Mr. TAYLOR], who has convinced all of us of his complete sincerity of purpose and ideals. To all of these gentlemen I wish health and happiness in the years ahead.

I would be derelict to my conscience and less than frank if I did not at this time pay my sincere respects to my colleagues on the other side of the aisle who are about to leave us. It has been my experience that, in the main, issues here are not determined on narrow partisan political lines, but rather on the basis of conception of principles. No three Senators on either side of the aisle more nearly typify and exemplify that nonpartisan approach than do the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GURNEY], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL], and the Senator from Kansas, Mr. Darby.

There is little I can add to what already has been said on this floor about the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GURNEY]. He has been an able and conscientious legislator and enjoys the respect and confidence not alone of his colleagues but of the officials in the executive arm of the Government with whom he has worked. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL] has proved beyond any question his right to be regarded as one of the hardest working, fairest and most judicially minded, sincere and able legislators on either side of this aisle. In my judgment he has never sought to take partisan advantage but rather to fulfill his post strictly according to the letter of the law and his oath; his record is a monument to fairmindedness and tolerance. Mr. DARBY, who until recently was the junior Senator from Kansas was with us only a few months, but in that short space of time he endeared himself to all of us with his friendliness, courtesy, and genuine good fellowship. All of us will miss him and we hope and expect that he will sometime adorn this Chamber again. Therefore, to all three of these friends, and they are our friends and respected colleagues, I extend my sincere good wishes for their health and happiness in the days ahead.

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR GURNEY AND SENATOR DONNELL

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, on this last day of the Eighty-first Congress, I wish to express my great friendship, appreciation, and admiration for two of my fellow Senators who are leaving the Senate and with whom I have served for a long time, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GURNEY] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL].

The Senator from South Dakota and I came to the Senate on the same day, and we were sworn in on the same day. We have served together continuously for 12 years. During that time we have had the most pleasant personal associations. Senator GURNEY was elected to the Senate from South Dakota, where he was born. He is a veteran of the First World War. He has made himself an authority on military affairs, and his opinion on that subject commands universal respect throughout the Nation. I have had many personal associations with him. I remember that during the first session in which we served he introduced a bill, which I supported, to require the introduction of a certain amount of alcohol into gasoline in order to provide a better market for farm products. From that time there have been many matters in which we have been associated. He has served not only as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, but also as a valuable and industrious member of the Committee on Appropriations. He has been conscientious, he is an able man, and he has always been most courteous and most judicial in his judgments. His judgments have always been on the progressive side and in behalf of the progressive improvement of American conditions. I shall greatly miss him as a friend and colleague in the next Congress.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL] was elected 6 years ago, and I have served with him during that time, in some ways more intimately, because we have served together on the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. Certainly his work on that committee has been outstanding. I think it would be very difficult to find a Senator who has done better work or who could be relied on more for serious, intelligent, and impartial consideration of every measure that has come before the committee and the Senate.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL] has approached every problem without prejudice. He has approached it with an open mind. He has studied every problem that has come before the Senate, and he has specialized on questions of labor, and particularly on questions with respect to public health. He has held long sessions as the only member of the committee present, when I was most apologetic because I was not able to be there and he has spent much time in studying the whole subject of national health insurance and many other health subjects. I feel very confident that it will be difficult indeed to find any Senator who has contributed more to the actual legislative work of this Congress, a Senator who has been more able, or has done more work. He has always been a good friend of all other Senators, he has commanded their respect, and he has certainly well represented for 6 years the interests of the people of Missouri as he has seen those interests. In my judgment he has seen them right in practically every instance that I know of. I shall always regard him as a dear friend.

FORREST C. DONNELL, OF MISSOURI

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I should like to associate myself with the remarks just made by the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] concerning our colleague, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL], who is about to leave us.

During the past 6 years I have had very close associations with the Senator from Missouri. Our relations have always been of the most cordial kind. I consider him one of the ablest Members of this body with whom I have ever had any contact. He has been a great help to our committee. While we have differed on many of the problems which have come before the committee, he has been a man of honor, a man of great ability, and has contributed much to the activities of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

I have discussed with other members of the committee his contribution. I think there is not a member of that committee who has not the highest respect for the distinguished Senator from Missouri. The committee has authorized me to present the following tribute to FORREST C. DONNELL, which has been agreed to by all members of the committee on both sides:

A TRIBUTE TO FORREST C. DONNELL

We, the members of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, desire to, and do hereby, express our high respect and admiration for our distinguished colleague, FORREST C. DONNELL.

Our committee in its deliberations during the past 6 years has been most fortunate in having the advice and assistance of an able legislative technician and constitutional lawyer, in the person of our highly respected colleague. His honesty, sincerity, and untiring determination to uphold those principles which he believed to be right have left their imprint on all legislative matters considered by our committee. In all his activities as a legislator he has shown himself to be a man of sterling character and unusual ability—a man who recognizes public office as a public trust. His diligent pursuit of the truth and his untiring industry have guaranteed that our committee, in all its deliberations, acted with complete knowledge of the facts and the law.

His pleasing and unaffected personality, and his devotion to high principles, have made him our highly respected friend and colleague. The eminent fairness of his attitude in all our deliberations has everlastingly endeared him to all of us and we extend to him our cordial good wishes for success and happiness in all his future life.

[Applause.]

REPLY BY SENATOR DONNELL

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I would indeed be insensible of the honor which has been shown me by the very eloquent remarks of the Senator from Arizona, the Senator from Ohio, and the Senator from Montana did I not say at least a word in response.

In responding to these remarks, I do so likewise with respect to certain other very generous and kind observations which were made several days ago by other colleagues upon the floor of the Senate, including my own distinguished colleague from Missouri [Mr. KEM].

I shall trespass only a moment upon the time of the Senate. First I desire to spread upon the records of the Senate my appreciation of the privilege which the people of my native State have given to me in permitting me to serve in this great body. I wish also to express my realization of the great privilege it is to be a Member of the United States Senate, and the education it affords to any man who undertakes to do his duty fearlessly and honestly in this body. I express to Members of the Senate my hearty thanks and appreciation for all the many courtesies which have been extended to me. I should like also to include in that observation the distinguished Presiding Officer, the Vice President of the United States.

It will always be a great pleasure to me to recall my associations in this body. I am deeply indebted to all Senators. I am deeply indebted to the people of my State.

For all Senators, as individuals, and for this great body, confronted as it is today with all the problems to which reference has been made from time to time, I wish the guidance of God Himself in carrying out the responsibilities which confront us. [Applause.]

SCOTT W. LUCAS, OF ILLINOIS

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, one of the few sad experiences connected with service in the Senate of the United States is the departure of beloved associates. It is peculiarly hard when a departing associate is a close personal friend; when he is a real leader; when he is an able, just, and attractive leader; when he has a fine personality, winning ways, great ability and a friendly temper, and a marvelous power to lead. Such a man is SCOTT LUCAS, of Illinois, who by an accident of politics lost out in the November election, and who will not be with us in the next Congress.

In the nearly 34 years that I have been a Member of the Senate we have never had a better leader. I did not know him well before he became our leader. But for the past 2 years Senator LUCAS and I have sat next to each other on the floor of the Senate. I have seen him perform his difficult and arduous duties. I have witnessed his kindly, diplomatic, and friendly methods of dealing with his fellow Senators of his own party, and his use of the same methods in his dealings with the members of the Republican Party; I have seen the skill and ability that he has used in furthering legislation; I have witnessed his continuous and able labors for his own people in Illinois, for his own party, but above all for his Government and for his country and the people of this Nation. I can truthfully say that, while we have had fine leaders in the Senate before, we have never had a better or more hard working or more faithful and successful leader than we have had in SCOTT LUCAS.

As we all know, he was a veteran of the First World War; a founder of the American Legion; a fighter for a strong national defense; and he is in the vanguard of American leaders who have erected a great Federal program to meet the needs of American veterans.

He was born in Illinois near Havana in the very heart of the Lincoln country. He was highly educated and entered into the practice of law when he grew up. He is a fine lawyer as well as a soldier. In 1926 he became commander of the Legion's Illinois Department. Afterward he was unanimously elected as national judge advocate of the Legion and served four terms in this position.

As majority leader of the Senate, Senator LUCAS led the fight to push through all measures to strengthen the military power of America and the free world. Under his leadership bills have been enacted to streamline and unify our Armed Forces, to improve the administration of the Central Intelligence Agency, and to increase the pay scale of our officers and enlisted men. He is one of the most valiant friends the veterans ever had.

In many ways, Senator LUCAS has demonstrated the wisdom and foresight which has made him one of the most valuable Members of the United States Senate. Washington newspaper men and radio commentators rate him as one of the hardest working Senators in recent history.

In times of crisis Senator LUCAS acts swiftly and successfully.

He served in the House of Representatives for two terms, where he made a notable record.

As the top man in the Senate, Senator LUCAS has vigorously advocated our bipartisan foreign policy to defeat the ruthless forces of communism. Throughout his career he has been a man of action and achievement. He has become known throughout America and the world as a constructive Senator who has the ability to get things done.

From my close association with him, in sitting next to each other in the Senate, I have come to respect, esteem, and admire him very greatly. I take this occasion to say to him that we shall miss him in our labors here and that we wish for him in the coming years every prosperity and success.

Mr. President, other Senators for whom I have the greatest respect, admiration, and esteem, who will not be with us in the next session of Congress, have been eulogized today. I join in the statements that have been made about them by other Senators.

ELMER THOMAS, OF OKLAHOMA

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, as this session of Congress draws to a close, it will usher from this Chamber some of our most beloved and able Members. Regardless of an occasional difference of opinion in this great deliberative body, there is a strong bond of mutual respect and appreciation, and we all feel a certain sadness to see the ranks break for the passing of a familiar face.

For me, it is particularly a time of sober reflection to witness the departure from official life—at least temporarily—of one with whom I personally have been associated for so many years. But, I also am lifted by pride and satisfaction when reviewing the splendid career of my good friend and senior colleague from Oklahoma, Senator ELMER THOMAS.

When I served as an official in the Democratic Party and then as Governor of Oklahoma, I found ELMER THOMAS most effective and helpful in every way. This fruitful association first taught me the real significance and value of close and friendly cooperation between the State and Federal Governments.

And when I myself entered the Senate 2 years ago, I began to appreciate him even more. I came here as a freshman into a situation that was highly specialized. Much had to be learned with reference to procedure, rules, and methods of service.

I could always count on Elmer. He not only was available when I called on him, but he often volunteered helpful suggestions. He even told me about the Senate barber shop, and he showed me where it was. He gave me accurate information about the shaving mug I would get with my name on it. He also gave me some mighty wise counsel about the mug I brought with me. He said I would find the shaving mug readily available when I needed it, but that it reposed in safe obscurity when not in productive use. He warned me it would be the better part of wisdom to be just as certain that the mug I brought with me was needed before I insisted on using it. He convinced me that it also should spend much time in safe security.

The Nation long has rated ELMER THOMAS as one of the most influential Senators, a leader in farm legislation and money matters generally. But to Oklahoma, directly benefiting in countless ways from his 24-year service in this body, ELMER THOMAS literally is Mr. United States Senator. For so long so many Oklahomans personally have come in contact with ELMER THOMAS, they just naturally think of him when there is reference to the United States Senate.

Tall, distinguished, silver-haired, he typifies the popular conception of a statesman, both in manner and appearance. His mental genius and his dynamic personality have more than matched his impressive physical bearing.

This unusual combination of talents, reinforced by willing hands, and a generous heart, has developed an almost unique career. The result is a record of service to both the State and Nation.

ELMER THOMAS came to Oklahoma on November 16, 1900, exactly 7 years before statehood. Both had vast dreams and the promise of a great future. The two grew and matured together. They influenced each other's course, and today, the story of ELMER THOMAS and the story of Oklahoma are closely entwined.

ELMER THOMAS developed a real affection and sentiment for his adopted State of Oklahoma. And, I know the citizens of our State reciprocate in full measure. Only last November, on the eve of the general election, this mutual feeling was dramatically demonstrated by his magnificent speech for the Democratic ticket and the fine reception it received.

Although he was defeated in the runoff primary, ELMER THOMAS came back to Oklahoma, and told the people that regardless of his defeat, he never would forget how good they had been to him all these years. And, he asked them to keep on being good to the Democratic ticket, even though he was not on it this time.

Well, I do not need to tell Senators that Elmer had never been more eloquent nor sounded better to us Democrats than on that occasion. And, from all results, the people liked him, too. The Oklahoma Democratic ticket did mighty well at the polls. Again, Elmer had helped do it.

ELMER THOMAS, indeed, has a permanent place in the hearts of Oklahomans. His official works for Oklahoma have made lasting history.

To give the Senate some idea of the amazing scope of his contributions to Oklahoma, the projects and improvements which ELMER THOMAS helped secure cost more than the current assessed valuation of our entire State. This includes our vital flood-control program in Oklahoma, which is protecting the soil and harnessing the water power for industry. His strong position on the Senate Appropriations Committee made him most valuable to his State in so many ways.

All in all, I think it is entirely accurate to say that in his 40 years as a legislator the successful efforts of ELMER THOMAS have boosted the development of our State more than those of any other single individual.

When there was a tough legislative problem, the tendency was to "let Elmer do it." He seemed always able to come up with the answer. A letter he wrote, a conference he arranged, an amendment inserted—just a few lines in the right place. We let Elmer do it, and he always knew what to do. Yes, sir; I know the Oklahoma delegation is really going to miss the guidance and assistance of ELMER THOMAS.

All these years, in his quiet but most effective way, Senator THOMAS really got the job done. But he always felt that actions speak for themselves, and he never was one to dramatize himself.

Perhaps, in Oklahoma, we got so accustomed to having ELMER THOMAS do it for us we were inclined to take him for granted. Even here, where ELMER THOMAS has served so long with brilliance and distinction, I am sure that many of his colleagues would be amazed to hear the wide range of his manifold accomplishments.

The economic welfare of the American farmer generally has been advanced, and the working conditions of the American laborer improved, thanks to Senator THOMAS. He has been keenly aware of the importance of adequate purchasing power for the masses. It was on the stabilization of their income that he has tried to build a real and permanent prosperity for the Nation.

This basic objective took him into diverse fields of activity. For example, it was Senator THOMAS who originated the legislation for the devaluation of the dollar. President Roosevelt personally called him to the White House, embraced his idea, and threw the weight of the administration to insure its passage. This fiscal device netted nearly a $3,000,000,000 profit for the Government, and, at the same time, contributed to equitable prices and a permanent stabilization of our economy.

As an active friend of labor Senator THOMAS was the father of the first 40-hour-week law. He authored the amendment which first legalized a standard workweek providing time and one-half for overtime. This particular bill, known as the Thomas 40-hour workweek, applied only to the employees of the Government Printing Office, but it paved the way for a general adoption.

ELMER THOMAS developed a skill for handling the highly complex problems of Government finance. He has shown an amazing insight into the basic principles which shape our whole economy. But ELMER THOMAS, the farmer's son from Indiana, learned his practical lessons about dollars and cents in the school of hard knocks.

Times were hard back there in Indiana, at the turn of the century. Farm prices were low, dollars scarce. No matter how hard a farmer worked, nor how many hours of toil that went into his crops, he just could not make enough to buy what he needed at the store.

ELMER THOMAS' well-known conviction about the necessity for agricultural parity took root back there in the difficulties he experienced, and the hardships he knew on the family farm.

Back in those boyhood days, encouraged by his mother, there budded the dream of a political career. And one of the first things ELMER THOMAS hoped to do was to improve the lot of the farmer and give him a better life.

It seemed a faint hope for a poor farmer's son to make his own way in the outside world, secure an education, and climb the political ladder to the Nation's highest lawmaking body. ELMER THOMAS' father was a practical man, beset with the task of making a living, and he wanted his son to stick to the land.

Fate, however, sometimes intervenes strangely, and it was a weak physical condition which helped set ELMER THOMAS on his future career. Because he was unable to carry the load of field work, he became his mother's chief assistant. The two lived closely, and their daily association greatly affected his sensitive nature.

Like so many other great Americans he was inspired by a mother's glowing pictures of the outside world, and he was fortified by her words of wisdom and courage. Then and there, he determined he would get a college education, and that he would move on to the greater goals ahead.

As in so many of our success stories, ELMER THOMAS thrived on adversity. At 15, he graduated from country school, ready for college, but to spare his father's feelings, he did not make the break from home until the next year.

Thereafter, for 8 years, he divided his time between teaching and attending school. He earned several diplomas from Central Normal and from DePauw in Indiana. A graduate in law, in pedagogy, and in elocution, ELMER THOMAS also found time for a wide range of extracurricular activities. He served as editor of the university paper, and of the annual.

Already, he was showing the talents for leadership that later were to bring him victory at the polls and an outstanding career in public life.

ELMER THOMAS took what he had learned in the classroom and on the college campus and first began to apply it in his home territory. He displayed his oratorical ability on the political stump. He successfully promoted a bond issue for a system of badly needed gravel roads. Before he set out for new frontiers, ELMER THOMAS already had made a considerable reputation as a young man who was going places. But the free lands of the West were too inviting. So, the acorn that had been planted on the banks of the Wabash was transplanted to Oklahoma, and ELMER THOMAS was on the road to a new career in a new and virgin territory.

Almost exactly a half-century ago, ELMER THOMAS first arrived in Oklahoma City. His small capital of $200 was vanishing, but young THOMAS was undaunted. He soon proceeded to the town of Lawton and drew for a homestead nest-egg.

At Lawton, ELMER THOMAS hung out his shingle to practice law, and he early began to work in the Democratic Party organization. His reputation for brilliance in the law and sagacity in politics spread rapidly. Soon, he was on his way.

At the opening of statehood, the district Democrats were engulfed in a controversy—and, incidentally we still have them. ELMER THOMAS was sought out as the compromise candidate for State senator, and he won an easy victory.

He soon came to the forefront at the State capitol, rising to the chairmanship of the important appropriations committee. A permanent capitol building, financed under his leadership, today stands as a monument to his resourcefulness and his practical ability. It is also symbolic of his pioneer role in the building of Oklahoma.

Senator THOMAS set about to make possible the fine new building without imposing a heavy burden of debt on the people. He discovered several odds and ends in the State treasury, left over from territorial days. He was thus able to scrape together $550,000 which he got authorized with an additional appropriation of $250,000 in two equal payments. This did the job.

Another significant achievement of ELMER THOMAS was his part in launching a permanent road program for Oklahoma. Again displaying thrift and wisdom in things financial, ELMER THOMAS opposed and helped defeat the $50,000,000 road bond proposal. With this out of the way, the State could proceed to develop a great highway network on a pay-as-you-go basis. This set a pattern for the rest of the country, and today that is our established national policy.

From the State senate ELMER THOMAS went to the National House of Representatives for two terms, 1923–1927. Then he found the chance he had been awaiting all these years, and he struck out for the United States Senate. In 1926 he won the nomination of his party without difficulty and then he easily defeated the Republican incumbent who had been swept in by the Harding landslide.

At 50 years of age, he thus achieved the goal that had been constantly before him since early childhood. But, never pausing to rest on his laurels, ELMER THOMAS began diligently working toward a new goal—to become a skilled and effective United States Senator.

This persistent course led to the chairmanship of the Committee on Agriculture, and chairman of several subunits of the Committee on Appropriations. As head of the Defense Department appropriations subcommittee ELMER THOMAS was a commanding figure in building the great military machine which won one World War and is preparing us against the dangers of another.

His broad grasp, covering both domestic and international fields, led him to conceive numerous far-reaching solutions. For instance, he has promoted the plan to relieve American farm surpluses by distribution to our needy foreign allies.

But underlying his whole program has been his constant interest in the American farmer. He strove to keep up farm prices to the point that the farmer would realize the cost of production and a reasonable profit. He understood that farm prices are the lifeblood of our economy, and that without fair returns to the farmer the rest of the Nation cannot prosper. As he often said, $1 paid to the farmer will mushroom into $7 for the national income.

As a friend of the farmer, Senator THOMAS pioneered in getting cheap electricity to the cross roads. In 1938, as a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, he helped develop and pass the law creating the Rural Electrification Administration, and as a member of the Committee on Appropriations he supported extensive funds to develop this program.

While assuming leadership on the broader national problems, Senator THOMAS also had a genius for keeping the ball rolling on local projects for his own State. Public buildings, airports, all kinds of improvement programs; he personally saw to their approval with aid from Uncle Sam.

Again and again, his realization of the importance of the development of natural resources has been demonstrated. As chairman of the subcommittee which handled the funds for Army engineers, he was able to help both his State and his Nation in this vital field.

The State of Oklahoma has Senator THOMAS to thank for finding a way to finance the great Grand River Dam and its hydroelectric power plant. By a stroke of the legislative pen, Senator THOMAS made it possible for the State Grand River Dam Authority in Oklahoma to obtain the necessary funds from the Federal Government.

This was done again by one of those "simple" amendments for which Senator THOMAS became noted. By the insertion of a "few words" in the "appropriate" place, Senator THOMAS had made available to the GRDA and two other like projects, $70,000,000 in grants and $22,000,000 in loans.

His ingenuity and his influence were brought into play in obtaining the first big irrigation project for Oklahoma, the W. C. Austin. In the face of rising construction costs at the beginning of World War II, he was able to get helping hands for the State from WPA labor. Then, in a final effort to hold down the farmers' repayment debt to the original $2,000,000, he made the project eligible for Federal experimentation. This was done in another one of those little amendments which Senator THOMAS convinced his colleagues was appropriate language.

Senator THOMAS also secured funds for the building of the Fort Supply, Great Salt Plains, Hulah, Wister, Canton, Heyburn, Fort Gibson, Tenkiller, and Denison flood-control, hydroelectric, and irrigation projects, most all of which lie in Oklahoma.

Having served as chairman of the former Senate Indian Committee, Senator THOMAS was able to do much toward meeting some of our obligations to these first Americans. Only recently he put over legislation turning some $3,000,000 in oil royalties from the south half of the Red River to the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indians. He added an amendment to the bill authorizing sale of the Chickasaw-Choctaw coal lands in Oklahoma which recognized a treaty obligation, and as usual, he followed through to secure the nearly $10,000,000 to pay the purchase price.

So it will be seen that if we got into difficulty in Oklahoma, whether it related to price supports for agriculture, taking care of the welfare of the Indians, or getting flood-control projects, or military installations, we just left it to ELMER. He knew the answers and went after them. Oklahoma and the Nation benefited.

It is with great pride and satisfaction that we review the results of a long and fruitful career. All these accomplishments, among many tangible evidences of his good work, will stand as a permanent monument to ELMER THOMAS. And this monument also will loom as a beacon to us, challenging us and guiding us to carry on the torch of democracy for a better and safer America.

Our good wishes, our warmest, friendliest feelings, go with ELMER THOMAS as he takes leave of this Senate and his long-time associates. I am happy to report that he will be near us in Washington, back to his first love, the private practice of law. While we continue here, still making the law, we hope that we shall see him often and that he may continue to give us the benefit of his wisdom and experience in these critical times.

TRIBUTE TO THE VICE PRESIDENT AND TO RETIRING SENATORS

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, this is the last day of this particular Congress. I wish to beg the indulgence of the Chair and also of the Senate while I very briefly express my opinion of you, sir, and of some of the Members who are about to leave us, and also of some of the Members who, through the kindness of a superior power, will still be with us.

Mr. President, I am most happy that I have been given the opportunity to serve in this body while you have been the President of the Senate. I believe that I understand American history; therefore, please believe me when I say that in my opinion you represent what is best in America and what best represents America. I am glad to have served with you.

I am glad to have served with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

I am glad to have served with the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

I am glad to have served in the past in the House of Representatives, with its Members. Notwithstanding any differences of political opinion, I am proud that all of us are Americans and are able to represent differences of opinion.

I am happy to have served with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL].

For 12 years I have known the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GURNEY]. We served on the Appropriations Committee. Possibly at times we have disagreed, but never was there any idea that his patriotism and loyalty were not as great as those of any other member of the committee. I am most happy for that; that is what makes service in this body worth while.

I realize with regret that we are about to lose some of the present Members of the Senate, including the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], simply because of the workings of American politics. Six years ago he defeated another candidate, as he did 12 years ago. Now he is about to leave us. We shall miss him very greatly, and all of us love him.

Of course, I also dislike the fact that my friend, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], will not return with us at the coming session. However, after all, the American people of the State of Maryland have a right to decide who shall represent them; that is not my right.

Of course, I also dislike the fact that my friend the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] will not return. However, after all, the American people of Oklahoma have a right to decide that.

Also I dislike the fact that my friend the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] will not return.

Despite the fact that my friend the Senator from Misscuri [Mr. DONNELL] will be succeeded by a man of my political faith, I still dislike to see Senator DONNELL leave the Senate.

Mr. President, I am simply trying to make clear that these changes are in accordance with the American way of doing things. Let us continue to live by the American system.

I thank the Chair.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 4266) to amend and extend title II of the First War Powers Act, 1941, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

AMENDMENT OF FIRST WAR POWERS ACT, 1941

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4266) to amend and extend title II of the First War Powers Act, 1941, which was, on page 1, line 8, strike out the period and insert a semicolon and the following: "and such section 201 is further amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof a colon and the following: 'Provided further, That all contracts entered into, amended, or modified pursuant to authority contained in this section shall include a clause to the effect that the Comptroller General of the United States or any of his duly authorized representatives shall have access to and the right to examine any pertinent books, documents, papers, and records of the contractor or any of his subcontractors engaged in the performance of and involving transactions related to such contracts or subcontracts.' "

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House. This is the war powers bill, reviving and extending the powers under title II of the First War Powers Act of 1941. The House has added this amendment to the bill as it was passed by the Senate a few days ago. I believe the amendment actually strengthens and further safeguards the powers granted in the bill as it was passed by the Senate. I approve of the amendment, and urge its adoption.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Arkansas that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am glad to yield.

Mr. TAFT. As I understand, no action whatever is now proposed to amend or revive title I of the War Powers Act.

Mr. McCLELLAN. That is not involved in this measure. However, I may say to the Senator that there is such a proposal, and it is being considered—namely, to grant certain powers, at least.

Mr. TAFT. I would agree that certain powers, perhaps necessary for coordination of the work under Mr. Wilson, might well be granted. However, so far as this particular measure is concerned, that has been dropped, has it?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes; it is not involved in this proposed legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

The motion was agreed to.

DEDUCTIONS FROM SEAMEN'S WAGES FOR EMPLOYEE WELFARE FUNDS

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, under a previous general agreement with Members on both sides of the aisle, I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 8349, Calendar No. 2627.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read by title.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H. R. 8349) to authorize deductions from the wages of seamen for payment into employee welfare funds.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I understand that if this measure is taken up, the Senator from Washington contemplates moving that the Senate reconsider the bill and disagree to the amendments heretofore agreed to by the Senate, and that the bill then be passed.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Yes.

Mr. AIKEN. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I understand the distinguished Senator from Washington has moved that the bill be considered. Am I correct in that?

Mr. MAGNUSON. That is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. I want the RECORD to show that to be the case because on a previous occasion, at a late hour, the distinguished Senator asked unanimous consent that the bill be considered. At that time there was some thought of a calendar call. I then suggested that following the disposition of certain conference reports, it would be appropriate for him to move the consideration of this bill.

Mr. MAGNUSON. That is my understanding.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Washington to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8349) to authorize deductions from the wages of seamen for payment into employee welfare funds, which had been reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, with an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments which have been heretofore proposed were agreed to previously.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments heretofore adopted by the Senate be reconsidered and rejected, and that the House bill be passed without amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. Without objection, the House bill, without amendment, is ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed. Without objection, the Senate bill is indefinitely postponed.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] left the request that an objection be made in his name if this bill were called up.

Mr. TAFT. The Senator from Louisiana is here.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill was taken up on motion, not by unanimous consent.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief explanation of the bill. The Pacific-coast maritime groups, including the seamen, have made contracts and agreements in which they allow, with the consent of the seamen, a deduction from their wages. That is to say, by written consent of the seaman, a certain portion of his wages, along with the contributions of the employer, is used to set up a welfare fund, which, particularly in California, is mandatory under the law. Under the Federal law it is not clear whether seamen working offshore and in the Federal maritime could be subjected to these deductions. The only purpose of the bill is to allow the Pacific-coast maritime groups to do what is mandatory under the State law, and what they have agreed to, under all their agreements which have been signed, sealed, and delivered, and to bring the Federal law into line.

The bill, which has been approved by all segments of the maritime industry, was passed unanimously by the House. Heretofore it passed the Senate, with amendments. In view of the lateness of the hour and of the milder approach made by the House, we have arranged to accept the House bill without amendment. So far as I know, the only objection to the bill arose as a result of a proposed amendment offered by myself, which has now been withdrawn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has passed.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. I arrived late. As I understand, what the Senator proposed was the passage of the House version of the bill.

Mr. MAGNUSON. That is correct.

Mr. ELLENDER. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The House bill has already been passed.

SENATOR PEPPER'S REPORT ON WORLD CONDITIONS

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, on Friday, December 22, my distinguished colleague [Mr. PEPPER] made what I consider a most able and eloquent farewell address to the Senate. I regret exceedingly that I could not remain here for the whole of that address, by reason of the fact that I had reservations on a train for Florida which left before he had finished speaking. I wanted at this time to voice my appreciation, and the appreciation of the people of the State of Florida, for the cordial sentiments which were so ably expressed by several of my colleagues at the termination of the speech by my distinguished colleague. I believe that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. MCFARLAND], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL]—who, at the moment, occupied the chair—all expressed sentiments of appreciation of the service of my distinguished senior colleague, and of appreciation of the able speech which he had just made, as well as of affection for him personally.

Mr. President, may I say that I think my colleague has rendered a peculiarly distinguished and colorful service to our Nation and to our State during the 14 years of his representation of the State of Florida here—14 years which have been years of tremendous crisis for our Nation, and of unparalleled importance in the history of the world. I shall not attempt in these brief remarks to make any résumé of the distinguished career of my colleague, but I wanted to speak my own appreciation for all the cordial expressions, and all the courteous and kindly things he has done for me in the period of something more than 4 years that I have been privileged to serve with him as his junior colleague.

We have not always agreed on all matters, but I want to say there has never been manifested toward me by Senator PEPPER anything but complete cordiality and unfailing courtesy, which speaks best for a Senator who really understands what a high honor and responsibility it is to be a Senator in the truest meaning of the word. I feel that he has rendered outstanding service to our State and to our Nation, particularly in the humanitarian field, in which he has served so ably as a member of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare; likewise, in the field of foreign relations, where he has served as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee.

It so happens that his farewell speech, which I think will be referred to for many years in the Senate and in the country for some of the observations which he made during a period of nearly 3 months of travel, going practically around the world, shows his breadth of grasp of international affairs and his feeling that our Nation is now in one of its most crucial periods, a period in which strong action and sturdy, united action is required on the part of all our people.

Mr. President, it goes without saying that I speak what is known to almost every man, woman, and child in our Nation, when I say that my distinguished senior colleague is without a peer in debate, whether as a Senator of the United States or as a pleader before the highest courts of the land. His voice will be greatly missed in the Senate, where he has always been colorful, most effective, highly eloquent, and yet always most courteous in every expression, in every debate. My own admiration for him has been heightened by the complete poise which he has shown in maintaining constant courtesy, even under the most difficult situations and in the most heated debate, for those who have, and who have stated, different convictions from those which he held. Aside from his outstanding resourcefulness and oratorical quality as a great and eloquent debater, my distinguished colleague has been one of the hardest working men in the Senate of the United States, certainly during the 4 years that I have had the privilege of seeing him so intimately at work. Prior thereto, I had almost an equal opportunity, during the 4 years when I was serving our people in another capacity in Florida, but having of necessity to cooperate closely with those who represented our State in the Halls of Congress.

Senator PEPPER has worked indefatigably for the issues in which he believes, and insofar as his State is concerned, I do not see how any Senator could have been more zealous, more effective, more unyielding in his position that the people and the interests and the communities of his State should have from the Federal Government the consideration and attention to which he felt that they were entitled.

He has been fearless in the taking of positions, sometimes unpopular positions, but positions which his convictions approved.

I close by stating that it has been a privilege and a pleasure to serve with my distinguished senior colleague, and I am sure I speak for every Member of the Senate who has served with him when I state that he has been regarded by all his colleagues as being one of the most colorful, one of the most resourceful, one of the most devastating debaters as well as one of the most able proponents of any issue in which he believed, among all those who have ever stood upon the floor of the United States Senate.

TRIBUTE TO RETIRING SENATORS

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, this, the last day of the Eighty-first Congress—this—

> Parting day
> Dies like the dolphin, whom each pang imbues
> With a new color as it gasps away,
> The last still loveliest, till—'tis gone, and all is gray.

But grayer far than the dead dolphin, and sadder far than the dreary light of waning moon is the rapidly approaching hour of separation from our retiring colleagues whom we shall never fail to cherish and never cease to love.

Unfortunately, the whirligig of politics, like that of time, brings in not only its revenges but also its sorrows and its sighs.

According to Fuller's seventeenth century volume entitled "The Worthies of England," Dr. William Butler was styled the Aesculapius of his age. On a certain occasion he said:

> Doubtless God could have made a better berry than the strawberry, but doubtless God never did.

Since the Almighty's arm is never shortened and His omnipotence is never impaired, He presumably could have made better United States Senators than those to whom we are about to say "goodbye". But, in my opinion, the great Creator has never made six more patriotic, diligent legislators than Senators LUCAS, of Illinois; MYERS, of Pennsylvania; PEPPER, of Florida; THOMAS of Oklahoma; THOMAS of Utah; and TYDINGS, of Maryland. These have all won for themselves conspicuous, permanent places in the great American hall of fame.

History's pages are burdened with examples of the sinful inflicting upon the sinless every species of punishment from death upon the cross to defeat at the polls. For discovering a new world that was destined to overshadow the old, Columbus was sent to prison in anguish and chains. The Athenians banished the illustrious Aristides because they had grown envious and weary of hearing him called the Just. Abel, because of his superior righteousness, was murdered by his wicked brother Cain. But for these and a legion of other similar well-known examples of human perversity and vile ingratitude it would be difficult for those who know the Senators mentioned to believe that their constituencies recently failed to reelect them to office. But let no hearts be troubled. A defeat at the ballot box is simply an obstruction on the highway of political life. And aspiring, wise, and worthy men transmute obstructions into stepping stones upon which to mount to the topmost heights of fortune and fame.

With reservations concerning matters of political philosophy about which the distinguished Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GURNEY] and the able Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL], on the one hand, and I, on the other, have never agreed, let me wholeheartedly concur in all that was said of these eminent men an hour ago by "Mr. Republican"—the senior Senator from Ohio.

In existing circumstances, it is manifestly impossible to pay proper tributes to all upon whose present senatorial terms the curtain is about to fall forever. Therefore, let me speak briefly of the peerless orator, the matchless debater, the unsurpassable statesman—the beloved senior Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER]. During my 28 years' membership in the Senate and the House and my much longer period of studying American biography and history I never discovered anyone whom I considered superior in logic, eloquence, patriotism, and statesmanship to Senator CLAUDE PEPPER—the fortunate possessor of a profound mind, a silver tongue and a heart of gold. In the Senate he has been a tower of strength and a source of lofty inspiration to every lover of the right. He has been a gallant champion of every worthy cause. There are many reasons why he is particularly near and dear to me. With the exception of the distinguished Vice President [Mr. BARKLEY], Senator PEPPER has made more campaign speeches in West Virginia for Democratic candidates for office than any other living nonresident of the Mountain State has ever made. He is the only one of the departing Senators who is a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia over which, as chairman, it is my present privilege, honor, and pleasure to preside. Through all the years that have passed since he and I first became acquainted he has been one of my most deeply appreciated, never-failing, never-faltering, faithful friends.

The able junior Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] a few moments ago specified a number of Senator PEPPER's rare and praiseworthy qualifications. But there are still others which he possesses in the highest degree. Some of these are poetically indicated by Oliver Wendell Holmes in the slightly modified, well-known lines:

To hear CLAUDE PEPPER laughing—you'd think he's all fun;
But the angels laugh, too, at the good he has done;
The children laugh loud as they troop to his call,
And the poor man that knows him laughs loudest of all!

Any place this man leaves will be poorer by reason of his going—no matter who his successor may be. The place to which he goes will become richer as soon as he arrives. My esteem and affection for this—

Hero who dost wield
The golden sword and burnished shield—
Shield of a comprehensive mind,
And sword to slay the foes of human kind—

is epitomized in the sonnet:

When, in disgrace with fortune and men's eyes,
I all alone beweep my outcast state,
And trouble deaf heaven with my bootless cries,
And look upon myself, and curse my fate,
Wishing me like to one more rich in hope,
Featured like him, like him with friends possess'd,
Desiring this man's art and that man's scope,
With what I most enjoy contented least;
Yet in these thoughts myself almost despising,
Haply I think on thee, and then my state,
Like to the lark at break of day arising
From sullen earth, sings hymns at heaven's gate;
For thy sweet love remember'd such wealth brings
That then I scorn to change my state with kings.

Mr. President, upon a monument in St. Michael's cemetery in Charleston, S. C., is the following remarkable epitaph:

JAMES LOUIS PETIGRU, JURIST, ORATOR, STATESMAN, PATRIOT

Unawed by opinion, unseduced by flattery, undismayed by disaster, he confronted life with antique courage and death with Christian hope. In the great Civil War he withstood his people for his country; but his people did homage to the man who held his conscience higher than their praise; and his country heaped her honors upon the grave of the patriot, to whom, living, his own righteous self-respect sufficed alike for motive and reward.

It is my confident prediction that a hundred years from now the people of Florida and the Nation will gratefully erect a magnificent monument to commemorate forever the memory of CLAUDE PEPPER and on that monument will appear the identical substance of every stirring word and letter of the epitaph which proclaims the deeply lamented James Louis Petigru's deathless fame.

Senator PEPPER, regardless of the choice you make, the path you take or the task to which you turn, it will be our constant, fervent hope that you and all who are dear to you will be blessed with perfect health, unlimited prosperity and happiness, and the peace of God which passeth all understanding, to the end of your days. [Applause.]

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR LUCAS

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I wish to join with my colleagues in paying tribute to my senior colleague from Illinois. Long before he came to Washington in 1934 he had made a distinguished record in our State. He was State's attorney of his county at an early age. He was the commander of the Illinois American Legion. He served four terms as national judge advocate of the American Legion.

In 1932 he ran for State office for the first time. He was a candidate for the Democratic nomination for the United States Senate. Although he did not win the nomination then, he won the admiration of virtually all Democrats in the State. In the next year when the Governor of Illinois, Henry Horner, was reorganizing the system of taxation of our State, he appointed my senior colleague chairman of the State tax commission. In this position, during the next year and a half, he made a notable record, especially in connection with the reform of the general property tax.

In 1934 the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, the Honorable Henry T. Rainey died, and my senior colleague was nominated and was elected as his successor from the historic Twentieth District of Illinois. He served for 4 years in the United States House of Representatives, making a notable and distinguished record. While he customarily voted on the Democratic side of issues, he also did his own thinking, and on several issues, particularly in connection with the changes proposed in the Supreme Court, he opposed the programs of the party which he did not believe in his conscience to be correct.

In 1938, after a very hard primary fight, he was nominated as a Democratic candidate for the United States Senate. He was elected to this body in November of that year.

His record in the 12 years since then is known not only to all of us in the Senate, but to the country as well. He has served with distinction on a number of important committees of this body including those on Agriculture and Armed Services. On those committees he also worked for the best interests of the Nation regardless of party claims. His contributions to the preparedness of his country to resist totalitarian aggression during the period prior to and after Pearl Harbor have been excelled by no Member of this body. His work to protect the security of America's farm families has been notable.

In recent years he has served on the Senate Committee on Finance, where his work has also been distinguished and progressive. And we are all familiar with the patient, yet persistent and effective way in which he has carried the heavy burdens of the majority leadership in these past 2 years.

No long eulogy is needed from me about the merits of SCOTT LUCAS. We all know him as an able Senator and majority leader, fair in spirit, courteous to his opponents, eager to get results, but considerate of all. In the past Illinois has sent many eminent men to this body. I am sure that the verdict of history will be that SCOTT LUCAS is in the very front rank. I can only add a personal word, that in the 2 years I have been here he has been a most considerate and generous colleague. We shall miss him in the Senate, but we know that his great services for the country will continue. [Applause.]

THE "LAME DUCK" CONGRESS—A DANGEROUS PRECEDENT

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, in order to save the time of the Senate, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks a brief statement which I have prepared.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE "LAME DUCK" CONGRESS—A DANGEROUS PRECEDENT

Mr. President, I do not want this "lame duck" session of Congress to come to an end without raising my voice against what I consider an evasion on the part of the administration leaders of the spirit of the law which was intended to put an end to "lame duck" legislation.

After much thought and study, Congress in 1933 passed the Norris amendment, the twentieth amendment to the Constitution, which was to eliminate decisions being made by Members who had been repudiated at the polls.

Ignoring the spirit and intent of the twentieth amendment, the administration leaders insisted upon this "lame duck" session in which to ram through certain administration measures. The administration obviously knew that it needed the votes of the repudiated "lame ducks" to do the job.

The result is that poorly prepared and little-considered legislation has been railroaded through this session—without permitting proper debate and consideration—three tremendously important measures being passed by this body without even a record vote: A $20,000,000,000 appropriation, the excess-profits tax bill, and the bill to extend war powers to the President. All of these bills contain provisions little understood by the individual Members of Congress through lack of time for proper study and debate.

No good purpose could possibly be served by rushing this policy-making legislation through in December 1950 instead of January 1951, except to transfer and to confer powers to the executive branches not authorized and not intended by the Constitution of the United States.

The junior Senator from Nevada calls the attention of the Senate to this violation of the spirit of the constitutional amendment intended to eliminate exactly what we have witnessed here during the past few unhappy weeks. Now is the poorest possible time for blithe evasion.

Mr. President, it is a dangerous precedent.

PERSONAL STATEMENT BY SENATOR GURNEY

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President, this is my last day in the Senate. I should like to say a very few words.

First, let me say that I am deeply grateful to the people of my great State of South Dakota for having given me the opportunity to serve as a Member of the United States Senate. After my service in the Senate, I have a profound conviction, greater than that which I had when I came here, that our kind of government is the best in the world; and I have a firm conviction that it will continue that way.

I regard it as a high privilege given to me by the people of South Dakota to serve here with others who have made up the membership of the Senate, including the two ladies who have been Members while I have been here during the past 12 years. I am taking away with me the richest possession any man ever had, the good wishes of Senators. I thank you all, and I wish you all personally the best of success and happiness. [Applause.]

GLEN H. TAYLOR, OF IDAHO

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I join my colleagues in all that has been said about Senators who are retiring. However, I cannot let the opportunity pass without saying a few words about my departing colleague, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. TAYLOR].

Only a Senator who comes from a State small in population can begin to understand the difficulties under which the Senator from Idaho has labored. One of his predecessors was the late Senator Borah. When one travels through the great Western State of Idaho, he finds that no matter who its Senators may be, the people of that State instinctively compare them to the late William E. Borah. That is a handicap under which every Senator coming from the State of Idaho suffers.

To my mind our colleague the Senator from Idaho represents something which no other Member of this body really represents. Nearly all his life he has had to make his living by working with his hands. Shortly before he made his successful race for the Senate he went to the west coast and took a job as a day laborer in a war industry. He worked hard from early in the morning until late at night. I believe that in this great body there are too few who have had the experience of getting up early in the morning and working until late at night, either upon the farm or as a day laborer.

I have watched the progress of my colleague in the Senate. I do not know of a single instance in which GLEN H. TAYLOR ever voted against the interests of the small man, the workingman, the small farmer, the tenant farmer, or the sharecropper. As he leaves here, he can hold his head high and throw out his chest, knowing that he has kept the faith.

PERSONAL STATEMENT BY SENATOR TAYLOR

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from North Dakota for his tribute. It is typical of his independence and fearlessness to speak out on any issue or subject which he feels he should discuss. I believe that the most important thing in our Nation today is that people should remember the principle on which our country was founded. Every man has a right to speak his mind. I am afraid there is beginning to be altogether too much "conformitism" in our country. I am reminded of an incident which happened many years ago when I was with a car show. It was called a car show because we had railroad cars and lived on the train. We had a tent in which to perform our plays.

An Italian trombone player joined the company. He had recently come from Italy. He could not speak English very well, but everyone accepted him. Possibly once in a while they made jokes at his expense. We got along fairly well until in one town the male members of the company were persuaded to join the Moose. Everyone joined the Moose except Vanny, the Italian. He was saving his money and sending it back to Italy, and he did not feel that he could afford the luxury of becoming a Moose.

After the other boys all became Moose and Vanny did not join, the other boys chose to kid Vanny a little. Every time he would approach a group who were talking, they would "clam up," as the popular saying goes, and gradually disperse, leaving Vanny standing alone. They were only kidding, but Vanny did not understand that. It was only a matter of a few weeks when one day Vanny was found on the station platform in his bare feet, jumping up and down. He literally broke the balls of his feet open. He was screaming "I want to be a Moosaboy." He had blown his top completely.

I am afraid there is too much in this country of wanting to "be a Moosaboy," wanting to go along with the popular idea of the moment. I have not done that. I have known, when I did certain things, that I was not doing what was politically expedient, so I have no excuses to offer for my defeat. At one time I stated on the floor of the Senate that I was going to vote my convictions, as though I never expected to come back. All I can say is that I did vote my convictions, and I did not come back.

PERSONAL STATEMENT BY SENATOR THOMAS OF UTAH

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, it would indeed be ungracious on my part to sit longer and not at least say "thanks" to my colleagues for the wonderful words that have been spoken in behalf of those of us who, I am sure, today are thinking of the old expression "Hail and farewell."

I came to the United States Senate after having lived under various types of government. I knew what the American Government meant. I know now what it means not only to the people of the United States, but to the people of the whole world. It seems to me that what has taken place here in the Senate this afternoon exemplifies one of the fine things about our Government.

The people's interests are vital, but at the same time friendships mean a great deal. What good is service to mankind if, for example, those who serve together cannot in some way or another evaluate the service and say whether it is wise or unwise?

When we consider the political life of the world we find that the associations in this body are extremely unique. America has been in existence now for a long time. Under the Constitution of the United States, which now is the mother of all constitutions, we are no longer a young country. Where in the world do we find parties still to be the amateur affairs they are in the United States? In a country where the parties are professional in their nature the loss of an election has a different meaning than it has in this country. Here, the loss of an election does not affect the fundamentals upon which our country is based. Therefore, we should really and truly evaluate America's representative Government as it exists, and realize above all things that, no matter what theory one may have as a member of the Republican Party or as a member of the Democratic Party, no matter what theory one may have in regard to such a thing as a social compact, whether it be historical or not, the Declaration of Independence probably will be forever America's great symbol of liberty.

It is by that knowledge we live, and under it we have the type of government which is the hardest for men to live under, because we think of and work constantly for the advancement of the individual, yet strive for unity in a land where freedom of speech and freedom of the press are guaranteed.

It is hard to live under our type of Government. When people, by common consent, do not live up to its ideals, things happen which are disastrous, and as was foretold by the philosophers of old, another kind of government comes into being. I do not think the other type of government is coming to America. I believe our land is stronger than it ever was. I believe the people of the world realize what America means as they never realized it before.

Mr. President, I appreciate beyond words my associations here. It is a very great honor for a man to be called by his people to serve them here; it is a unique honor, which has no counterpart elsewhere in the world today. The friendships which come from association here are lasting.

I shall always remember the things which have been said about those of us who are leaving. No matter in what capacity I may serve in the future or in what capacities my colleagues who leave here today may serve, or if we serve in no capacity, I trust we may all remain worthy of the things which have been said about us here today. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Snader, its assisting reading clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the following concurrent resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. Con. Res. 297. Concurrent resolution providing that the two Houses of Congress shall adjourn on Tuesday, January 2, 1951, and that when they adjourn on said day they stand adjourned sine die; and

H. Con. Res. 298. Concurrent resolution providing that notwithstanding the sine die adjournment of the two Houses, the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate be authorized to sign enrolled bills and joint resolutions duly passed by the two Houses and found truly enrolled.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (S. 3295) to amend the Railway Labor Act and to authorize agreements providing for union membership and agreements for reductions from the wages of carriers' employees for certain purposes and under certain conditions, and it was signed by the Vice President.

PERSONAL STATEMENT BY THE VICE PRESIDENT

The VICE PRESIDENT. Prior to laying before the Senate the concurrent resolution coming from the House the Chair would like to take advantage of the opportunity to join the Senators who have spoken in regard to the circumstances of the departure today of some of our colleagues, particularly because two of the Senators who are leaving this body came into it at the same time I entered it 24 years ago.

Woodrow Wilson once remarked, speaking of men in public life, "Some men grow and others swell." In my long service in the House and in the Senate, I have seen few men swell. I would not say that I have not observed one now and then. But most of them have grown, because most thoughtful men who take their duties here seriously, coming in contact with the intellectual and personal and political factors which enter into our Government, cannot fail to grow in their knowledge of the Government and in their determination to serve the country which has honored them by membership here.

The rewards of service in this Chamber are not financial. I dare say there is not a Member now here, whether he remains or leaves, who could not, if working as hard and as diligently in private profession or business, make infinitely more money than he draws as his salary for service in the Senate. The real compensation of one who is a Member here grows out of the pride and the belief that he is serving his country. It may be an illusion in a sense, but even if it is an illusion, it is a delightful one, because it helps to bolster up a man's faith in himself and his faith in his country.

When I entered the Senate, on the 4th of March 1927, there came over from the House five Members, the others being the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], and the Senator from Missouri, Mr. Hawes. Senator Hawes' people were born in Kentucky, as so many Missourians were. The county seat of Hancock County, Ky., is named Hawesville after the family of Harry Hawes. I came along with that class. Senator Wagner came in at the same time, but he came from the bench in New York.

Twenty-four years is a long time out of a man's life to serve in any body. The changes that have taken place in politics leave only one member of that class now as a Member of the Senate, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN]. I am neither in the Senate nor of it, but I am merely hanging around. I am taking advantage, with the consent of the Senate, of this opportunity to say a word or two, because two Members of this class, leaving only one remaining, are taking their departure due to the vicissitudes of politics.

This is a great body. It is the only remaining body in the world where men may speak freely. Some of us sometimes think Members speak too freely and too long, but really the Senate is the one forum of free debate in the world today where men may at their will express their views, their convictions, and try to impress them upon their colleagues and upon the country.

So, as the President of the Senate, I join in the tributes which have been paid to our colleagues who are leaving us. I do so without regard to politics. Here we make friendships which endure. They are not delineated by the middle aisle. Some of my warmest and most cherished friends since I have been a Member of this body have been Republicans, and I have had the pleasure of feeling that those friendships have been mutual.

The Senate has already adopted a resolution nullifying the resolution which brought us into this Chamber back in August. Since we are to depart from this Chamber today, not to return to it for a long time, if ever, I am prompted to remind Senators of the historic importance of this great Chamber, in which we in the Congress have worked twice, and from which we shall depart this afternoon.

Not only has this Chamber been great as a forum for debate and eloquence and statesmanship in the formative periods of our country, but it is rich in personal histories and anecdote and tradition. When Andrew Jackson and Thomas H. Benton were young men in Nashville, Tenn., they fought, not a regular duel, but a pistol battle on the streets. One of them fell back over a bannister into a basement, and that fall may thus have saved his life. Thereafter Thomas H. Benton went to Missouri. Later he became a Member of the Senate of the United States, and here he met Andrew Jackson, who then also was a Senator. Andrew Jackson subsequently resigned from the Senate and returned to Tennessee, where later he took the command of troops. Later on, when Andrew Jackson was President, Thomas H. Benton was his great spokesman in the Senate; and in this Chamber, Thomas H. Benton moved to expunge from the Journal of the Senate a scurrilous resolution in regard to Jackson, which, some time before that had been adopted by the Senate.

Henry Clay and John Randolph, of Roanoke, fought a duel over a debate in the House of Representatives which one of them regarded as insulting. They went across the Potomac River to what is now Rosslyn, Va., and fought a bloodless duel. For years thereafter they did not speak to one another. One day Henry Clay was going down a footpath which led from the Capitol to what is now Peace Monument, and Randolph was coming up the same path, which was too narrow for two men to pass on it. They met, glared at each other. Randolph sneered, "I never get out of the way of a damn scoundrel." Clay replied, "I always do," and stepped out of the way, and let Randolph pass. Years later, when it was announced that Clay would address the Senate from his desk in this Chamber, John Randolph, who by then had become an invalid, asked that he be carried on a stretcher into this Chamber, in order that he might hear Clay's last speech.

I have mentioned those two episodes, involving Andrew Jackson and Thomas H. Benton and Henry Clay and John Randolph of "Roanoke," in order to illustrate what has already been said more beautifully: That no matter how bitter we may become, no matter how aroused in behalf of some particular cause we may become, no matter how acrimonious may be the debate in this Chamber or in the other Chamber, there is always that residue of gentlemanliness and courtesy and recognition of the rights of others which usually brings the participants back together in friendly embrace in behalf of their country and of our own. Those things happened in this Chamber, which some of us are about to leave.

The only Vice President of the United States who ever resigned, John C. Calhoun, who was Vice President under Andrew Jackson, resigned from the desk at which I am now sitting. I hope no one will take any hope from that episode. [Laughter.]

So the Senate of the United States 92 years ago this month moved out of this Chamber into the Chamber which it has occupied at the north end of the Capitol Building for that length of time, and to which it will return tomorrow.

Heretofore I have said that I regard with some pride the fact that when the Senate moved out of this Chamber, 92 years ago, a Kentuckian, John C. Breckinridge, was Vice President of the United States, and when it moves out again today a much lesser Kentuckian, but no lesser in appreciation than was John C. Breckinridge, will move with it.

I have mentioned these things, and could mention many others associated with this Chamber, because I cherish the desire that we preserve these historic places where American history has been made, where the battles for liberty have been fought, and where we delight in beautiful thoughts of the memories of those who have served here and the traditions they have established through their consecrated devotion to public duty. I think those who serve here today, although perhaps not always so colorful as were Clay, Webster, and Calhoun, are just as able, just as sincere, and just as devoted to the welfare of their country as those great statesmen were.

The problems which faced the Federal Government in their day were infinitely fewer in number and in importance, in a sense, than are those which face us today. It was easy for them, during the vacation periods of the Congress, to prepare great speeches, which have gone down in our history and are now in the books of oratory. No one knows whether if those men had had facing them the multiplicity of problems and questions which face Senators today and to which they must devote detailed and meticulous attention, they could ever have made such speeches as those which adorn the oratorical volumes of that era of our history. That matter is speculative, and there never will be an answer to that question.

I have wished to say these few words not only in tribute to our departing colleagues, with whom I have served, and whom I have honored, and whose views I have respected, even though I have not always agreed with them—it would be a monotonous world if everyone agreed about everything—but also to refer briefly to some of the events which have occurred in this Chamber in years long since passed and to some of the glorious traditions which have been established here. Those are some of the great events which have occurred in our development into a great Nation; and those traditions, if we adhere to them, will continue to make us a great Nation.

When I was a boy in college, we used to have a debating society where frequently we debated the question, "Resolved, that the signs of the times point to the downfall of the Republic." [Laughter.] That was a long time ago. I recall that some of the politicians who used to come to my home town to speak at the courthouse, in the course of political campaigns, would re-echo the feeling that the old ship of state was just about gone and was about to sink, largely because of domestic conditions which they described as unfavorable to the continuation of liberty and of our Nation as such.

Since that day we have grown in power, in wealth, in population, and in influence. We have grown also in the liberties we enjoy despite the fact that now and then we are told that we have lost all of them or are about to lose them. Today our danger does not come from within, although we are not a perfect democracy or a perfect republic, and we have in our system inequalities which from time to time we try to correct, and should correct. Today the great danger to us as a people and as a Nation comes from beyond the shores of the United States. It is a real danger. However, as we have overcome dangers in the past century and a half of our growth, development, and cooperation, in spite of wars, injustices, inequalities, and deficiencies here and there, and we have grown stronger with each battle to overcome them; so, in the providence of Almighty God and by His direction and with cooperation among ourselves, we will win the battle of the future and will preserve this great Nation and hand it down to our posterity as strong and as free as it was when it came to us from the hands of our forefathers.

[Applause, Senators rising.]

ECONOMIC STABILIZATION

Antimonopoly

H. R. 2734: This legislation amends what is commonly known as the Clayton Act passed in 1914 to supplement the Sherman Act of 1890. This amendment will bar a corporation from acquiring the physical assets of a company if, by so doing, it would lessen competition while, under the present law, a corporation is prohibited from acquiring the stock of such a corporation. (Public Law 899. Approved December 29, 1950.)

DISTRICT RENT CONTROL

Senate Joint Resolution 209: This legislation extends the present rent-control law, 592, in the District of Columbia until March 31, 1951. (Public Law 883. Approved December 21, 1950.)

NATIONAL RENT CONTROL

Senate Joint Resolution 207: This resolution extends the present national rent-control law, 574, until March 31, 1951. Such an extension will give the Congress an opportunity to make a thorough and complete study of the problem. (Public Law 880. Approved December 20, 1950.)

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

Aid to Yugoslavia

S. 4234: This act authorizes that not more than $50,000,000 of ECA funds, already appropriated, may be earmarked to provide aid to Yugoslavia. Most of this assistance will be in the form of food and is being provided to assist the Yugoslavs in their efforts to avoid economic disaster and thereby maintain their independence.

LABOR

Railway employees—Union membership

S. 3295: This legislation amends the Railway Labor Act, approved May 20, 1926, as amended, to permit a carrier or carriers, and any labor organization or organizations, authorized to represent employees in accordance with the requirements of that act, to make agreements (1) providing, subject to certain limitations, for the union shop (required membership in a labor organization); and (2) providing for the check-off (deduction from wages for payments of dues, etc.).

NATIONAL DEFENSE

Navigation laws—Waiver

H. R. 9681: In order to expedite the movement of troops and supplies to the Korean war front, it has been found necessary to enact legislation to direct the head of each department or agency responsible for the administration of the navigation and vessel-inspection laws to waive compliance of the laws, at the request of the Secretary of Defense or upon his own initiative, if he feels such action is necessary in the interest of national defense. (Public Law 891. Approved December 27, 1950.)

FEDERAL CIVIL DEFENSE ACT OF 1950

H. R. 9198: This act will establish in the executive branch of the Government a Federal Civil Defense Agency designed to provide a plan of civil defense for the protection of life and property in the United States from an enemy attack. The responsibility for civil defense is to be shared by the Federal Government and the States. The Federal Civil Defense Agency will provide necessary coordination, prepare national plans and programs, and assist and encourage the States in civil defense planning.

PUBLIC WORKS

H. R. 9893: This act authorizes the Secretaries of the Army, Navy and the Air Force to construct public works urgently needed for defense purposes, such as—

1. Facilities for Army field force stations.
2. Special weapons project.
3. Construction in Alaska.
4. Operational support facilities, training facilities, research and development and test facilities within the continental United States.
5. Aircraft control and warning system.

EXTENSION OF TITLE II OF THE FIRST WAR POWERS ACT, 1941

S. 4266: This legislation will reactivate title II of the above-mentioned act for the present national emergency, to be terminated June 30, 1952. Due to the state of national emergency, authority to let contracts through negotiation can be exercised and this act grants authority to modify contracts after they have been entered into. In order to cope with the present emergency and avoid delays in production, the defense agencies needed this additional authority to modify existing contracts in order to afford relief to small business firms who might be prevented from completing deliveries on such contracts because of increased costs.

SOCIAL WELFARE

Interstate gambling

S. 3357: The purpose of this act is to support the basic policy of the States, which outlaw slot machines and similar gambling devices, by prohibiting the interstate shipment of such machines except into States where their use is legal. The foreign import or export of the machines is prohibited and their manufacture, possession, and use is forbidden in localities, such as the District of Columbia, where the Federal Government is primarily responsible for enforcement of the criminal laws.

TAXATION

Taxes—Excess profits

H. R. 9827: This act provides for raising revenue by levying, collection, and payment of a corporate excess-profits tax which will produce approximately $3,300,000,000 for the calendar year 1950 (retroactive to July 1, 1950), and approximately $4,000,000,000 to $5,000,000,000 for the calendar year 1951. The surtax on corporate returns is increased by 2 percent on the regular corporate income tax, or to 47 percent, on incomes in excess of $25,000; with no increase in the corporate normal tax rate on incomes of $25,000 or less.

This act imposes an additional excess-profits tax rate of 30 percent which, together with the regular corporate normal tax and surtax, represents a total of 77 percent; however, the combined rate cannot exceed 62 percent of the corporation's income. The corporation is given a choice of the higher of two alternative bases in determining what proportion of its income is subject to excess-profits tax; the primary credit, which is an average earnings credit based on average income for the 4-year period 1946 to 1949; the alternative is a credit based on the rate of return on "invested capital."

Tax penalties

H. R. 9913: This act prevents penalties and additions to taxes in cases where individuals have failed to meet estimated tax requirements by reason of increases imposed by the Revenue Act of 1950. This act removes the necessity for a reestimate of a tax declaration by January 15, 1951.

Taxes—Armed services

House Joint Resolution 554: This resolution extends the time for filing tax returns by soldiers and others connected with the armed forces in Korea, or in other combat areas, until 180 days after their return to the United States; also, postpones the payment of their taxes during this period.

Servicemen—Transportation tax

H. R. 9840: This act exempts personnel of the United States Army, Air Force, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, and authorized cadets and midshipmen traveling in uniform from the tax on transportation while on furlough. (Public Law 878. Approved December 15, 1950.)

TRANSPORTATION

H. R. 5967: This act will amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, in order to clarify the status of freight forwarders. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the nominations which have been unanimously reported by the committee, and approved by the two Senators from each State particularly interested in the nominations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. LANGER. Reserving the right to object, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. Does the list include any one from North Dakota?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. No—and no one from South Carolina, either.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc, and without objection, the President will be notified.

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR PEPPER

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, like all other Members of this body who have the privilege of being here this afternoon and listening to the many beautiful tributes paid to departing Members, I have been deeply affected by the remarks which were made. A short time ago I placed in the RECORD a tribute to a departing member of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL]. I now wish to offer a tribute to the distinguished Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], and to read it into the RECORD.

A TRIBUTE TO SENATOR CLAUDE PEPPER

On this, the last day of the second session of the Eighty-first Congress, we, the members of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, pay tribute to our esteemed colleague, Senator CLAUDE PEPPER, of Florida. His retirement from the United States Senate, after 14 years of distinguished service, saddens us.

His distinguished talent as a lawyer, his profound grasp of constitutional issues, his courage and ability to meet the problems of the American people with honesty and intelligence, have earned him our respect and admiration. We have had the privilege and pleasure of being associated with him, and we know that his contributions toward the public good are now firmly imbedded in the legislative annals of the United States Government. We will long remember him with warm, deep, and affectionate regard as a gentleman, a patriot, and an outstanding legislator. It is in recognition of these qualities that we, his colleagues on the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, join in this tribute to our distinguished senior Senator from Florida.

Mr. President, I also ask to have printed in the RECORD, at this point, the remarks which I made at a dinner tendered to Senator PEPPER by his colleagues on August 15, 1950, at the Hotel Statler.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

My friends, we have come here tonight to pay our respects and express our sentiments of friendship and affection for our friend and colleague of many years, CLAUDE PEPPER.

We have been closely associated with our distinguished friend for many years. We admire him for his great ability, and we love him and are attached to him for his simple modesty and his kindly, friendly spirit.

He has been the soul of honor and fairness in all his dealings with his fellow Senators, and so we have come to have a very sincere admiration and affection for our friend whom we honor here tonight.

It seems like only a few brief years since Claude came to Washington. The years have flown with lightning-like speed for this is his fourteenth year to serve his State in the Senate.

During those 14 years we have greatly enjoyed and have benefited from our association with him. We have come to know him intimately and to recognize all his fine traits of character, his courage, and tenacity of purpose—his willingness to stand for the right on every issue, regardless of consequences.

The 14 years CLAUDE PEPPER has been with us here in the Senate have been the most exciting and thrilling in our lives. More important events, domestic and international, have been crowded into these 14 years than in any similar period in the history of our country.

When we look back over the record we are proud to see what the liberal Democratic membership in the Congress has accomplished, and we recognize the conspicuous part CLAUDE PEPPER has performed in that accomplishment. We have sponsored a long program of liberal, constructive legislation, to the great benefit of our country and our people.

In every program for the correction of the evils that had developed in our economic and political system, Claude had a leading part. He threw caution to the winds, and forgetting all danger to his political fortunes, he supported every valid progressive measure designed to better our country and rescue it from the dangers that threatened it.

Senator PEPPER's work for Florida is impressive. I can't begin to list the vast number of measures affecting agriculture, industry, labor, rivers and harbors, military and naval installations, airports, aid to education, school and hospital construction, health and social security, and like programs from which the State of Florida has immensely benefited.

In the realm of national and foreign affairs, legislation for the defense and general welfare of our country, he has been one of the really constructive leaders in the Senate. The measures that he sponsored and fought for in committees and on the floor comprise a long list of progressive legislation enacted in the Senate during the years he has been here—a record of which he can be justly proud. His brilliant arguments on the floor were responsible in a large degree for the enactment of many of these liberal measures.

But Senator PEPPER was too brave a man, too conscientious in his regard for genuine democratic principles, too honest and consistent in respecting human rights, to be permitted to represent a State where reactionary interests could employ great wealth and a controlled press to deceive the public in its election campaigns.

A real hoax seems to have been perpetrated upon the good people of Florida. That State is about to lose a Senator who accomplished much for its development, for its economic advancement, prosperity, and for the welfare of its people. There is no question about this—the record demonstrates it.

So Florida is about to lose a great Senator, a great Democrat, a man of courage who represented the highest traditions of Americanism; and we will lose an able, conscientious colleague. He was defeated by false propaganda and the corrupt use of great wealth, defeated by a biased press, by slander and by falsehood spread over his State at great cost.

The question may be raised: How are we going to meet this sort of political sabotage in the future? It can happen to any of us. But, my friends, this is not the time or place to solve that question. We are here tonight for the purpose of honoring our friend and opening to him our pent-up feelings of friendship and affection. We will always be for him in any course he may undertake. We will wish him Godspeed and good luck in all his future years.

Let us hope that he may return to us and continue to fight with us for a better tomorrow.

I know you are all anxious to express your sentiments, so I'll take up your time no longer.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the concurrent resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois?

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 298) was considered and agreed to.

PERSONAL STATEMENT BY SENATOR PEPPER

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, like the other recipients of the sentiments of tender farewell which we have heard today, I do not trust myself with endeavoring to say very much, lest I evoke from my heart manifestations unbecoming to this great deliberative body. But, Mr. President, I do want the Senator from West Virginia, the Senator from Montana, and other Senators, who have spoken so generously, to know that forever imbedded indelibly upon my memory in gratitude will be the generous sentiments they have expressed here today; and I am most grateful that they were willing to do so.

Mr. President, the greatest of the privileges of coming to be a United States Senator is the immeasurable satisfaction and exhilaration which comes from association with the Members of the United States Senate. I know of no attachments that we form that are more lasting and are more meaningful to us than those that are bound around our hearts here in our association one with another. My term began November 4, 1936, but I was sworn in, in January 1937. Joe Robinson, of Arkansas, was the great Democratic leader at that time, and I can still seem to feel around me the presence of Pat Harrison and all those others on both sides of the aisle, who have gone on to their reward, who were, in my own time, the adornments of this distinguished body. It will be a little difficult tomorrow, for those of us who do not come back, to feel that we are not still Members of this, the greatest of associations, here. But we will all be sustained by the memories of our long friendships; we will all have a feeling that you and we are still one as fellow citizens of our great country.

I want to express particularly my gratitude to my distinguished junior colleague for what he has said here today. He has said truly that we have not always voted alike, but never has there been a cloud to cast a shadow upon our friendship or our mutual respect and esteem. I am grateful to the people of my great State that, in three elections, they have honored me with their confidence, and allowed me the great privilege, in periods of crisis in our country's history, to have one small voice in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. President, as I said, when I came here in 1937, we were in the midst of a depression, and there were some who despaired that the economy of this great country might ever again rise with vigor and strength and power; and yet, today, we are told that we are producing 50 percent more than in 1940. We have not yet approximated the zenith of glory and greatness and grandeur that America will eventually achieve. And so those who doubted have surely had their doubts dispelled and they have been given every reason for confidence in our country.

Only a few days ago my wife and I took a trip in a Navy boat around Pearl Harbor, and there one sees the Arizona, and another great battleship, the Utah. One of them has scores of American bodies still pinned beneath it, in their watery grave; the other has more than 1,000 Americans still entombed where a dastardly Japanese attack cast them. America's future looked dreary to us all that day, December 7, 1941. How, with our Navy, eight battleships and eight cruisers, knocked out of activity and operation, could we hold against the fearful forces advancing against us? Yet, now, Mr. President, our power is immeasurably greater than it was then. We went on to the greatest victory in all our history. Today there are some who wonder what will be the outcome of this struggle in which we are now engaged, for I think all of us agree that it is the most difficult we have ever faced.

Yet one has only to read the lessons of history to know that people when on the side of God and good finally won out. I have no fear about what will be the outcome of the present contest whatever the duration.

I add but one further condition to our victory and it has been well illustrated by what has been said here today. If men remain true to their own consciences and to their country, surely we can have no doubt about the future. The advice of Polonius to Laertes—

To thine own self be true,
And it must follow, as the day the night,
Thou canst not then be false to any man—

Is just as true today as it was when the advice was given, and it applies to Senators as to citizens.

If Senators will go before the electorates standing for something; advocating what in their own consciences seems right; and not just seeking to be reelected; if they do not bend their consciences to the adverse winds of public opinion; when they think that opinion wrong, then they remain patriots, and then only, in the conflict of many counsels, will we come to a common course that will save our country and our kind of a world.

I read only last night the splendid article in Life magazine telling about the Peloponnesian War. It is when statesmen dare not tell their fellow countrymen the truth, dare not be true to their country, that their country collapses and their democracy perishes. I am sure that this illustrious Senate will not fail in the future to observe the great traditions of the past.

I wish to say that if I have during my service offended any of my colleagues by any words I may have uttered which were not appropriate to the sentiments of affection and esteem which I bore, and now bear, for every Senator, they were the fruit of the moment's excitement, and not from an unfriendly heart, and I ask forgiveness for any offense I may have committed.

I wish to say to the distinguished occupant of the Chair that I am grateful for the privilege of having served under him as Democratic leader, and now as the Vice President of the United States. No one ever led better and more nobly than did he, and I likewise pay tribute to his illustrious successor, our esteemed friend, the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], who followed in his footsteps as the leader on the Democratic side.

And now, Mr. President, in this season, may I say, God bless America, God bless the United States Senate, God bless every United States Senator.

[Great applause, Senators rising.]

PERSONAL STATEMENT BY SENATOR LUCAS

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, although I addressed the Senate earlier in the day, I feel that I would be recreant to an overpowering impulse if I left this hallowed Chamber this afternoon without expressing to the Members of the Senate my sense of deep gratitude for the kindness and cordiality and generosity they have exhibited in my behalf, and for the many kind things they have said about me.

Particularly do I desire to assure the Vice President of the United States of my deep affection. While I have been acting as majority leader during the past 2 years he has always been extremely kind and considerate and generous in his counsel and his advice in connection with many intricate and delicate problems and policies.

Nothing could have pleased me more than to have had the distinguished and eminent senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], who has served this body longer than any other Member, take the floor of the Senate, as he did earlier today, and express such admiration of me and my leadership as he voiced. The expressions of the Vice President and the expressions of the Senator from Tennessee will live long in my memory, as among the most greatly enjoyed tributes ever paid to me either in public or private.

Of course, Mr. President, I am also grateful to the other Members of the Senate, and especially to my distinguished and brilliant and courageous colleague, PAUL DOUGLAS. My association with him during the past 2 years has been on the highest plane. He cooperated with me on almost all occasions, and it was a pleasure to serve with him during my term as leader.

Mr. President, I now say once again, farewell and God bless everyone.

[Great applause, Senators rising.]

CONFIRMATIONS IN THE JUDICIARY

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, some nominations which have been reported by the Committee on the Judiciary unanimously, I understand, are now on the desk. I ask unanimous consent that they may be considered at this time as in executive session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed, and the President will be notified.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed, and the President will be notified.

EDWARD L. LEAHY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Edward L. Leahy, of Rhode Island, to be United States district judge for the district of Rhode Island.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed, and the President will be notified.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, we have today heard many fine and deserved tributes paid to departing Senators. One of them, the recent junior Senator from Rhode Island, Mr. Leahy, a man of great distinction, who served a short time in the Senate under appointment, could not be present today. I know the Senate is happy to honor him, as we have honored other Senators, by unanimously confirming his nomination to be United States district judge in the great State of Rhode Island. He served with some of us on the Committee on the Judiciary, he is a lawyer of distinction, and I know he will be a judge of great caliber.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the next nomination.

ALFRED E. MODARELLI

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Alfred E. Modarelli, of New Jersey, to be United States district judge for the district of New Jersey.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, neither my colleague, the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HENDRICKSON] nor I oppose the nomination of Mr. Modarelli, but I wish to make an announcement in regard to this matter. At the beginning of the next session of the Senate I propose to discuss at the appropriate time the whole subject of judicial appointments, which has come to my attention particularly in connection with the pending nomination.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to this nomination?

The nomination was confirmed.

ADJOURNMENT SINE DIE

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, in accordance with the terms of House Concurrent Resolution 297, I move that the Senate stand adjourned sine die.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned sine die.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, JANUARY 2, 1951

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we pray that as we continue our journey into the new year, all the difficult problems of each day and all the adventures of the unknown tomorrows may be illumined and glorified with the light and power of the lofty ideals and principles of truth and righteousness.

May we daily walk in the ways of godliness and goodness, meeting our tasks and responsibilities with calmness and courage, with wisdom and clear judgment, with faith and hope, and in faithfulness and in the fear of the Lord.

Grant that in our plans and efforts to withstand and conquer the evil forces of aggression and aggrandizement, we may never place our confidence solely in the primacy of human ingenuity, and in the might of our manpower and material resources, or in the help that our allies and the freedom-loving nations may be able and willing to give.

We pray that in these days of crisis and emergency when we are filled with a sense of our insecurity and inadequacy and fears and forebodings haunt our hearts, we may enter into an alliance and compact with the King of Kings and Lord of Lords, whose strength is invincible.

May the souls of God-fearing men and nations everywhere be aflame with a passion to bring in the day of peace and brotherhood.

Hear us in Christ's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Woodruff, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H. J. Res. 556. Joint resolution to authorize the President to issue posthumously to the late Walton Harris Walker, lieutenant general, Army of the United States, a commission as general, Army of the United States, and for other purposes.

PERMISSION TO FILE MINORITY VIEWS

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the minority members of the Select Committee on Lobbying Activities may have until noon tomorrow to file minority views to accompany the majority report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

AMENDING TITLE II OF THE FIRST WAR POWERS ACT, 1941

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 4266) to amend and extend title II of the First War Powers Act, 1941, as amended.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 201 of the First War Powers Act, 1941 (55 Stat. 838) is hereby amended by striking out the words "the prosecution of the war effort" and the words "the prosecution of the war", appearing in such section, and inserting in lieu of each stricken provision the words "the national defense"; and such section 201 is further amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof a colon and the following: "Provided further, That all contracts entered into, amended, or modified pursuant to authority contained in this section shall include a clause to the effect that the Comptroller General of the United States or any of his duly authorized representatives shall have access to and the right to examine any pertinent books, documents, papers, and records of the contractor or any of his subcontractors engaged in the performance of and involving transactions related to such contracts or subcontracts."

SEC. 2. Title II of such act, as amended, shall remain in force during the national emergency proclaimed by the President December 16, 1950, or until such earlier time as the Congress by concurrent resolution or the President may designate, but in no event beyond June 30, 1952.

SEC. 3. Nothing in this act shall prejudice anything heretofore done under the said title II of the First War Powers Act, 1941, or the continuance in force of any action heretofore taken thereunder.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] be recognized to demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. GRAHAM. I am.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman qualifies.

Without objection a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] for 20 minutes.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, this bill was thoroughly debated yesterday when an attempt was made to get unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. I am not going to take up much time in unfolding its benefits.

There has been read to you the so-called Hardy amendment which is to be added to the Senate bill. We are reliably informed through Senator MCFARLAND, chairman of the Senate Committee on Expenditures, that the Hardy amendment will be acceptable.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. HARDY. I have conferred with Senator MCFARLAND and he tells me that he thinks this should be a part of the bill and he felt certain if the House would approve the amendment the measure could be adopted in the Senate without the necessity for the appointment of conferees and that he would undertake to see that that is done.

Mr. CELLER. The import of the amendment is to give to the General Accounting Office power of investigation and the right of access to all records and to examine all data of any firm whose contract has been modified or is to be modified or affected.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALTER. Is title I of the bill considered by the House committee in the Senate bill or has that been deleted?

Mr. CELLER. We are considering the Senate bill which has eliminated title I that concerns the rearrangement and reshuffling of the various branches and agencies of government. This bill is limited to title II of the War Powers Act of 1941 and appertains only and solely to contracts.

Mr. Speaker, I think it would be pertinent for me to read a few paragraphs from a report I received from the Department of the Army concerning title II:

> The armed services are bending every effort to get the procurement program into high gear. A number of problems similar to those encountered during World War II have already arisen and require this additional authority for their solution. The need, however, is particularly urgent at this time in order that relief may be afforded certain contractors with fixed-price contracts. So far 46 Army contractors holding contracts in a total sum of more than $40,000,000 have applied for relief. The better part of the supplies involved are badly needed and many of the contractors face financial ruin unless prompt action is taken.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. Will the gentleman tell us in a word, because it is important to the country, exactly how it will help the mobilization effort besides giving relief to the particular firms the gentleman has mentioned? What is its general application to mobilization?

Mr. CELLER. There may be additional contractors beyond those I have mentioned who are unable to perform their contracts for military matériel because of inflated prices, because of general conditions beyond their control, brought about by inflation. The armed services are in particular need of many of these supplies that will be furnished by the contractors thus embarrassed. If, for example, these contractors are compelled to abide by these burdensome conditions and inflated prices they cannot supply the matériel and it will be essential, therefore, for the Government to ask for new bids with consequent delays. Those delays, the gentleman will agree, will handicap the defense effort.

Mr. JAVITS. In other words, this changes existing law by making it unnecessary to go through the standard procedure for the placing of contracts in order to renegotiate or change existing contracts?

Mr. CELLER. I think the gentleman eloquently states the point.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FULTON. First in reference to the Hardy amendment, will the gentleman explain in more detail the powers of the GAO under this legislation?

Mr. CELLER. As I understand the Hardy amendment, the powers given are like a Damoclean sword that will hang over the heads of the contractors whose contracts are changed. The amendment will give power to the General Accounting Office to go into the books and delve into the records of these contractors who have been relieved to determine whether or not there is fraud or overreaching or whether they have done anything untoward, in which event reports will be made and suitable action may be taken. The power of investigation and inquiry of the General Accounting Office should be an excellent deterrent. Those reports also would be of great help subsequently on the question of renegotiation.

Mr. FULTON. Then if there is no fraud and the books have been looked at by the General Accounting Office, the decision goes to the particular department of defense having jurisdiction to make it, and that is where the final responsibility rests for the decision, is it not?

Mr. CELLER. I think the gentleman stated it correctly.

Mr. FULTON. Where there is a contractor who is trying to cooperate with the particular defense department even to go so far as to say, "Well, if you can get the particular material or steel delivered elsewhere and to a subcontractor, I will just stand aside," and he can show a severe loss, that kind of a case would still be under this hardship provision, would it not?

Mr. CELLER. I think it would. It would be entirely in the discretion of the procurement agency, the armed services, the Army, the Navy, the Air Force, and so on.

Mr. FULTON. And the cooperation of a particular contractor in doing what the particular defense department wanted them to do to assist the defense effort should not be held against him when the final judgment comes up on whether they are under this bill or not for relief.

Mr. CELLER. I am in accord with the gentleman's observation.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. I do not want any names of any manufacturers, but can the gentleman give us some illustration of what the manufacturers are up against that they want to be relieved of now by the Federal Government from the contract which they made to furnish the Government with certain supplies?

Mr. CELLER. I have not the names of any particular contractors.

Mr. RICH. I do not want the names; I want a list and an explanation of some of these contracts.

Mr. CELLER. For example, where a contract called for a certain product and the raw materials that go into that product have advanced exorbitantly high, in such a case the contractor would be permitted to get his contract changed so that the resulting product would bear a higher price to cover the advanced prices that he has to pay for labor and/or the raw material. Most of the cases are of that concern.

Mr. RICH. Supposing some contractor bid on furnishing the Government with certain material, and the raw materials now have advanced so he cannot furnish them, why did not that contractor, like any good, sensible businessman would do if he is bidding on a contract, cover himself with the materials that are necessary to supply the Government with the materials which he is bidding on rather than have you come here now with legislation such as this to bail out somebody who got caught? This is no time for the Government to be trafficking in giving a manufacturer something that he ought to have known about beforehand.

Mr. CELLER. When the gentleman asks me a question I am glad to answer it. Now the gentleman is making a speech. We covered all of that yesterday, and I thought I had adequately answered the gentleman in that regard. There is no attempt to give relief to a man who has been negligent, a man who has been improvident, a man who did not exercise common sense. We are not trying to bail out contractors; we are trying to bail out the Government. We are trying to rescue in the interest of the public welfare—in the interest of better and quicker defense.

Mr. RICH. Yes, you are bailing out the Government, you are bailing out the Treasury of the United States, and you are going to bail out some manufacturers.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I refuse to yield further.

Mr. RICH. That is what you are bailing out.

Mr. CELLER. We are not deliberately bailing out any of these contractors. We are helping the Government; we are helping the armed services get the goods that they desperately need.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. DURHAM. I think the question that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has raised can be answered in this respect. Since 1946, if you look back over it historically, the stockpiling needs ordinarily by industry have been only on a 30- to 60-day basis because of the large consumption, not only for carrying out the war effort but from a civilian economy standpoint. Today that stands about as it did a year ago. Industry today does not carry over a 90-day stockpiling, so the effect of the legislation I do not believe would carry back as bad as the gentleman from Pennsylvania assumes it would in contributions to the contractors.

Mr. CELLER. I thank the gentleman for his statement. I am sure the gentleman will agree also that we are in a desperate situation. We need the strategic materials and products. We cannot be pinchpenny about it. It may be that somebody is to blame. It may be that the contractors should have foreseen some of their difficulty, but they could not have foreseen it to the degree that the inflation exacted. Let us pass this bill so that we can get these much-needed goods at the right time—now—not months later.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. The purpose of this bill is to try to bring practical justice to a number of business concerns throughout the country. We may disagree on this or that piece of legislation, but I think all of us are in agreement that we do not want to bring about any kind of unintentional injustice. This is a matter of vital concern to a number of what might be termed the smaller or independent business activities, corporations, or partnerships, throughout the country, who in good faith made contracts. I am able to look ahead and see the tremendous impact of prices on these concerns. They will be forced into bankruptcy unless something is done. They are entitled to this relief. I will agree that these contracts should be looked into very carefully to see that the Government gives these concerns practical justice. That is the contribution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] and to that extent I thoroughly agree with him. I think the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARDY] will be very, very beneficial in that respect.

Mr. CELLER. I am also informed by the Department of the Army that most of these contractors are small businesses. I am sure we all want to lend a helping hand to small business. We want to keep them in a position where we can continue our competitive economy, where they can continue to aid our defense effort.

Mr. McCORMACK. May I suggest that it is not a question of lending a hand, it is a question of practical justice under the circumstances. That is what attracts me. I know the gentleman used the phrase "lend a helping hand" in the same sense.

Mr. CELLER. Indeed I did.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. Is it not a fact that in most raw-material contracts with manufacturers the price is left open, it is to be the market price? That is true of rubber and it is true of wool. Those are exactly the commodities which have put the squeeze on the situation as far as the manufacturers are concerned to whom I think the gentleman is referring.

Mr. CELLER. That is correct.

Mr. JAVITS. As I understand, the Renegotiation Act applies to contracts with the armed services. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] says the Committee on the Judiciary will consider extending the Renegotiation Act to other types of contracts. Will the Committee on the Judiciary be able to make that retroactive so that it will apply to all contracts, including these?

Mr. CELLER. I am not in a position to answer that thoroughly at this moment, as to whether it could be made applicable to all contracts. As far as I am personally concerned, I think it should be made applicable to them.

Mr. JAVITS. I agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER]. I think the Renegotiation Act should be made applicable to all contracts, armed services or not, in any way connected with this mobilization.

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. SCRIVNER. We have heard some discussion about the fact that this would permit some renegotiation up. Would this same power permit the Government to renegotiate contracts down; that is, if they find there has been a higher charge made than possibly should have been made, they can reduce that cost to the Government?

Mr. CELLER. If the end result of the operations is such as to indicate that the contractor has made more than a just and reasonable amount of profits, and you take into consideration the over-all power in the Renegotiation Act, the procurement agency has the right to cut down and slash, beyond question.

Mr. SCRIVNER. In other words, this will work both ways?

Mr. CELLER. The end result will be the working both ways.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. REED of New York. Just for clarification, may I ask this: If a company makes inordinate profits, then it would be renegotiated down. On the other hand, if because of the increase in wages and materials costs and the scarcity of goods, and all that, the contract price should be raised, then these contracts can be renegotiated up in order to work out justice; is not that right?

Mr. CELLER. That is correct.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK].

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I intend to support this legislation as it has been now presented. I think it is needed in the public interest, in the interest of the security of the country, and in the interest of fair dealing for our citizens who will be involved in the operation of the legislation after it becomes effective.

I do not want to recite ancient history, but I do want to recall that the other day when a similar measure, including title I, was sought to be called up, I objected to it. I objected to it, among other reasons, because adequate hearings had not been held and because in respect to title I, so far as I could find out, there was absolutely no evidence of any great urgency or immediate necessity for the enactment of title I.

So I commend the gentleman from New York and those who have worked with him in bringing before us this measure which deals only with title II.

Generally speaking, of course, we all realize that in any time of great crisis and emergency it becomes necessary to grant additional authority and power to the Central Government. The Congress must necessarily grant that power. No one of us will object to the granting of emergency power providing careful consideration is given to the measure by which we grant such authority.

In other words, even though we are at war and even though we are faced with a great emergency condition, the Congress of the United States cannot abdicate its responsibility to pass carefully and deliberately upon all such grants of power. Moreover, it also should be said at this time that while the people, through the Congress, are ready to grant great powers to the Central Government the people one day in the future, when the crisis and emergency is past, will and should be equally insistent through the Congress that these powers be restored to the Congress and the country.

As the committee begins its consideration of title I, as I assume it will after the beginning of the new Congress, it seems to me that very careful consideration should be given to the provisions of that title. As it was presented the other day, I am quite sure that its provisions were much too broad. Power would have been granted to the President and those operating under his direction to do things in connection with the Government that might well be completely outside the matter of our national security and our national defense.

Certainly no authority and no power should be granted if a clear case for its necessity cannot be made. I am quite sure that in the calm deliberations which the committee can give those provisions of title I, we can expect the great Committee on the Judiciary to present us with a fair report.

As to title II, and its provisions in respect to adjustment of contracts, I know enough of the situation to be convinced that in the national interest and in the fundamental interest of the country in procuring supplies which we so desperately need, the provisions of this title are necessary.

It is for that reason, as I said at the outset, that I propose to support this bill.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] to make what may be his farewell address to the Congress.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee says we are in a desperate situation. I will say we are in a desperate situation. All you need to do is to read the Treasury statement today to see what a desperate situation you are in. Two hundred and sixty-seven billion in debt, taxpayers bending their backs, and the country in a Truman police war.

The majority leader says this is practical justice. Practical justice for whom? Why is there not someone in this House to talk about economizing in government and trying to take care of the taxpayers of this country and give us a little practical justice, such as the Nation needs; a little practical justice that will keep this country afloat from bankruptcy? If we do not watch out, we are going to fundamentally wreck ourselves. You are doing it every day and you are doing it fast. We need common business sense in Government.

Now let us look at this legislation. What does it mean? If a contractor, a businessman in this country, goes out and takes a contract to furnish the Government with supplies, he is supposed to be enough of a businessman when he gets such a contract, to cover himself with the necessary raw materials to fulfill that contract and to furnish the Federal Government with the material on which he is bidding. That is only good, common, ordinary, every-day horse sense and justice. It means that a businessman who does that knows what is good sound business. But what are you doing in this legislation? You are bailing out a few poor businessmen in this country who were dumb enough to bid on a Government contract and then foolish enough not to cover themselves with the necessary supplies to furnish the Government with that material. I think that is bad business in any man's language, and I do not care whose business it is, where the business is located or in what section of the country.

I have been in this Congress for a great many years. I have seen the New Deal bring in legislation just as bad as this. What do I refer to? I recall when we had bonding companies which had guaranteed that money that was paid out by various Federal agencies, be put up by the bonding companies if errors were made. Errors have been made to the tune of $80,000,000 at one time, in this New Deal Congress, with which I have been associated ever since it was established in 1933. They forgave the bonding companies. That Congress has done more damage, more wrecking of the American people, than any other Congress in the history of this Nation. It is a Congress that has been doing more to disrupt the harmony and good order of good business for the benefit of the American people, than anything that could have been done. I am referring to this spending, New Deal, Fair Deal, "Raw Deal" Government we have in Washington now. It is about time we stopped rotten legislation such as this. Not only once has the New Deal bailed out the bonding companies, they have passed laws doing it a number of times.

They have spent lavishly, taxed heavy, now you have the country in a financial fix. You have taught our people they can live off the Government and have no responsibility. O, where are our strong men who believe in work, earn, and save? Where are the men who believe in our Constitution and our laws? I say, Mr. Speaker, God save America—from themselves, as interpreted by the New Deal.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to use to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHILBIN].

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, this bill is most essential to the defense effort. It will permit the immediate readjustment of many contracts for military materials and supplies which are presently arrested or hampered because of the sharp rise of prices of many basic commodities.

Many concerns will be faced with bankruptcy if this measure is not enacted. That would be unjust, inequitable, and, from the Government standpoint, unconscionable. But the primary effect of this bill is to insure the flow of goods and supplies to the Armed Forces—clothing, shoes, overcoats, yes, and weapons, devices, and other instruments of war which are vitally needed.

I urge the House to pass this bill without further delay. It is required in the emergency for the national interest and the national security.

I commend the able gentleman from New York for his efforts in this vital matter.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that perhaps the best legislation we could enact would be to change the fundamental law of the land, or, if necessary, the Constitution, so as to permit the genial and able gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH], who is leaving these Halls in voluntary retirement tonight or tomorrow morning, to return here, and for the good of our souls and the benefit of the Nation, to ask his famous question now and then: "Where are you going to get the money?" I know that we shall miss him, and I hope he will miss us. We all give him Godspeed on his way.

Mr. Speaker, in connection with this pending bill, I am not unmindful of the fact, as I am sure most of you are not, that it is easier for Congress to delegate power than it is to recapture power once it is given. This piece of legislation is a measure designed only to delegate or grant power to the Chief Executive.

As a member of the Rules Committee, when this original bill was before that committee, I opposed the granting of a rule, because the original bill, as it came from the House Committee on the Judiciary, contained title I, which would grant broad power to the President of the United States to reorganize the executive branch of the Government.

Under title I the President would have the power to do many things which the Congress has specifically voted against and has officially decided they do not want done, in connection with the reorganization of the executive branch of the Government. For instance, the President would have had the power to do that which was in the minds of some people at one time, and which the Congress prevented: Merging the Marine Corps into the Army. Under the provisions of title I the President could transfer the air arm of the Navy and the air arm of the Marine Corps over to the Air Force. Under this title, if such becomes law, the President could, in his wisdom, if he so desired, establish the Department of Welfare which the Congress of the United States twice has rejected as a reorganization plan submitted under the Reorganization Act of 1949. The President could do a dozen other things that this Congress has in the past rejected, as proposals that he submitted as reorganization plans under the authority of the 1949 Reorganization Act. The President could have had and would have had these unusual powers under title I as included in the original House bill. I am very happy that the House Committee on the Judiciary has gone along with the Senate in eliminating title I. I pointed out, at the time the original measure was before the House Committee on Rules, that the other legislative body on Capitol Hill would not approve title I, that there was no reason why such a power should be granted so suddenly in the closing days of this so-called "lame duck" session. Of course, the other body, in its wisdom, did not see fit to approve title I of the bill. When Mr. Wilson, the Director of Mobilization, was called before the Expenditures Committee of the other body, he said that he did not know what powers might be necessary.

So I have taken this time, Mr. Speaker, to urge the Committee on the Judiciary that, when it considers in the new Congress legislation to grant many of the powers contained in title I that it be very zealous, be very careful—as able and learned lawyers—to write into that measure provisions that may be necessary to see to it that the President does not have the power to do those things, in connection with the reorganization of the executive branch of the Government, which we have specifically refused to permit by legislative enactment in the past. I want to be certain, if I can, and I think the majority of this House wants to be certain, that the President is not given any power that will permit him to set aside any part of the great work this Congress has done in making effective the recommendations of the Hoover Commission.

I hope the President will never be granted the power to transfer or to do away with, or in any way to injure, the United States Marine Corps, of which we all are so proud, or that he will not be given the power to take away from the Navy and from the Marine Corps their air arms which have proven so necessary and so valuable in recent months in far-off Korea.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. CELLER. I do hope that if and when the bill concerning the subject matter of title I comes before the Committee on the Judiciary that the gentleman from Ohio will come before that committee and give us the benefit of his views.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I shall certainly be happy to appear before the gentleman's committee. I am grateful for the invitation. May I in turn express the sincere hope that when I do appear before the committee that you will give full consideration to any suggestions I may have to make. Certainly we want to be very careful in voting away the powers and authorities which primarily belong to the legislative branch.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAVITS].

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, this bill gives us an opportunity to understand the productive processes on which we must depend if we are to win for freedom and beat the challenge of the Soviet bloc. It is my firm conviction that unless production is increased 50 percent in the next 5 years our chances of winning will be much endangered. If production is increased 50 percent in the next 5 years we can win and probably without a major war.

The reason the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania on this point is not, in my humble view, valid is that if we make every manufacturer in the private economy on which we are going to depend for production do what he says should be done we would be defeating our own purpose. Let us remember that depending upon our private economy for production and having the private economy successfully deliver is one of the key points we are going to use to defeat communism ideologically as well. If our private economy can outproduce the Soviet economy—as I am convinced it will continue to do by an enormous margin—this is a demonstration to the people of the world that our private economy is a lot more sound and more beneficial to them than a Communist economy.

If we were to follow the view of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to its logical conclusion, we would be asking the businessman to get the maximum price out of the Government because he would have to take all of the risk in a very volatile situation. What we are trying to do by this bill is to temper the private economic system—the relationship between competitors and the buying needs of Government—by giving some relief when relief is needed so that the businessman does not have to feel in this emergency mobilization situation that he has to get the maximum nickel out of the Government to take care of every conceivable contingency as to the price of his raw materials or other increases in cost. That is a salutary measure in trying to save money during this great mobilization effort.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. Does the gentleman mean to tell me that I am not in favor of the private-enterprise system?

Mr. JAVITS. No; I would say no such thing. If the gentleman will permit me to finish, I meant to tell the gentleman that if he wants the private-enterprise system to work to its best effectiveness, as I am sure he does, it must be given a certain degree of flexibility in a mobilization situation where we should have a 50-percent increase in production in 5 years to assure that free institutions will win out.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the noon press carries the headline, "Fall of Seoul appears near."

Here we are in the House considering legislation, if I understand the debate, to determine how we are going to permit the war profits to be divided. There should be no so-called war profits.

Would it not be more appropriate if we were considering a way to save the lives of some of the American men who are now overseas, the lives of others who are about to be sent over there?

Here we are in a war declared not by the Congress, as provided by the Constitution but a war in which we become involved because the Security Council of the United Nations asked the President of the United States to send our fighting men into battle. The President did that. That is what he said he did in his message to Congress. This is a war in which our men are dying by the thousands.

This is a war which a majority of our people believe never can be won. Former President Hoover is one man whose patriotism, whose sincerity, and whose ability, whose knowledge of world conditions cannot be questioned. He has nothing to gain or nothing to lose in this war. But his country has its future security—its existence at stake.

Mr. Hoover cames before the American people, and marshaling the facts as a competent builder would, starting at a foundation based on facts, builds up fact upon fact an argument which convinces me at least that we never can by the use of a land army in Asia or a land army in Europe win world war III. With his views so expressed a former Ambassador to Great Britain, Joseph P. Kennedy, a Democrat, agrees. Neither one of these gentlemen in expressing these views said anything that has not been in the minds of the overwhelming majority of our people for the last 4 or 5 years. One reason the people are now accepting those views and want the Congress to act on them is because the views so expressed by those two great Americans are the views of the so-called common man.

We are in a war. What for? To make Hong Kong safe for Great Britain? To save the trade of the dollars of British merchants and investors? That seems to be the present primary objective. And the price paid? The lives of American men. How many? No one knows.

Why is it that American men are sent to die and freeze to death in Korea while a fighting force of Chinese eager to fight remains inactive on Formosa? Answer me that, if you will, someone who is in favor of this war, if anyonc is. Answer me that, someone who wants us to be a stooge of the UN, which induced Truman to put us in. Or did Truman pull the strings which moved the UN? Oh, yes, Tom Dewey is in favor of it, if the press quotes him right. He wants to mobilize something like 9,000,000 young men and young women. Note that word "women." Now, I am sorry to say I have never been in the armed services of my country; I never have. Perhaps Tom thinks if you induct 9,000,000 young Americans, when you have no place to train them, no clothing, no food for them, no weapons with which to train them, no competent instructors to make them warwise, that the war will be won. Might I say, perhaps, if me and Tom—yes I said me and Tom—never mind the grammar—would start off for Europe, Stalin might crawl down in his hole. But I do not believe it. I am not in favor of continuing to waste the lives of our young men in a hopeless, thankless task. I have heard men stand in the well of this House and shake their fists and roar, "We will fight them; we will lick them," but those men who were talking that way were not going to any war anywhere. They were going to send somebody else to war, and the folks in my part of the country, my district, and the surrounding districts, so far as I can get in contact with them, and the mail I get—and I challenge you to deny that your mail is not the same—are saying it is time that we quit fighting the battles of millions who do not propose to go all out in support of the war effort. Why fight to bring freedom to people who will not themselves fight for it—who do not appear to want the kind of freedom we seek to impose on them? It is time that we quit robbing our country of its young manhood. I am not so deeply concerned about this effect that my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] talks about, bankruptcy. In normal times it is all right to consider our dollars, but in times of emergency, personally I do not care so much about that. If I lose what property, what money I have, I can go back to work, get along with less, but if my son and my grandsons die in war, I cannot bring them back. Nor can the millions of American parents bring back their loved ones. Nor can the Nation make secure its future if it wastes the lives of millions of its men in opposing Stalin on untenable battlefields as Acheson and Truman and the United Nations seems determined to do.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'TOOLE].

Mr. O'TOOLE. Mr. Speaker, the statement by the gentleman from Ohio that the House would be very careful not to grant such powers to the President as the House had heretofore reserved unto itself was very amusing to me. He further expressed a concern that the Marine Corps might be reduced and that the Navy might be disarmed.

I would like to remind the gentleman from Ohio that it was his party, when they controlled the administration of this country, that reduced the Marine Corps from 215,000 to 9,000 men, and who, under the Kellogg Pact, almost made the United States Navy a museum piece. In fact, they left the United States Navy so ill-equipped and undermanned that it was necessary for the Congress to appropriate between 1934 and 1939 more money for the rebuilding of our Navy than had been appropriated heretofore in the history of the country.

Having expressed these facts, I know that I can anticipate a retort from the gentleman from Ohio that will bring out fully his "kindness and light" spirit. It is always pleasant to engage in debate with the gentleman, for one knows that he will never hit below the belt as long as the belt is worn firmly around the ankles. His cute personal remarks remind one of the subtlety of the rampaging animal symbol of the GOP. His dainty but mastadonic inferences would crush into nothingness the old bowler that he wore in his house-detective days. I hope that the gentleman received a stone crusher for his Christmas so that he may indulge in his whimsical notions for the new year. "Whimsical Clarence" as a boy and still "Whimsical Clarence" as he approaches manhood.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'TOOLE. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DINGELL. And let us recall that the Hoover budget provided funds for the entire Army, which then included the Air Corps, a total, I think, of about $232,000,000 for everything.

Mr. O'TOOLE. And do not forget that Mr. Hoover is one of the few Presidents of the United States who, when he ran for reelection, was repudiated by the American people.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield, inasmuch as he mentioned my name?

Mr. O'TOOLE. For a question or a speech?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. For a brief statement.

Mr. O'TOOLE. I cannot yield.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I appreciate the gentleman's courtesy.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to answer the gentleman from New York who seems to be in a confused state of mind this morning, so soon after New Year's Eve. I want to remind the gentleman that it was the Republican Eightieth Congress which enacted into law the Unification Act that provided for the continuation of the Marine Corps, and protected it from being merged into the Army by those men who publicly criticized, and in written letters, have condemned the Marine Corps; that gallant fighting force has been our first line of national defense in every critical hour of our country's history. The same Republican Congress authorized the larger Air Force his party's President refused to call to the colors. That Republican Eightieth Congress provided for the big Navy aircraft carrier—the United States, that the Truman administration refused to build, yes—the Republican Congress also provided our Armed Forces be enlarged to more than 2,000,000 men—but Mr. Truman, not the Congress, refused to enlarge our Military Establishment. So let the gentleman from New York put the responsibility for our unpreparedness squarely where it belongs—on the President—not on the Republican Party.

Mr. O'TOOLE. Who reduced it to 9,000——

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I cannot yield to the gentleman. He has not extended me such courtesy. But I am happy to see that the gentleman is back here. I hope he will remain here in the House until he is sworn in for the new session, before he returns to the confines of Brooklyn. While he is here he may learn that the Republican Congress, the Eightieth Congress, voted every dollar requested for national defense, that it gave to this administration a larger Army, a larger Navy, and a larger Marine Corps than it ever called into service until Korea, that the Republicans in this Congress have voted for every single item for the national defense of this country, and, above all else, that the Republican Members of Congress were here on the job in Congress, voting, I want to say to the gentleman.

Mr. O'TOOLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I am sorry, I cannot yield.

Mr. O'TOOLE. My attendance record was 96.2, and the gentleman can match that with the record of anyone else.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House suspend the rules and pass the bill as amended?

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AUTHORIZING SPEAKER TO DECLARE A RECESS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order for the Speaker to declare a recess any time during the remainder of the day, subject to the call of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE TO NOTIFY PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 895) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of two Members be appointed by the House to join a similar committee appointed by the Senate, to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that the two Houses have completed their business of the session and are ready to adjourn, unless the President has some other communication to make to them.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] as a committee to notify the President.

REVIEW OF ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE EIGHTY-FIRST CONGRESS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, the Eighty-first Congress has written a remarkable record into the Nation's annals—a record reflecting the rapidity with which history-making events move in the world today.

The volume and the speed of the work done by this Congress demonstrated the ability of our democratic legislative body to meet the needs of the hour and to function decisively in the face of emergency.

When we convened 2 years ago, a world struggling to recover from the ravages of World War II was menaced by the rise of another aggressive and tyrannical force—communism.

Moscow-directed communism had extended its police-state powers across the borders of a dozen neighboring and helpless small nations.

Thanks to American support of liberty-loving people in France, Italy, Greece, Turkey, and Iran, those countries were saved from subjugation.

Rather than cede the future of civilization—by appeasement or default—to the encroaching aggressor, the Eighty-first Congress, in its wisdom and courage, made an historic choice. It committed this Nation to the leadership of the forces of freedom.

Once our policy was determined, we enacted the specific measures necessary to make it effective.

We extended for a second and then a third year the Marshall plan which lifted the economy of Western Europe from the doldrums and restored it to productiveness and stability.

We ratified the North Atlantic Pact assuring its signatory nations of collective security.

We implemented this agreement with a program of military aid to the pact members under the Mutual Defense Assistance Act.

We approved the principle of point four and made the first funds available for assisting underprivileged countries to utilize their resources.

By combating poverty, disease, and illiteracy, this program has struck at the very conditions of human misery upon which communism thrives. By raising the standards of living of underprivileged peoples, we help strengthen their will to resist the force which would enslave them.

We have strengthened our ties with the United Nations and through the UN with every other peace-loving nation on earth.

The great program of legislation enacted by the Eighty-first Congress was not only designed to stop the spread of communism, but it was positive and affirmative in its objectives of strengthening the cause of democracy, peace, and economic well-being at home as well as abroad.

We expanded our social-security system to bring over 10,000,000 more citizens under its benefits.

We authorized the first comprehensive and long-range housing program for families in lower- and middle-income brackets.

We extended the Reciprocal Trade Act and removed restrictive provisions.

We raised the minimum level of wages and improved the standards of working conditions in industries engaged in interstate commerce.

We enacted measures designed to safeguard the economic security of the farmer, to liberalize disability benefits to veterans and their dependents, and to promote full development of our natural resources.

The Eighty-first Congress authorized the greatest peacetime expansion of our Armed Forces in the history of our country in an effort to deter and to discourage any aggressor. In our second session now closing, however, we found it necessary to raise and reraise our sights—to speed our timetable of rearmament.

The first time was after the treacherous and unprovoked attack by Communist North Korea on its neighbor, the independent Republic of Korea. We passed the National Production Act to speed up defense production, authorize controls over critical materials and price and wage controls if they became necessary.

We removed limitations on the size of our Armed Forces.

We authorized the President to extend current enlistments for a year and to call up the National Guard and Reserves.

We provided $17,000,000,000 in additional appropriations for our Armed Forces and for arming our Atlantic Pact allies.

We enacted a tax measure designed to bring in $4,700,000,000 in new revenues to partially meet these obligations.

To guard our internal security we enacted measures against subversion, sabotage, and espionage, and to prevent possible sneak attacks. We also provided authority to control the movement of foreign vessels in our home waters and of aircraft over our cities and defense production centers.

It was generally expected when this Congress recessed on September 23 that our final labors would be only the enactment of an excess-profits tax.

For the second time, however, international developments dictated otherwise.

The reversal of our victory over the North Korean Communist invaders by intervention of the Red Chinese Army confronted us again with naked aggression.

And again the Eighty-first Congress responded nobly to a crisis.

In the few weeks since reconvening on November 27, we have levied an excess-profits tax estimated to yield $3,400,000,000.

We have made supplemental defense appropriations totaling $19,000,000,000.

We have established a Civil Defense Authority.

We have authorized additional aid to Yugoslavia.

We have amended and extended the first War Powers Act and passed numerous other measures to put our Nation in a state of readiness for total mobilization should that step become necessary.

In its two full years of service, the Eighty-first Congress has appropriated a total of approximately $132,000,000,000, including contract authorizations. Of this vast sum, $73,000,000,000 was made available for our own Armed Forces and for military and economic assistance to nations abroad.

Rarely has a Congress of the United State been called upon to perform, even in the midst of all-out war, such monumental tasks as those which the Eighty-first has now completed. Never before has a Congress grappled with a wider variety of grave problems involving questions arising from this ultramodern and rapidly developing era.

The results are a tribute to the processes by which free people govern themselves and to the institution of Congress as one of the three coordinate branches of the Federal Government.

To the Members of this body, be they returning with the Eighty-second, or retiring to their homes, I want to express my personal thanks for their good work, cooperation, understanding, and appreciation of the problems that have confronted us here during the past 24 months of swift changes.

I believe that the grateful people of this country—and most all are grateful—are appreciative of the work Congress has completed in this trying and strainy period to strengthen our country.

To those who are retiring from this body, I say farewell and God bless you. To those who remain to enter the new Congress, I ask for God's blessing to give us the strength and wisdom to handle expeditiously and efficiently the many new problems that confront our beloved country—the greatest Nation on earth.

CHARLES J. TREES

Mr. DENTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 5244) for the relief of Charles J. Trees, and ask unanimous consent that the statement of the managers on the part of the House be read in lieu of the report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (H. REPT. 3205)

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (H. R. 5244) a bill for the relief of Charles J. Trees, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by the Senate amendment on page 1, line 4, insert "$9,448.86"; and the Senate agree to the same.

WILLIAM T. BYRNE,
WINFIELD K. DENTON,
Managers on the Part of the House.

Managers on the Part of the Senate.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5244) for the relief of Lt. Col. Charles J. Trees, Army of the United States, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

This bill as passed the House would confer jurisdiction upon the United States District Court for the Southern District of Indiana, Indianapolis division, to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claim of Lt. Col. Charles J. Trees for damages allegedly sustained as the result of court-martial sentence of November 29, 1945, and nullified July 22, 1946.

The bill was originally introduced to appropriate the sum of $21,948.86. The Senate amended the bill to appropriate the sum of $21,948.86, as was originally introduced and, in view of the fact that a large amount of this appropriation was to compensate him for mental anguish, the conferees are of the opinion that this should not be allowed However, the records indicate that he had an out-of-pocket expense of $9,448.86 and should be reimbursed this amount, and at the conference the sum of $9,448.86 was agreed upon.

WILLIAM T. BYRNE,
WINFIELD K. DENTON,
Mangers on the Part of the House.

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 353 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

By unanimous consent, further proceeding under the call were dispensed with.

Mr. DENTON. Mr. Speaker, this is a private bill in which a sum of money is given to Charles J. Trees in the nature of damages for malicious prosecution. As the bill passed the House he was given an opportunity to bring suit in the southern district of Indiana. When the bill went to the Senate it was amended and the gentleman was given damages in the sum of a little over $21,000.

The facts in this case are about as follows: This man was attached to the OSS, and was performing duties in Rangoon. That was before the Allies had taken possession of the country. It was his duty to stir up insurrection and encourage guerrillas, and get information, and things like that behind the lines. There was little accountability of the property they had.

As a matter of fact, he was given a large number of guns. I think the evidence showed they were parachuted to the men that were doing this kind of work. He entered into an arrangement with a Burmese whose wife was an American. They were going to have a detail go and rescue the American wife of this Burmese from a concentration camp. About that time the Allies came into possession of Rangoon. He had turned over, I think, 50 guns to a captain who was working under him. This captain gave these guns to this Burmese to carry out this expedition.

Trouble developed between this officer and his immediate superior, and probably the British authorities, and he was ordered back into India. At that time they tried him for not accounting for these 50 guns. This man had other property entrusted to him while he was working for the OSS behind the lines.

He found when he came back that he was tried according to the strict principles of accountability for Army property that applied to the service forces. The captain was tried first, and all the witnesses were heard, and he was found guilty by the court martial. Then all the witnesses disappeared. They put Colonel Trees on trial. He was unable to get his witnesses. He was found guilty by the court martial, for not accounting for these 50 guns.

The case was appealed and taken to the Judge Advocate General, who reversed the case, but this man had to expend a large sum of money. He was out of pocket easily the $9,448—some we have allowed in this bill. The Senate allowed him $21,000. That included money he lost because he was kept in the Army, and also included mental anguish and some other things we did not think should be allowed. But there was plenty of evidence that he was out of pocket this $9,448.

We all know what courts martial are in the Army. I think it is only fair that this man should be reimbursed for the expense he suffered.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENTON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. Is it not a fact that if we pass this bill we establish a precedent for paying the expenses of every single person who is hauled before a court martial if he happens to be acquitted? The same thing would follow if anybody were hauled into court on a criminal charge and acquitted. It would set such a precedent that there would be no telling where we would get off in the long run.

Mr. DENTON. In answer to that, may I say there is a United States statute which gives a person just that right of action, an action for malicious prosecution. That applies to Army courts martial.

There is a precedent for this case. The Eightieth Congress passed a bill to reimburse the captain about whom I spoke, who got the 50 guns and turned them over to the natives. He was convicted and appealed the case, and it was reversed. This is an extremely bad case. I do not think that just because it sets a precedent we ought to shy away from the facts.

Mr. TABER. The War Department is opposed to the bill?

Mr. DENTON. That is right. I have a letter here from Major General Donovan, under whom he acted. I should like to read that letter.

General Donovan was in charge of the OSS in the far eastern theater of operation. It is addressed to Mr. WILLIAM T. BYRNE, who is chairman of the subcommittee. The letter reads as follows:

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BYRNE: I am informed that you have before your subcommittee H. R. 5244, a bill for the relief of Lt. Col. Charles J. Trees, ORC.

I am quite interested in the disposition of such a matter, inasmuch as Colonel Trees served in the OSS, of which I was commanding officer.

Because I felt that Colonel Trees' court-martial conviction was a miscarriage of justice, I personally, and through my partner, James R. Withrow, Jr., assisted Colonel Trees in securing its reversal and his acquittal. As you know, the acts of which he was accused consisted of the distribution of arms to native peoples for use against Japanese troops. Such activities were pursuant to entirely authorized conduct and procedure in the OSS under the circumstances in the India-Burma theater, in which he served.

As far as Colonel Trees personally is concerned, I do, and have commended him most highly as a capable and zealous officer in the service of our country in time of war.

In view of the financial loss incurred by him in clearing his person and name of the accusations against him, I feel that Congress representing all of us would serve a proper purpose in recompensating him for losses which a good patriotic officer should not have been forced to incur when merely carrying out orders on a highly important and secret operation.

I hope my views of the matter can be of assistance to the members of your committee in resolving any question on the passage of Colonel Trees' bill.

Yours very truly,
WILLIAM J. DONOVAN.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENTON. I yield.

Mr. FULTON. Then how did it come about in the first place that the court-martial decision was made against him?

What was the reason for the misunderstanding or miscarriage of justice?

Mr. DENTON. He was operating behind the lines when this occurred. He did have some difficulty with his colonel and probably with the English authorities. This happened in Rangoon and he was ordered back into the interior of India. They tried him for the accountability of this property under the same rules of accountability and responsibility for property which would apply to a situation behind the lines, whereas he was operating in an active theater.

Mr. FULTON. If I may make my question a little more aimed: On what evidence was he convicted? Was it perjured, was it false evidence, or was it careless evidence, or was it a misconception of fact?

Mr. DENTON. I think it was a misconception of fact. There has been a great deal said about the evidence. It is pretty hard for anybody to be the judge of that. He asked to have a number of witnesses testify in his behalf. They appeared for a captain who was tried first; but when he wanted to have his own witnesses testify for him they were not available. Quite an investigation was made about this whole thing by the OSS. I think it is a great miscarriage of justice. The Judge Advocate General of the Army reversed the conviction.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENTON. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. I feel sure the gentleman would not want to leave the impression with the House as a result of his reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] that the gentleman from New York was incorrect when he said that the Army is opposed to the passage of this bill. That is a correct statement, is it not?

Mr. DENTON. Of course most of the bills of this kind that we have are opposed by the Department.

Mr. KEATING. Since I was the third member of the conference committee and declined to sign the conference report, I feel I should say I did so because I do not agree that this bill has merit. The measure which we passed originally in the House, which would have conferred jurisdiction upon the district court to hear and determine his claim, seems to me to be the proper disposition in this matter. Then, if the man has a legitimate, justiciable claim he can prove it in court. That has been the practice of the other body frequently. Where we have passed bills for specific amounts, they have often adopted that method of dealing with the matter. I entirely agree that this man or any other claimant should have his day in court, but it seems to me that the evidence does not justify the passage of a bill to pay him any set sum of money. I am very much impressed with the argument advanced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] that if we do allow this claim we must then, perforce, allow the expenses of anyone who happens to be acquitted in an Army court-martial, to be paid by the United States Government, which is contrary to all practice in the past, and I believe is a precedent which we should not follow.

Mr. DENTON. In answer to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEATING] I think when this matter was heard before the subcommittee we thought it was doubtful about the question of the sum of $21,000 damages, and we thought it best to let it go to court and let the court determine the damage. However, the Senate allowed the full amount. All conferences are a matter of compromise. We thought that the man showed a loss of at least this $9,448.

As far as precedence is concerned, you do have a statute that authorizes this. A case can be tried by military personnel under that statute. This same captain who was convicted with him was recompensed for the damages he suffered, in a bill passed by the Eightieth Congress.

Mr. KEATING. If the gentleman will yield further, would that result not be effected, if the man has a good claim, by the bill which we enacted in the House originally? It seems to me he would then be able to prove his claim.

Mr. DENTON. I do not see much point, when we have heard the evidence and feel that he has a good claim and that there is no question about the damages, in sending it over there to the court to try the case.

Mr. KEATING. If the gentleman will yield further, a representative of the Judge Advocate General's Department of the Army has complained to me that they were not heard before the committee on their side of this controversy and that they are very much opposed to this claim and should have an opportunity to be heard, in addition to the signing of a letter which they gave us in opposition to this claim.

Mr. DENTON. Of course, you do have this letter from his commanding general, General Donovan, entirely exonerating him.

Mr. BARDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENTON. I yield.

Mr. BARDEN. Apparently there is no difference of opinion on the question of whether this officer was mistreated. I am not familiar with the detailed facts, but if he was mistreated, then I am not afraid of the precedent to be set by this body in correcting any error that this Government has made. If it mistreats a man, I am not afraid of the precedent which it may set, regardless of the amount involved, if it is to treat him right, as far as possible.

I do want to add this. I have had considerable experience with these court-martial cases. I have seen some of them that were absolutely outrageous. I do not make that statement as an attack upon the armed services or the officers in general. I do say there is too much laxity and sometimes too much influence wielded by those who preside over the proceedings. When we have this kind of case that comes up, then I think the names of those officers who perpetrated this wrong should be spread upon the record of this House and that we should not pass them by and thereby license those who follow later. According to the remarks of all concerned, this man was mistreated, and I am not afraid of the precedent of doing right after we find that we have been wrong, or one of our agencies has been wrong.

Mr. DENTON. I thank the gentleman.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE TO INFORM THE PRESIDENT

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, your committee appointed to join a committee of the Senate to inform the President that the Congress is ready to adjourn, and to ask him if he has any further communications to make to the Congress, has performed that duty. The President has directed us to say that he has no further communication to make to the Congress.

PROVISION FOR SINE DIE ADJOURNMENT

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Con. Res. 297) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the two Houses of Congress shall adjourn on Tuesday, January 2, 1951, and that when they adjourn on said day they stand adjourned sine die.

The resolution was agreed to.

AUTHORITY TO SIGN ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Con. Res. 298) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That, notwithstanding the sine die adjournment of the two Houses, the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate be, and they are hereby, authorized to sign enrolled bills and joint resolutions duly passed by the two Houses and found truly enrolled.

The resolution was agreed to.

AUTHORITY TO CLERK TO RECEIVE MESSAGES FROM THE SENATE

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that, notwithstanding the sine die adjournment of the House, the Clerk be authorized to receive messages from the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

PRINTING OF REPORTS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that reports filed with the Clerk following the sine die adjournment by committees authorized by the House to conduct investigations, may be printed by the Clerk as reports of the Eighty-first Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

CHARLES J. TREES

Mr. DENTON. Mr. Speaker, the evidence in this case shows that this was an out-of-pocket expense, money he was compelled to pay for trips, traveling expenses, halfway across the continent two or three times because of this case. It did not include such things as loss of time because he had to stay in the Army longer than he otherwise would have; it does not include mental suffering or damage to reputation, things of that nature; it includes only out-of-pocket money, and there is an itemized statement showing the out-of-pocket expense.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for one observation in connection with this case?

Mr. DENTON. I yield.

Mr. JACOBS. I wish to clarify one matter in the mind of the House. There has been some discussion of the possibility of giving a lawsuit in connection with this case. This case arose out of conditions that might be described as cloak-and-dagger warfare. Many of the witnesses are scattered not only throughout the United States, but throughout the world.

The expenses incurred were $9,448 and some cents, and that is what this bill calls for. The man could not have been damaged any less than that.

If you gave him a lawsuit he would have to spend substantially the same amount to establish his lawsuit in court in connection with the statute which has been discussed here. There is a statute whereby a malicious prosecution action may be brought against the Government. The report quotes from the Army's objection to this bill in which they contend, and with some respectable authority, I might say, that the statute does not apply to court martials; consequently it is not certain by any means that he has such a right under that statute, and there is no precedent to say that the act of 1938 would constitute a remedy in this case, and in no event would it be a complete remedy because such statute limits recovery to $5,000.

I am talking to you for the last time I shall ever speak on the floor of this House. If I did not think that he had a just claim I would certainly tell him so and I would not present this bill; I would not urge it upon you. I hope that the Members of this House feel, in view of my service here, that when I make that statement I am telling the truth. I sincerely think that it is a just bill and should pass.

Mr. DENTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I dislike to oppose a bill which the gentleman from Indiana is asking for at this date. My duty requires me to differ with him. If we were to pass this bill and provide by legislation for the payment of a specific amount to this colonel who was court-martialed and convicted in the first instance, later on after an appeal the conviction being reversed, if we undertake to establish that kind of a precedent, we are establishing one which will require the Government of the United States to pay the expenses of every defendant in every court martial that results ultimately in an acquittal. It is going to be a great temptation to a lot of people, and, further, it is going to result in the passage of legislation which would require the payment of the expenses of defense on the part of those who are charged in the regular court martial courts with criminal offenses.

Under the circumstances I do not see how we can pass this bill. The Secretary of the Army states that the enactment of this bill would have the effect of granting to this claimant benefits denied to other persons in similar circumstances and would constitute a legislative discrimination which would be a precedent for presentation to the Congress of innumerable similar bills to compensate other members or former members of the Armed Forces for similar alleged damages. The Department is strongly opposed to the enactment of this bill and, under the circumstances, I hope the House will vote down the conference report.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FULTON. If we accept the view of the sponsors of the bill, on the point made by the gentleman from New York if we paid the expenses of defense of court martial where the conviction has been reversed finally, why, then, should we not pay the expenses of defense of any person court-martialed even though acquitted to begin with?

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. JACOBS. In the first place, I see no reason why you should not if a man's innocence has been established. I hold to the philosophy that the only reason that government exists is to administer individual justice.

I do not want to impose upon the time of the Members of the House to go into all of the details of this case, for I would take this man's career from the time he went into the Army and relate everything he did from that time on. For instance, I would cite one mission where he was given 3 weeks to pay his last visit on a suicide mission; I would cite the time he parachuted into Burma behind enemy lines and maintained radio contact with the outside world, where men died from diseases and enemy sniping; I would cite the time where he was arrested in India. Even the officer who prosecuted him commended him for his service. He never had a rating of less than excellent, most of his ratings being superior. I would refer to the over 50 pistols that were issued to a Burmese colonel, who was a loyal British subject, to liberate civilians from a concentration camp, one of whom was the wife of the Burmese colonel, the daughter of a Milwaukee man. If I were to relate all the facts to you, I would tell you that even Colonel Donovan said that there was a miscarriage of justice.

If I were to cite these facts to you, will you tell me one reason why 151,000,000 Americans should expect Colonel Trees to bear the expenses of establishing his innocence, dig down into his own pocket and take $9,844 out of his pocket in order to establish his innocence?

The Army comes forward and makes certain objections on the ground of precedence.

I say that there is enough justice for everyone, and if a man has been wronged, this body of 435 men, sitting here representing 151,000,000 people of this country, cannot be unmindful or careless of the rights of this colonel who was wronged and occasioned to spend this money out of his pocket. When the captain was tried—and this Congress reimbursed the captain, do not forget that; the Eightieth Congress passed a bill for the relief of the captain—when the captain was tried and convicted, Colonel Trees' witnesses were told that Colonel Trees would not be tried, and they were sent home. Gentlemen, if it has come to the point where we will be careless and negligent and unconcerned over the rights of an officer that has so valiantly served his country, then I say the very ultimate object of government is lost, because the ultimate object is justice to the individual. Yes, the Army says there is no precedent for compensating a man who has been wrongfully convicted. Well, I might invite the Army to read the book by Professor Bashore, of Yale, entitled "Convicting the Innocent," which is replete with instances of world legislative bodies who passed bills for the relief of men who have been the victims of miscarriage of justice. I am not afraid of any precedent for justice.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FULTON. If the gentleman says that an officer should be reimbursed for his out-of-pocket expense for defense in a general court martial proceedings, where do you stop? Do you then go to the summary court martial and would you then go to the deck court of the Navy, and if a young enlisted man thinks he ought to get counsel, then in every one of those cases where he is then found innocent, the Congress of the United States should make up his out-of-pocket expense? Where is the rule by which you stop, if you do this?

Mr. SUTTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SUTTON. The gentleman realizes that we furnish an attorney for him now. This is a case of justice, shall I say, for big brass. There is no one who has fought big brass any more than PAT SUTTON has, but this time I am standing up for him because it is a case of justice; because it was a man who was dealt with in such a way that you would not want to be treated or your constituents would not want to be treated. The precedent has been set by the Eightieth Congress when the captain was reimbursed and along with that this lieutenant colonel is now asking that justice be dealt out to him.

Mr. TABER. This whole thing seems to be approached without comprehension of the safeguards that the Army and the legislative bodies that prescribe the procedure of our courts have provided. They have provided that when a court martial is to be held, that the Army or the Navy or the Air Force will provide counsel to defend the accused against the charges. That program is already set up, and it is set up for every single person who is accused in a court-martial case. And they make the arrangements whereby the witnesses are provided by the Government. Now, it does not seem to me that we should have this kind of a situation presented. Even in the regular criminal courts a defendant, when he does not have counsel, is provided with one.

Mr. Speaker, I hope this conference report will be defeated.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the conference report.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say to the gentleman from New York that the Senate has already acted upon this conference report, so a motion to recommit is not in order in the House.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TABER) there were—ayes 84, noes 38.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 219, nays 127, answered "present" 1, not voting 81, as follows:

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL AIRPORT ACT

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 1281) to amend the Federal Airport Act so as to make the United States share of costs for land acquisition the same as for other project costs.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, may I ask how this bill affects airports like that of the city of Fall River, which has been trying to secure some money for some time. It has been unable to do so because of the freezing of the money appropriated for airports? Would this have any effect on an airport like that?

Mr. HARRIS. It would not have any effect upon such an airport as the gentleman has just described, in Fall River, Mass. As I understand, you already have your land acquired.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. We already have the land, and they are getting ready to go ahead and develop it, but they stopped the development because of the fact that the promised Federal contribution was not given.

Mr. HARRIS. This would have no effect on that whatsoever.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I withdraw my reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HESELTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman explain what the attitude of the committee was in terms of this additional money? I have in mind that in all probability most of the funds will be allocated to the larger airports by reason of the national defense requirements. My understanding is that the committee does not intend that these funds shall be permanently allocated in any manner which would be inequitable to the smaller airports. They are vitally necessary for a sound air transport system.

Mr. HARRIS. The gentleman is correct. The only way to correct at all the condition the gentleman has just described is through the National Defense Establishment. The Air Force is highly interested in this legislation and has asked that it be passed.

Mr. HESELTON. I withdraw my reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 10 of the Federal Airport Act is amended by striking out all of subsection (d) thereof.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BECKWORTH] may have until midnight tonight to file an activity report for the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

ECONOMY

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker—

A New Year's resolution that would do our country the greatest good
Would be to economize in Government spending, as you should.
Colleagues, as the New Year begins for Nineteen Fifty-one,
The best resolution I could offer, by gum,
Is that Congress would be wise if it would economize.

I warn you again and again and again,
It will be the only salvation for men,
Whether in the mills, factories, farms, or our armed services.
Members of Congress, you have been spending and spending and spending,
Now the backs of our people are bending and bending and bending,
While you tax and tax and tax.
Why, in the name of heaven, do you not let them relax?
If you stop spending, and giving, and lending,
You can let up on the taxing, and straining and bending.

The everlasting meddling in the business of other nations,
Is the great cause of our trouble,
Change your foreign policy, or we will burst like a bubble.
If you want peace more and more,
You can have it, I am sure,
If you stop this foreign meddling, and this great preparation for war.

My colleagues, to all I hold dear,
Economy should be your watchword
throughout the new year.
Now I wish you joy, pleasure, health, happiness, and sich,
And on this floor now is the last for BOB RICH.

H. Con. Res. 297. Concurrent resolution providing for the sine die adjournment of the Congress; and

H. Con. Res. 298. Concurrent resolution authorizing the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate to sign bills and joint resolutions duly passed and found truly enrolled.

The SPEAKER. Under previous special order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEATING] is recognized for 10 minutes.

HON. JAMES W. WADSWORTH

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to one of our colleagues who unfortunately will not be a Member of the Eighty-second Congress. The vast knowledge, unselfish statesmanship, and good fellowship of the distinguished Representative of the Forty-first New York District, JAMES W. WADSWORTH, will indeed be sorely missed in the coming Congress. And we shall not be alone in this. The entire country will miss his well-founded wisdom, sage foresight, and courageous leadership in the years of crisis ahead.

JIM WADSWORTH'S devotion to duty and sense of public responsibility follow in the long tradition of his ancestors. His career is not the exception, but rather the rule in the Wadsworth family whose name has been prominently connected with the major undertakings representing the best episodes in American history.

His great-great-great-grandfather, William Wadsworth, was one of the group of determined pioneers who made their way through the wilderness to found Hartford, Conn. Decades later, when the royal governor of Connecticut attempted to seize the charter of the colony, the candles were snuffed out in a dramatic moment, and Capt. Joseph Wadsworth hid the document in the hollow of Charter Oak. Years after, it was retrieved to become the constitution of the colony.

Gen. James Wadsworth served as major general of the Connecticut line in the American Revolution and as a Member of the First Continental Congress when the United States became a reality. His uncle, Jeremiah Wadsworth, was commissary general and it was in his residence that Washington and Rochambeau worked out plans for the conduct of revolutionary campaigns.

When peace was restored and the Colonies had purchased their independence by their bloody sacrifices, Jeremiah Wadsworth loaned funds to his nephews, James and William, to buy land at a dollar an acre in western New York, which at that time was still a largely unexplored wilderness.

So, in the spring of 1790, the young men set out with their party of axmen up the Hudson River to Albany, portaged to Schenectady and thence moved up the Mohawk River. Whenever possible they brought cattle, which William herded via the forest trails while James continued on the water route. Finally they met at their rendezvous on the banks of the Genesee River. They decided to settle on the rich valley land, where they established friendly relations with the Indians, cleared their land, and built a log dwelling.

In the War of 1812 William Wadsworth was commissioned major general in command of the militia of the Genesee district and led his troops in an expedition across the Niagara River into Canada.

As the wagon roads and the Erie Canal were completed, produce from the west began to flow eastward toward the Atlantic seaports, and western New York State flourished and attracted large numbers of new settlers. The Wadsworths prospered with the region.

JIM WADSWORTH'S grandfather, Maj. Gen. James Samuel Wadsworth, was born in 1807. He read law in Daniel Webster's office, then attended Yale Law School. After the death of his father and uncle he took over management of the family property. He became a free-soiler and joined with Martin Van Buren in seceding from the Democratic Party. He became active in support of the free-democracy group, whose motto was "Free soil, free speech, free labor, and free-men," and which later evolved into the Republican Party.

In 1860 he supported Abraham Lincoln for President. When the War Between the States commenced he was commissioned and demonstrated his courage and his ability in the Battle of Bull Run to such an extent that he was promoted to brigadier general and later made military governor in charge of the defense of Washington.

General Wadsworth took time off from active service to run for Governor of New York on the Republican ticket, but was defeated. He returned to active military duty and was subsequently killed in the Battle of the Wilderness.

General Wadsworth's youngest son, James, although a mere boy of 16, enlisted and participated in the closing battles of the war. He was cited for bravery, promoted to captain, and finally was mustered out a brevet major.

Later he was elected to the State legislature for two terms before becoming State comptroller in 1880. From State office, he moved on to become a Congressman. This office he graced and filled with distinction for more than 20 years, until 1907.

For 10 years, the elder Wadsworth was chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture, for which his intimate knowledge of farming particularly suited him. The Meat Inspection Act which was drafted by the committee during his chairmanship was a tremendous step forward in consumer protection.

"Young JIM" WADSWORTH was born at Geneseo in 1877. His early childhood was spent amid rural scenes of great beauty. It is little wonder, therefore, that he has always loved the outdoors and all the rigorous activity that goes with it. When Jim was 5, his father took the family with him to Washington. There young Jim got his first taste of politics and feeling for Government service which has distinguished his entire life.

He went to school in Washington, and later in Geneseo. When he was 10 he was sent to the Fay School in Massachusetts and then continued on to St. Mark's School. It was at St. Mark's that Jim first became interested in history and particularly in American history. This keen enthusiasm has lasted through the years.

During his vacations, his father kept him busy learning the practical side of farming. Ever since he was a boy of 12, Jim had had his heart set on farming as a career and had begun preparing to be a success at that career. His father was an expert judge of cattle and drummed into his son all the fine points by which to evaluate their worth.

When Jim became a little older, he was sent during the summer to work on one of the family farms about 15 or 20 miles away, since it is an old family adage that the best thing for land is the owner's foot. There he worked with the other men and was allowed to come home only to play baseball on Saturday.

Back in the seventies, Jim's father had organized a baseball team called the Livingstons, many of whose members became noted professional ball players. Our colleague followed in his father's footsteps in his interest in baseball and became a star first baseman as his father had been before him. In college, he played on the freshman team and later in 1898, while first baseman on the varsity team, he was mentioned for the all-America nine. During the summer of 1897, he played with the Rochester Geneseos when they won the championship of Canada after touring as far west as Chicago and up through Michigan. During these years of playing ball, Jim displayed the sportsmanship and good fellowship which endeared him to partisan and opponent alike. Today in Rochester, many of his contemporaries still like to think of him as just young Jim who played first base on the local ball team.

In 1898, he graduated from Yale, having taken every course in history which the university offered. At the same time his father received an honorary degree of master of arts.

After graduation, he enlisted in Light Battery A, of the Pennsylvania Volunteers, which was about to sail for Puerto Rico to fight in the Spanish-American War. However, when their troop ship entered the harbor at Puerto Rico, it went aground on a shoal. Since the captain knew of Jim's experience with animals, he drew the job of tending the horses and mules while the rest of the men went ashore. One afternoon, a cutter drew alongside, and Jim's father came aboard. The Congressman had come down to survey the war situation and, while there, included his son's four-legged charges in his inspection.

At the end of the war, Light Battery A was returned home, and Private WADSWORTH became a civilian again. With considerable pride, I have often heard Jim say that he is the only Member of Congress who holds the distinction of having entered the Army as a private and retired as a private.

Shortly thereafter, however, Jim got permission from the Secretary of War to accompany a troop transport, the Sherman, on a trip around the world. By the time the troopship arrived in Manila, the Philippine insurrection had broken out, and Jim had his first opportunity to view trained and seasoned troops in action. There he learned the lesson of preparedness from the sharp contrast between these regulars and the ill-trained recruits and volunteers in the Spanish-American campaign. From that time on, our colleague has been a stanch advocate of preparedness and a strong national defense.

Home again and having seen the world at the ancient age of 22, Jim settled down to farming in earnest. All summer and autumn, he raised crops and tended his cattle and sheep. But, as winter set in, he decided, at his father's suggestion, to clerk at the local bank to learn something about finance and local business. But when spring came, he went back to the farming he loved.

This same year, he made his first public speech—on the beneficial effects of and the necessity for good roads. His only other political efforts were directed toward bringing voters to the polls at election time and organizing a mounted campaign troop which performed at all the Republican meetings in the district. During the fall of 1900, the troop, with the erstwhile Army private as its captain, rode nearly 300 miles in the interests of Republicanism.

In 1902, he married Miss Alice Hay, the daughter of the Secretary of State, and they settled on Jim's farm in the Genesee Valley.

In the summer of 1904, his active political career began with the announcement of his candidacy for assemblyman from Livingston County. He was duly nominated and in November received 5,600 out of 9,400 votes cast. During this first campaign and in subsequent elections, the office-seeker found that his baseball prowess and fame had won him many friends and admirers. This remained true through all his political life.

During his first term as assemblyman, he was appointed to the committees on taxation and on villages. He was reelected in the fall of 1905 without difficulty. Shortly before the fall election, the speaker of the assembly, S. Fred Nixon, had died, with the result that the 1906 session of the legislature had to choose a new speaker. In December 1905, the young legislator received a wire from the governor requesting him to visit the executive mansion when he returned to Albany after Christmas. To his amazement, he then found that he was the governor's choice for speaker. After a hot factional dispute within the Republican caucus, he was elected and thus became speaker of the New York State Assembly at the age of 28.

The great achievement of the session was the passage of the insurance-reform legislation drafted by Charles Evans Hughes. In addition, the first bond issue for $50,000,000 for the improvement of public roads was authorized.

For 5 years, our colleague served as speaker of the New York State Assembly, but the work required so much of his time—he frequently worked all day Saturday and Sunday—that he decided not to stand for reelection in 1910.

In 1911, he and Mrs. Wadsworth toured Europe and Africa for 5 months. It was while he was in Egypt that he received a letter from his aunt, Mrs. Adair, who owned the famous J. A. Ranch in Texas. She, knowing that her nephew was a good judge of cattle, and raised fine cattle himself, asked if he would take over the management of the J. A. Ranch.

Thus began a new and exciting phase of life. During the next 5 years he rode the Texas panhandle country, learned to ride western style, and all the innumerable things a good ranch hand should know. He did not neglect his own farm, however, but alternated between Texas and New York.

Although dividing his activity, WADSWORTH kept in close contact with New York politics, and in 1912 was chairman of the New York Republican delegation to the national convention. That year the split between Roosevelt and Taft rent the Republican Party nationally. WADSWORTH and a friend, Job E. Hedges, unwilling to see the governorship go by default, even though it was obvious that any Republican would be defeated because of the split in party ranks, decided to team up to head the State ticket. Hedges was chosen in the convention and WADSWORTH ran with him as candidate for the lieutenant governorship. They made a gallant fight and came out second best, which was all they had hoped to accomplish.

In 1914 WADSWORTH was out on the Texas range working with the men branding cattle when one of the cowboys from the home ranch rode up with a telegram. It was to the effect that a mass meeting in Geneseo, his home town, had adopted a resolution urging him to run as Republican candidate for United States Senator.

He won easily in the primaries and again in the general election in the autumn.

When he came to the Senate, Jim began to put his ideas on national defense and military training into effect. He was appointed to the Committee on Military Affairs, of which he later became chairman in 1919. In 1916 he foresaw that the country would be drawn into the war and urged immediate preparedness. He opposed the embargo on Allied shipping as discriminatory against England and the Allies. At a time when Wilson was elected President again on a platform of "He kept us out of war," WADSWORTH was advocating and speaking in favor of sending regular troops to Europe in the event of war. He said, too, that the United States would not be able to wage war effectively if we relied solely on a volunteer arm. A year later President Wilson and his advisers came to the same conclusion, and presented a bill for congressional action to draft American men into the Army.

After the declaration of war in 1917, the Committee on Military Affairs in the Senate took a very active and personal interest in the progress of mobilization, and committee members, including WADSWORTH, toured the country visiting the various plants and military camps.

The lack of coordination and planning which resulted in endless delays and red tape, lack of transportation and equipment, drove home relentlessly the lesson WADSWORTH never forgot and never ceased to fight for—that preparation for war must come before war begins, not after.

WADSWORTH later went to France and saw the AEF in operation there and added to his growing knowledge of American military problems. In 1919 when he assumed the chairmanship of the Senate Military Affairs Committee, he headed a subcommittee of five which undertook to revise the national defense statutes. After a year of hard work, extensive hearings, and concentrated research, the committee reported out the bill which became the National Defense Act of June 6, 1920. At this time, too, he fought in vain for a universal training law in peacetime.

After the Defense Act became law, WADSWORTH was sponsor of a bill to revise the pay schedules of the armed services. It was at this time that the saying became current that JIM WADSWORTH had four children and the oldest was the Army. After one short term in the Senate, Jim was a national figure and one of the most influential men in Congress.

Years later, when in 1940, World War II loomed ominously on the horizon, WADSWORTH again led the fight for a peacetime draft law, although he was not a member of the Armed Services Committee. Now he is again advocating universal military training, believing as he always has that a large standing army is not in the American tradition but that a nucleus of professional soldiers, backed by large numbers of civilians who have had military training, is a must if we are to survive in this perilous world. Certainly the events in Korea have more than borne out the wisdom of his fight for a strong national defense, backed by millions of trained civilians, which he advocated when he came to the Senate in 1913 and which he has continued to press for right up to the time of his retirement.

During his 12 years in the Senate, WADSWORTH gained national recognition as a leader and authority on military matters. Nevertheless, he was defeated when he ran for reelection to the Senate in 1926.

Both of the reasons for his defeat were based on his belief in the right of States to determine certain questions for themselves. WADSWORTH had boldly opposed both suffrage for women and prohibition, although both were popular causes during that period. He stated honestly and forthrightly that he could not drink wet and vote dry. A Prohibition Party was formed, splitting the up-State Republican vote, which he usually carried solidly. The dry ticket polled 232,000 votes, enough to cause him to lose to Robert F. Wagner by a margin of 116,000.

After his unsuccessful campaign for reelection, he went back to his farming. For 6 years, he cultivated his land and mended his fences. During this period, his name was mentioned for numerous offices, ranging from Governor of New York to President of the United States.

Then in 1932, he decided to run for the House, and was elected with a very comfortable majority from what is now the Forty-first District. He took his seat in the House in time to vote for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, no doubt with a great deal of pleasure. Many people have wondered why he was not content to enjoy his retirement from public life and till his wide acres in the Genesee Valley and live the life of a gentleman of leisure.

However, public service has been a tradition in the Wadsworth family since long before this Nation was founded so that it did not seem at all strange to him that he should continue to serve the people of his district and represent their interests in Washington.

Certainly those of us who are his juniors will remember all our lives his generous advice and help when we first came to Congress, and the Nation has profited greatly by his continued presence. His years of service in the House have been marked by the same rugged integrity and intellectual independence which have characterized his entire life. Whether in agreement or disagreement with Mr. WADSWORTH'S position, I have never failed to respect his opinion and his shrewdness. His vote has always been solidly based on reason and the respect in which he is held by all of us who are or have been his colleagues is richly deserved and earned through years of association and personal knowledge.

As we well know, Mr. WADSWORTH has been one of our most influential Members. Content to work behind the scenes and without publicity or glory, he has been more powerful than many another with greater seniority, simply because of the unanswerable logic of his reasoning and the soundness of his approach to the problems before us. We have all known that when JIM WADSWORTH rose to speak, it was time to come in and listen attentively. For many of us upon many an occasion, his presentation of the facts has been the deciding factor in our determination as to the way to vote upon a particular question.

Jim has always voted, as he pleaded with the entire membership of the House to vote on that momentous day when the extension of the draft was at stake in 1941, when he said:

> My prayer is, Mr. Chairman, that our decision shall be made in the interest of the safety of the United States.

With our colleague's retirement to his farms in the Forty-first District, the name of WADSWORTH will continue to be a credit to the long line of Wadsworths who have served their country so faithfully and well.

Fortunately, too, our distinguished friend does not intend to spend all his time in the Genesee Valley, so that his familiar voice will not be entirely absent from the Capitol, I trust. His host of friends at both ends of the Capitol will always have the office latchstring out to welcome his advice and gain benefit from his words of wisdom.

We, his neighbors, are justly proud of JIM WADSWORTH, from his superb play at first base to his national eminence and well-deserved fame. Although his special place in the hearts of the people of the Genesee Valley and the Nation can never be filled and in that sense, we suffer an irreparable loss, I know all my colleagues join me in wishing that he will thoroughly enjoy for many years the rest and retirement he has earned so completely.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I have followed the career of Hon. JAMES W. WADSWORTH, of New York State from the days when he was a star baseball player at Yale University. Few athletes have more completely captured the imagination and admiration of the youth than did our much-beloved friend Jim in the day of his baseball prowess. He was then the idol of the hundreds of thousands of young men. They have been his devoted friends throughout his long and distinguished service as a legislator and statesman. Those of us who knew JAMES W. WADSWORTH never doubted that his courage, ability, and personality would be an open sesame to a great public career. Aside from serving 5 years as speaker of the New York State Assembly, his record as a Member of the United States Senate is one of outstanding statesmanship. Those of us who have served with Jim, as we like to think of him and call him, know full well the contribution he has made during his conspicuous public service in the Seventy-fourth, Seventy-fifth, Seventy-sixth, Seventy-seventh, Seventy-eighth, Seventy-ninth, Eightieth, and Eighty-first Congresses.

I regret to have our good friend retire as a Member of the House of Representatives. His ability, his experience, and his qualities as a statesman are needed in this critical period of our country which he has served so faithfully and with such distinction. I believe that our friend JIM WADSWORTH has measured up to the standard of representation set by Edmund Burke, the great English statesman and political philosopher, who, when challenged by his colleagues for not representing what seemed to them to be the views of his constituents, replied:

> Certainly, gentlemen, it ought to be the happiness and glory of a representative to live in the strictest union, the closest correspondence, and the most unreserved communication with his constituents. Their wishes ought to have great weight with him; their opinion high respect; their business unremitted attention. It is his duty to sacrifice his repose, his pleasure, his satisfaction to theirs; and above all, ever, and in all cases to prefer their interests to his own.
> But his unbiased opinion, his mature judgment, his enlightened conscience, he ought not to sacrifice to you, to any man, or to any set of men living. These he does not derive from your pleasure; no, nor from the law or the Constitution. They are a trust from Providence for the abuse of which he is deeply answerable. A representative owes his constituents, not his industry only, but his judgment; and he betrays, instead of serving them, if he sacrifices it to your opinion.

These principles, I believe, have guided and charted the representation of Hon. JAMES W. WADSWORTH in the affairs of state. His fine character, his sense of fairness and justice have set a worthy example of true statesmanship to legislators present and those to follow. I wish for our distinguished colleague as he now retires from public office many years of health and happiness and these blessings, too, I wish for Mrs. Wadsworth and the other members of the Wadsworth family.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, the name of JAMES W. WADSWORTH has been a household word in New York State for 40 years. He has been a tower of strength in the fight for good, honest government, and loyalty to the United States. It was a matter of regret to all of us to learn that he was going out.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COLE].

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, it is a strange mixture of emotions that comes over me as I contemplate the departure of New York State's most distinguished son from the Halls of the Congress and join with others today in paying tribute to him. I am deeply saddened that the day has arrived when JIM WADSWORTH, of his own free will and accord, is to lay aside the cloak of public office which he has worn with such outstanding credit and distinction for a generation, and once more is to join the army of private citizens for whom he has devoted his entire lifetime. But I am delighted that in leaving us he moves out under his own steam in the full health and vigor of his threescore years and ten. It means that he himself can smell the sweet fragrance of the flowery words of praise that are being spoken of him and be conscious of the fact that he takes with him the love and respect and admiration of all who have ever known and worked with him.

JIM WADSWORTH has always been an inspiration to me—an ideal to be studied and copied, realizing, of course, that a copy or reproduction never possesses the full, fine high quality of the original. This does not mean that in the endless decisions which we are called upon to make here in the Congress I have unswervingly followed his judgment, but in his approach to a problem, his attitude toward the responsibilities of public office, I have endeavored to match the pattern which he has set. Throughout these 16 years of my own service in the House I have constantly been mindful of the fact that JIM WADSWORTH was the Speaker of the assembly in New York State in the year when I was born and that throughout all these intervening years he has held the confidence of the voting public. Many, many other names and faces have moved across the stage of national politics during those 50 years, but he is one actor who played a dominant role in all that drama of American public life, except for one brief interval when he was temporarily called off stage.

Undoubtedly the secret of his success and the reason for the great respect which we all have for him is that his profound ability to pierce the maze of complexities which invariably cloud a public problem was matched by that greater human quality known as intellectual honesty. Never once, can it be said, did JIM WADSWORTH ever fail to speak and vote his honest convictions—even though at the time his own judgment perhaps did not concur with the existing public fancy. In being true to himself, to his conscience and his judgment, he has been everlastingly true to the best of American history, tradition, principles and future of our Nation.

Mr. Speaker, I consider it to be one of the greatest privileges of my life to have been able to learn about Government and to participate in Government at the feet of this great patriot and statesman and it is my prayer that I, as well as all of us who may continue to serve here, may be guided in our conduct by the treasured inspiration which JIM WADSWORTH has made for us.

I hate to see him go. This is a day which I have dreaded to occur for I realize that from now on we will be deprived of the privilege of association with this great personality but the memories of pleasant association with him here during these years of trial will be among the richest of my possessions. And it is comforting to know that much of his time from now on will be spent here in Washington. We hope that he will return frequently in order that we may have the benefit of his counsel and his example. We hope that this is not farewell, or good by to Jim but simply "so long."

The nicest thing about Jim's leaving us is that he goes with full vigor and health—there is nothing old and decrepit about JIM WADSWORTH—and we pray that he may have the many, many years of health and comfort which a lifetime of consecrated public service makes him so richly deserve.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KILBURN].

Mr. KILBURN. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to see the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] leave the Congress. I do not blame him; but it is a great loss to the country, in my opinion.

I had known him slightly before I came to Congress, and years ago he and my father were good friends. Since I have been in the House, I have imposed on his kindness many times. He has advised me on difficult votes and straightened out my thinking on major problems presented to the House.

In my opinion, he is a man of such great ability, honor, and integrity that he could have filled with distinction any office this country can offer, including the Presidency. My grateful best wishes go to him as he retires.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL].

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, I join with those of you today who are paying tribute to our distinguished colleague, JIM WADSWORTH.

During the past 11 years I have served in this House I have witnessed with great admiration the outstanding abilities possessed by him. There is no man in Congress superior to him either in prowess of debate, clarity of reasoning, and soundness of thought.

The test of a man's lasting achievement is his ability to weather the storms and vicissitudes of time. Mr. WADSWORTH has maintained a high place of importance in our national affairs many years longer than most of us ever dare to hope for.

Perhaps his greatest contribution during a life of statesmanship has been his unceasing devotion to the necessity of making our country secure both in peace and in war. I refer to his sterling leadership during World War II in the matters of mobilizing our manpower and our weapons. I am pleased to tell you that I went down the line with Mr. WADSWORTH during World War II in my votes in favor of each draft and for universal military training.

At this hour, this Nation is once more faced with the task of defending ourselves, only on a much larger scale than when we fought Hitler and the Japs. Today, a large segment of the world's teeming population is pitted in the opposite camp. The future looks more grim than in 1941.

In view of this sad fact, I would feel a lot more cheerful and more confident if I did not see the impressive figure of JAMES W. WADSWORTH leaving this House. We need his worthy counsel, his sage advice, his considerable knowledge and his excellent judgment at the most crucial period of America's history. His retirement will create a vacancy here that cannot possibly be filled.

Mr. GWINN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GWINN. I want to pay my respects to our colleague JAMES W. WADSWORTH. He is retiring from the House today after serving here 18 years and in the Senate 12 years. He is one of the distinguished public servants who help to prod the consciences of the citizenship to patriotic duty. He had a great deal to do unknowingly with prodding my own sense of duty to volunteer in politics.

He is going back to his ancestral homestead with the satisfaction that he has rendered more than his share of service to his country and with the acclaim of his fellow citizens—"Well done!"

Like the old Roman senator, Cato, he is returning to the soil in the community from whence he sprang.

There the population produces the bravest men, the most valiant soldiers, and a class of citizens the least given of all to evil design. And like most farmers who leave their farms and come to Washington, he has felt, no doubt, a growing urgency to be about the restoration and the treatment of woods, fields, and meadows so long neglected.

It was Jim's grandfather, I believe, who taught his grandson that the best manure for a meadow is the footprints of its owner. Even Jim's best friends may not suspect, but my guess is that he longs to cap off an unusual career of public service by being just a small-town guy who has always belonged to Genesee County, although absent from there a long, long time.

Many of us feel the tug of the journey he is taking. We realize how far removed he will be from the ring of three bells and the long trek between the office and the Capitol in response to the gentleman who makes a point of "no quorum present." Those of us who remain here for a while would like for him to stay with us. But, like him, we know that our country is not saved by what transpires in the Halls of Congress. We know the dangers of losing it here. We know too that the genius of our country lies in its institutions that the people love and are ready to fight to defend back home.

JAMES W. WADSWORTH, of Geneseo, great American patriot, soldier, statesman, wherever you may be, we know that you will always help to maintain and defend that precious individual liberty which is the Republic of the United States of America.

RESOLUTION PRESENTING THANKS OF THE HOUSE TO THE SPEAKER

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK] kindly take the chair?

Mr. HALLECK assumed the chair.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution which I know will be unanimously endorsed because it carries with it the warmest sentiments of every one of us on both sides of the aisle.

The Clerk read the resolution (H. Res. 896), as follows:

Resolved, That the thanks of the House are presented to the Honorable SAM RAYBURN, Speaker of the House of Representatives, for the able, impartial, and dignified manner in which he has presided over the deliberations and performed the arduous duties of the Chair during the present term of Congress.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask that a rising vote be taken.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On this vote the ayes are 225 and the noes are none. The resolution is unanimously adopted.

The SPEAKER resumed the chair.

The SPEAKER. Mr. MARTIN and my fellow Members, I am deeply grateful for this further evidence of your kindness and your favor. In bringing this Congress to a close I want to say that I deeply appreciate the courtesy of every Member of the House.

To those who will not serve with us again I say that I wish for you in your own districts that you may enjoy health and a reasonable degree of prosperity. You will pray with us, I know, that peace may come to this troubled earth.

BILL DISAPPROVED AFTER SINE DIE ADJOURNMENT

The President of the United States, subsequent to the sine die adjournment of the second session of the Eighty-first Congress, notified the Clerk of the House of Representatives that on January 6, 1951, he had disapproved the bill (H. R. 4803) for the relief of Bernard F. Elmers, together with his reasons for such action as follows:

BERNARD F. ELMERS

H. R. 4803. I have withheld my approval from H. R. 4803, for the relief of Bernard F. Elmers.

This enactment directs the Secretary of State to pay "out of the funds appropriated for the International Refugee Organization" $12,500 to Bernard F. Elmers, Pleasant Plains, N. Y., "in full satisfaction of his claim against the United States." Of this amount, $10,000 is to be paid to him for personal injuries sustained on January 8, 1947, when he was assaulted and robbed on the streets of Lesum, Germany, by two men later identified as Polish displaced persons. The remaining $2,500 represents payment to him for the theft by unknown persons, of securities and personal effects while these were in the temporary custody of the Criminal Investigation Division of the Army.

The claimant, at the time of the assault, was in Germany under an employment contract with the Army Exchange Service, European theater, as a junior auditor. On the night his injuries were sustained, he had been working late in his quarters in Lesum, adjoining Camp Grohn, near Bremen, completing an audit of the accounts of the Officers' Mess and of the Enlisted Men's Club. This work was unrelated to his Army Exchange Service employment. It had apparently been undertaken by him as extra employment at the suggestion or request of the commanding officer at Camp Grohn. Upon completion of his audit report, he accompanied a fellow employee part way to her home. While returning to his own quarters, about midnight, he was ambushed by the two Polish assailants, receiving severe injuries which apparently will incapacitate him for any further employment.

Mr. Elmers is precluded from recovering, by any means other than this special relief legislation, any compensation for his personal injuries out of federally appropriated funds. He is not entitled to the benefits of the Federal Employee Compensation Act, since he was an employee of the Army Exchange Service and paid from nonappropriated funds. He is without remedy under the Federal Tort Claims Act. Nor is he apparently entitled to the benefits of the employees' compensation program provided from private sources for the protection of Army Exchange Service employees. The lack of any other right of recourse, and the severity and incapacitating nature of the injuries inflicted upon him, apparently led the Congress in the end to feel that restitution to this claimant from some Federal funds source was justified, even though purely gratuitous.

While this case presents a stirring emotional appeal and the plight of the claimant arouses the deepest sympathy, I cannot find any basis to support the view that the United States should recompense the claimant for the tortious and criminal acts committed upon him. It is true that the assailants previously had been employed as civilian guards at an American quartermaster depot, but they had been discharged some time prior to the night of the assault. The fact of former employment by the United States obviously does not give rise to a proper fastening of responsibility upon the Federal Government for their action. Neither can the fact that they were displaced persons give support to any such attachment. They were not in any way under the supervision or control of Federal officials. That the extra work Mr. Elmers was engaged in on this particular night was being performed at the suggestion or request of an Army officer, likewise, affords no premise for Federal responsibility. The arrangement was entirely one between the officer and the claimant, and related to work even more remote from Federal employment than his regular employment with the Army Exchange Service.

Upon a record thus bare of any participation by the Federal Government, functionally or by acts of its officers and employees, in the unprovoked assault upon the claimant, I find myself readily and completely in agreement with the position of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary (S. Rept. 2556) that there is no conceivable liability on the part of the Government for the injuries received by Mr. Elmers. In the absence thereof, the enactment of this bill would indeed, open the door to a wide and unchartered field of Federal liability and insurmountable fiscal effects.

The bill is both novel and objectionable in another respect. I refer to the directive that the $12,500 payment be made out of funds appropriated for the International Refugee Organization. This is not only an undesirable fiscal procedure, but it is equally unwise from a foreign relations standpoint. The appropriations of funds heretofore made by this Government for the support of the International Refugee Organization represent the fulfillment of commitments made to the foreign nations participating in that program. To carry out the directive of the enrolled measure, depleting, as it would, the United States contribution by the amount proposed in payment of Mr. Elmers' claim, could very properly be considered a breach of our international commitment. That the provision has other unfortunate and disturbing imputations is also apparent.

While this lamentable incident is to be greatly deplored, I have nevertheless felt obliged, in view of the foregoing considerations, to withhold my approval from this bill. I would, however, be entirely willing to approve a measure reimbursing Mr. Elmers in such sum as may represent a fair value of the securities and personal effects which were lost while in the custody of the officials of the Government.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.
